Then they were off, a man at the heads of the leading horses harnessed to the great machines and Winston sitting very intent in the driving-seat of one, while the tough sod crackled under the rending shares. Both the man and the reins were needed when the smoke rolled down on them, but it was for a moment torn aside again, and there roared up towards the blurred arch of indigo a great rush of flame. The heat of it smote into prickliness the uncovered skin, and in spite of all that Winston could do, the beasts recoiled upon the machine behind them. Then they swung round wrenching the shares from the triplex furrow, and for a few wild minutes man and terrified beast fought for the mastery. Breathless half-stranged objurgations, the clatter of trace and swivel, and the thud of hoofs, rose muffled through the roar of the fire, for, while swaying, plunging, panting, they fought with fist and hoof, it was rolling on, and now the heat was almost insupportable. The victory, however, was to the men, and when the great machine went on again, Maud Barrington, who had watched the struggle with the wife of one of her neighbors, stood wide-eyed, half-afraid and yet thrilled in every fiber.

"It was splendid," she said. "They can't be beaten."

Her companion seemed to shiver a little. "Yes," she said, "perhaps it was, but I wish it was over. It would appeal to you differently, my dear, if you had a husband at one of those horses' heads."

For a moment Maud Barrington wondered whether it would, and then, when a red flame flickered out towards the team, felt a little chill of dread. In another second the smoke whirled about them, and she moved backward, choking, with her companion. The teams, however, went on, and came out, frantic with fear, on the farther side. The men when I led them afterwards wondered how they kept their grip on the horses' heads. Then it was that while the machines swung round and other men ran to help. Winston, springing from the driving seat, found Dane amid the swaying, plunging medley of beasts and men.

"If you can't find hook or clevice, cut the trace," he said. "It can't burn the plow, and the devils are out of hand now. The fire will jump these furrows, and we've got to try again."

In another minute four maddened beasts were careering across the prairie with portions of their trappings banging about them, while one man who was badly kicked sat down gray in face and gasping, and the fire rolled up to the ridge of foam, checked, and then sprang across it here and there.

"I'll take one of those lad's places," said Dane. "That fellow can't hold the breaker straight, Courthorne."

It was a minute or two later when he flung a breathless lad away from his plow, and the latter turned upon him hoarse with indignation.

"I raced Stapleton for it. Loose your hold, confound you. It's mine," he said.

Dane turned and laughed at him as he signed to one of the Ontario hired men to take the near horse's head.

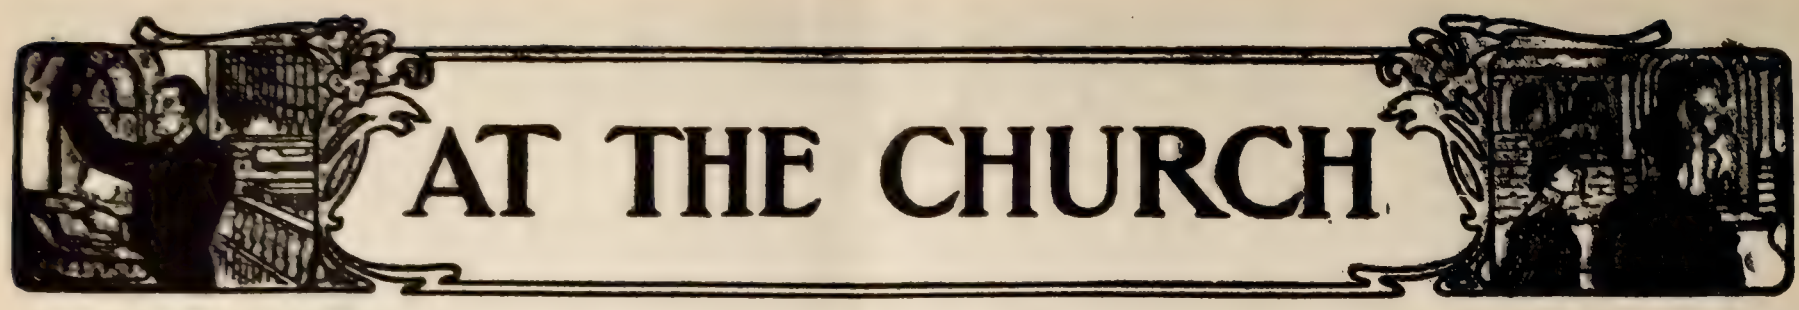
"You're a plucky lad, and you've done what you could," he said. "Still, if you get in the way of a grown man now, I'll break your head for you."

He was off in another moment, crossed Winston, who had found fresh beasts, in his furrow, and had turned and doubled it before the fire that had passed the other barrier came close upon them. Once more the smoke grew blinding, and one of Dane's beasts went down.

"I'm out of action now," he said. "Try back. That team will never face it, Courthorne."

Winston's face showed very grim under the tossing flame. "They've got to. I'm going through," he said. "If the others are to stop it behind there, they must have time."

Then he and the husband of the woman who had spoken to Maud Barrington passed ont with the frantic team into the smoke that was streaked with flame.



"Good Lord!" said Dane, and added more as sitting on the horse's head he turned his tingling face from the fire.

It was some minutes before he and the hired man who came up loosed the fallen horse, and led it and its fellow back towards the last defenses the rest had been raising, while the first furrows checked but did not stay the conflagration. There he presently came upon the man who had been with Winston.

"I don't know where Courthorne is," he said. "The beasts bolted with us just after we'd gone through the worst of it, and I fancy they took the plow along. Any way, I didn't see what became of them, and don't fancy anybody would have worried much about them after being trampled on by a horse in the lumbar region."

Dane saw that the man was limping and white in face, and asked no more question. It was evident to him that Courthorne would

Sunday School Lesson

The Opening of the Door

The preaching of the gospel in the home of Cornelius in Cæsarea had given apostolic sanction to the reception of Gentiles into the church. The mixed character of the congregation in Antioch, which resulted from the preaching of the faith by the Jerusalem refugees, was the first experiment in attempting to mediate between Jews and Gentiles in the same group. It is apparent that neither of these events was regarded with favor by the conservatives of the Jerusalem church. They felt that the Jewish privileges were too sacred to be lightly passed over to men of foreign blood. The choice which God had made in earlier times had set the Jews apart from all others, so they insisted. And the efforts of some of the Christians to bridge the chasm and destroy the ancient line of separation were deemed not only unpatriotic but sacrilegious.

The Jerusalem Visitors.

Burning with this zeal to stop the inroads of the broader spirit, certain men made the journey from Jerusalem to Antioch representing themselves as clothed with the authority of the mother church, and insisted that the Jewish Christians in Antioch must separate themselves from the Gentiles and, indeed, that the Gentiles must conform to the Jewish law or else be excluded from Christian fellowship. The sudden appearance of this unauthorized committee and its abrupt demands must have caused no little astonishment and excitement among the Antioch disciples. We may be very sure that Paul, brief as had been his experience in the apostolic office, was in no mood to make such compromises with that Jewish spirit of prejudice from which he had happily been emancipated. We can well fancy with what indignation he rejected the demands of these zealous conformists and strove to preserve harmony in the community whose success was so largely due to his own untiring efforts.

The Controversy at Antioch.

It is equally clear that the Jerusalem committee was bitterly hostile to Paul's leadership in Antioch and to the wider views which he represented. We know enough of the charges which were made against him so freely in later days to understand the bitterness of their attack upon his position. He was no apostle, they insisted. He had never personally known Jesus; all that he knew of the faith he had learned from Peter and the rest in the short period of his visit in Jerusalem after his conversion, and much of that truth, they would add, he had apparently spoiled since he came away from the holy city. The controversy was heated and prolonged, and when no hope of settlement seemed possible it was decided by both parties that the matter should be referred to the church in Jerusalem. Perhaps this was the demand of the committee, and no doubt it was their hope that the superior numbers of conservatives in the mother church would overwhelm the rising movement toward equal rights for the Gentiles.

The Journey to Jerusalem.

The narrative which Luke has given in such graphic terms in Acts 15 is admirably interpreted on its inner side by Paul's own words in Galatians 1 and 2. In that remarkable autobiographical passage the apostle asserts that he owed nothing to the Jerusalem disciples. His gospel was not derived through them, but was given by the Lord direct to himself. He had never had sufficient acquaintance with Peter and the other apostles to gain from them anything of value. On the other hand, he asserted that they had recognized his apostolic position and his right to carry forward his ministry.

They started from Antioch for Jerusalem, Paul taking with him Titus, a young Greek who was one of the Gentile converts made on the first missionary journey. With him and Barnabas and the visitors from Jerusalem the journey was made slowly down the coast, passing through the cities of Phoenicia and them up to the highlands and through Samaria. This seems an unusual course, as a shorter and easier way would have been down the sea coast to Joppa and then to Jerusalem. But perhaps there were special reasons why Paul wished the Jerusalem brethren to see the character of the churches which had been planted in Samaria, beyond Jewish influence.

Paul's Visit to the Apostles.

On arrival in Jerusalem, Paul's admirable diplomacy at once manifested itself. He knew that if the matter were discussed in open session of the Jerusalem church, the conservatives might well out-vote him a hundred to one. He therefore repaired at once to the great apostles whose names were household words in all the churches. He went to Peter, to James, the brother of the Lord, and to John, and before them he laid the facts relating to his Gentile mission. He told them that he had gone first to the Jews, but when they declined to hear, he had boldly proclaimed the message to the Gentiles. They had listened, and considerable numbers of them had chosen the Christian life. Of such Titus was an admirable example, and Paul may well have taken this young Gentile Christian with him in these interviews. Why should such a man, representing the best Gentile life of the day, be compelled to learn and practice the numberless injunctions of the Jewish law in order to become a Christian? Paul could well urge the fact which Jesus had pointed out that even the Jews themselves had found the law burdensome and were accustomed to make all kinds of compromises with its observance, not touching it, as he said, with one of their fingers.

The Conference.

Such arguments won the day with the leaders of the Jerusalem church. The record of Paul's interview with them is given in Galatians 2:1-10. Probably Paul secured from James and Peter and John the promise that they would advocate his more catholic view of the rights of Gentile Christians when the matter came up for discussion. In the meantime the conservatives were busy spreading their doctrine of exclusiveness and fortifying themselves for the struggle which was impending. They did not propose to have the church caught unawares when Paul and Barnabas should present their side of the question and should plead for the new view of Gentile freedom.

The title of the lesson "The Council at Jerusalem" is a misnomer. There was no council held; it was a simple conference of the members of the church. The word "council" in the vocabulary of church history means a formal meeting in which delegates, vested with power to legislate, are gathered for official action. The days of councils were far in the future when the Jerusalem church gathered on that eventful day to hear the case which was then awakening such deep interest in the community.

Jewish Arguments.

It is probable that James, the brother of the Lord, as the foremost member of the church, acted as presiding officer. How large a representation of the church was present, we do not know. But a large number is indicated by the language of verse 12. The apostles did not have a deciding voice in the matter. It was a question to be submitted to the entire church, and before such an assembly Paul and Barnabas presented their case, rehearsing again, as they had done on their first arrival in Jerusalem, all the work that they had been permitted to do on the first missionary journey. They told of the results in the conversion not only of Jews but of Gentiles. Then we may be very sure, though the record is scanty, that the conservatives presented their ideas with force and vehemence. They belonged to the Phariseic section of the Jewish people, and though they had accepted Christianity, they had all the old prejudices of Judaism in their minds. To the Jews God had given the law and the prophets. He had chosen their nation above all others as the one guardian of his will, and with manifold wonders he had illuminated their history. Why should they cheaply barter away these privileges? They had no objection to Gentiles entering the church, but it was too much to ask that such entrance should be on other terms than their entrance first into the Jewish community as proselytes. This was little enough to exact from the unclean and hated heathen, whom in their souls the Jews held in such execration. Thus the debate went on, and we may believe it was a scene of intense excitement with the result far from clear.

Peter's Speech.

At that moment Peter arose, and perhaps Paul and Barnabas had long waited with anxiety for his words. He pointed out how some years before God had chosen him to speak the first message to the Gentiles. The vision at Joppa made clear to him the fact that there was no difference between the two classes. Both must be saved, if at all, not by the works of the Jewish law but by the grace of God revealed in Christ. He was, therefore, of opinion that Paul's view was right, and that they should lay no burden upon the Gentiles beyond the obligation of faith and obedience. Again Barnabas and Paul spoke of their work among the Gentiles in proof of the value of such discipleship, and no doubt again and again the excited guardians of the older orthodoxy uttered their protests against such breaking down of divine distinctions and such dangerous modernism as the Antioch idea represented.

At last the decisive moment came. The question must be submitted to the assembly. After a free discussion, in which all had been permitted to participate, it was necessary that some conclusion should be reached. It could hardly be true that Paul was confident as to the outcome. He must still have felt that the chances of gaining his point were very modest. Even the words of Peter and probably also of John had not completely convinced the assembly. Would they vote down the measure which he proposed and set back the progress of faith for another generation? That was the question which hung trembling upon the decision of that moment.

The Decision of James.

The decision came, however, in a way which no one could have expected. And it is one of the most astonishing incidents in the history of New Testament Christianity. It was the duty of James, the Lord's brother, the saintliest and most revered disciple in Jerusalem, to speak the final word and put the question to the assembly. All knew his staunch adherence to Jewish practices. It was the tradition in the early church that so saintly was his life and so deep the regard in which he was held by Jews and Christians alike that he was even permitted to wear the garments reserved for the priesthood. Certainly no one could expect him to lean to the broader view, although they might well anticipate his perfectly impartial bearing.

It was at that moment that he uttered the words which changed the whole course of Christian history. With that authority which lay not in office but in his own personal holiness and in his intimate relation to the Master, he took the entire question out of the hands of the assembly and decided it himself in those wonderful words, "I, therefore, decide that we trouble not them which from among the Gentiles turn to God; but that we write unto them that they abstain from heathen polutions which are especially hateful to Jews; and with this conduct on their part we shall rest content." It is difficult to conceive the spirit of devout and astonishing thankfulness in which Paul and the men of the broader view must have heard this decision. From it there was no appeal. It opened the new door of access to that wide and waiting Gentile world which lay ever more upon the heart of the great apostle. He recognized the reasonableness of James' request that such heathen customs as the eating of food which had been offered in idol temples, the sin of fornication, whether of personal impurity or of marriage within the prohibited degrees prescribed by the Jewish law, and all use of blood which to the Jews was practically obnoxious because of their view that the blood was the seat of life should be abandoned. And he was willing to incorporate these requests in the message sent out to all the mixed and Gentile churches.

Judas and Silas.

This happy decision having been reached, the Jerusalem church did not content itself with the mere preparation of letters embodying the decision, but chose two of its own representatives, Judas and Silas, or Silvanus, who were evidently men of great ability, able to speak with some of the authority which the situation demanded. These men accompanied Paul and Barnabas back to Antioch bearing the letters which brought the good news from the conference. Their message was received with the utmost joy by the Antioch brethren, and in the period which ensued the work went forward wth fresh vigor.

Paul the Liberator.

Thus Paul's true function in the church as the apostle to the Gentiles and the vindicator of Christian liberty was established. No doubt the victory had been achieved by the sore discomfiture of the conservative members of the Jerusalem church. To them Paul represented a reckless and heretical tendency which they felt to be the most threatening of all influences disturbing the peace of the church. Nor were they satisfied with the decision reached. Later New Testament history shows how zealously they pursued their task of saving Christianity from Paul's liberalism which they felt threatened the very foundations of the faith. No heretic was ever more hated nor pursued with greater invective than the apostle. In every field they followed his work with misrepresentations of his character and teaching and with constant efforts to block the progress of his evangel. And yet Paul went forward with calm and unfaltering trust in the greatness of that cause to which he had dedicated his life, which was above all mere limitations of rank or country, school or creed. And history has shown which of the two, Paul or the zealous and alarmed conservatives of Jerusalem, were in the right.

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS SERIES. V. "AT THE CROSS"

Topic: May 10. John 19:16-27; Luke 23:39-49.

Meaning of the Cross.

"At the cross, at the cross, where I first saw the light." These are old familiar words, going back to early days of childhood. In fact we are so familiar, and have been familiar so long, with the fact that Jesus died upon a cross, and that in this death we catch a vision of the "life of light," that we may be prone to forget the full meaning of the cross. The death of Jesus was the logical ending of the kind of life he led. With the eyes of a prophet he saw it coming and prayed God that the cup might not be his to drink. He did not want to die. He was as fond of life, of flowers and birds and waters, and people, as anyone could be. But with the courage of a hero he walked knowingly into the jaws of death when he saw that he had to choose between this and the surrender of his attitude toward men. He was one of that rare class of people who say, "I'd rather die than give up my principles." Jesus was a physician to human souls. He was an alopathic physician. He gave strong medicine. Read his denunciation of the Pharisees. He was a physician who dealt with causes rather than effects.

Caused Helpfulness.

Jesus went down into the roots of people's lives and found out when was wrong, and then told them. This always means taking up a cross. It is easy to deal with effects. It is easy to take a drunken man home. Another drunken man will try to do that. It is harder to fight saloons and the man's inclinations. At no time does sin appear darker than when it causes people to hate those who are really trying to help them most, i.e., with something more than surface help. For the completion of one's reward one must wait, as Jesus did, until after death.

The Meaning of Eternal Life.

This is the true meaning of eternal life; to so live this life that it becomes eternal life already; to give this brief fragmentary life the quality that the life beyond the gates of death will have. Too many people today act as if death were going to end all. They compromise with their principles. They sell their birth right to be sons of God, for wealth, for pleasure, for power for the things that end when death ends. Jesus triumphed over death because he lived those things which were eternal. He had no place to lay his head, but he found rest. He met death upon a cross, but he found life. Salvation consists in willing actively to live the kind of life that Jesus lived. And the eternal life is the kind of life that Jesus lived. Says Christian when he has seen the cross, "He has given me rest by his sorrow and life by his death."

PRAYER MEETING

ALL MEN MADE ONE IN CHRIST.

Topic, May 19. Eph. 2:11—3:13.

The section of Ephesians selected for the lesson of this week has vital interest for the student of race questions. The prejudice of Jew against Gentile and of Gentile against Jew is matched by the race prejudices of the present day. The Chinaman is perfectly satisfied that he is a superior man and that the western peoples are barbarians. The Japanese may borrow mechanical devices from Europe and America, but he would not have any one believe that he thereby confesses the superiority of the white man. The Hindu has a lordly contempt for the upstart nations of the West that are proclaiming themselves as the possessors of the highest culture. Was not Hindu culture old when these nations were born? We are quite familiar with Anglo-Saxon pride of race. We have no doubt that the world has not the slightest inkling of what a real man is unless it has beheld our greatness. With this sense of race importance goes race friction. There would be no trouble if the other fellow had the gumption to accept the place we assign to him and to revere us according to our own valuation of ourselves. We have no serious quarrel with our dogs, for they accept gratefully the favors we bestow and enter no complaint on account of social discriminations. But when no one is willing to play the part of the dog, conflict is bound to follow the contact of race with race.

In order that all men may be one in Christ it is not necessary that the customs and manners of European humanity be adopted throughout the world. Paul made war upon no customs except those that were fundamentally at variance with Christianity. Jew and Gentile were free to live their lives in harmony with the best they had received by inheritance. He adapted his teaching to the experience of the hearers. Now if we will only follow the example of the great apostle, we shall be more useful disciples of our Lord and we shall have more hope for the world. In their long national life the Chinese have developed manners and customs differing from any with which we are familiar, but as useful to the Chinaman as our manners and customs are to us. If he is a queer fellow in our eyes, let us remember that we are queer to him. We may expect him to make such changes as go with a scientific knowledge of the world and the supremacy of Christ in his heart. These changes will be revolutionary enough. If he becomes a Christian, he will fight disease with modern weapons instead of drums and incantations. He will lose the superstitious fear that keeps him from developing the material resources of his country. He will put into the ethical teachings of Confucius a deeper meaning than they have ever had. On the other hand, it may be that the Chinese Christians will teach us how to reverence old age. We have become Christian in part. Perhaps the world will have a chance to know the meaning of our holy faith when there are great churches in India, Japan, China, Turkey, Africa, and the islands of the sea. Where we are weak, the Christians of these lands may be strong. We ought to rejoice that other men are not as we are and this we will do unless we are blinded by ignorance and prejudice.

We have seen that oneness in Christ is consistent with integrity of racial type. The meeting place of Jew and Greek was Christ. Neither yielded to what was merely a peculiarity of the other. Both had to change in thought and conduct in order to come up to the measure of the new faith. Neither Jerusalem nor Athens nor Rome lost its significance. Men were in the church because they believed in Christ and were obedient unto him. Paul preached not a Jewish gospel, not a Gentile gospel, but a gospel for the world. We cannot hope to preach a universal gospel if we try to confine our preaching to our own people. If we take the world as our field and study the message in the presence of all races and all conditions of culture, we may with reason expect deliverance from local and racial crankiness. Our Lord is by right the ruler of nations. We cannot make him a local sovereign without detracting from his majesty. Therefore our missionary activity must not be the expression of race pride, but of a sense of universal brotherhood. The other man does not look like us and he does not act like us, but he is our brother and he must not be allowed to remain in ignorance of our elderly Brother.

The Book World

MIND, RELIGION, AND HEALTH. By Robert Macdonald. The recent growth of interest in various forms of psychic treatment of diseases has been emphasized by the Emmanuel movement in the city of Boston. The pastors of Emmanuel Episcopal Church, especially Dr. Worcester, have been remarkably blessed in their efforts to relieve suffering within a rather wide range of experiment. Naturally something of a literature has grown out of this effort. Probably the most important books on the subject are "The Psychic Treatment of Nervous Disorders," by Dr. Paul Du Bois of the University of Berne, and the works of Dr. A. T. Schofield of London, England, especially "The Mental Factor in Medicine or The Force of the Mind." Dr. MacDonald, the author of the present volume, is the minister of the Washington Avenue Church, Brooklyn, and the book consists of a series of Sunday evening addresses delivered in his church. After some introductory discussions, such as the mind's power over our ills, the power of the sub-conscious self, the demand for health and its realization, chapters which are based largely upon the work of Hudson, Trine and Matthews, the author undertakes to point out the significance of the Emmanuel movement as resting not upon the fantastic foundations which Christian Science assumes but upon the genuine facts of mental experience and the well known truths which science has disclosed of the control of the body by the mind. It is a book that will give many interesting suggestions to ministers and Christian workers regarding a perfectly legitimate feature of the gospel. It is evident that health and not sickness is the ideal of Christian faith. At the same time any doctrine of healing must have its values and its limits. The Emmanuel movement appears to recognize both. Its aids to health are freely at the service of any who desire them, both those who suffer and those who would help their fellowmen. Dr. MacDonald speaks from experience in real application of this principle to common cases of sickness and morbid states of mind. (New York, Funk & Wagnalls Company, pp. 368. $1.30, net.)

SOCIAL DUTIES FROM THE CHRISTIAN POINT OF VIEW, By Charles Richmond Henderson. This latest of the Constructive Bible Studies series, is a text-book on "social duties" intended for use in the advanced department of the Sunday-school. Professor Henderson here writes in a style expressive of intimate and fatherly interest. A few sentences from the introductory chapter will indicate the purpose of the book: "It has been discovered that the youth who finds it simply impossible to follow the fortunes of Saul, Samuel and Peter for the fiftieth round, will attend regularly where a practical leader compels every member to confront at every lesson some immediate task within his power. A person old enough to choose for himself, and serious enough to do any real thinking, demands science and law, contemporary fact, rather than insipid anecdote and threadbare exhortation." "The articles which follow are intended to furnish some hints for Sunday lessons for groups of young people who can not be held together by the conventional methods of teaching the Bible. They will demand serious study and considerable knowledge on the part of the leader. Yet an earnest man with modest equipment of books, can accomplish good results, if he will set the entire group at work investigating the questions, reading the books cited, and discussing situations in the neighborhood, which are of moral interest and demand moral choices." Some of the subjects discussed are: "Social Duties," relating to the family, the material conditions of family life, to neglected children, to workingmen, in rural communities. "Urban Life," "Public Health," "Economic Interests," "Educational Agencies," "Duties of the Church," "The Municipal Government." "Social Duties relating to the Business class and the Leisure class," "Rights and Responsibilities of Great Corporations," etc. These studies were published in the Biblical World in 1907 and 1908. (The University of Chicago Press. $1.25, net.)

TRAVELS IN THE FAR EAST, by Ellen N. H. Peck. This is one of the most attractive books of travel that has come to our notice this season. The writer is an informed and experienced traveler who has written the narrative of a leisurely and observing journey made through Egypt, India, Buhrma, Ceylon, Java, Siam, China, Japan, Manchuria, and Korea. The descriptions are informing and often vivid. The writer has given sufficient personal experiences to enliven the story. At the same time there is always some hint of the historical background which adds interest for the reader who is not fully informed regarding the countries visited. Mrs. Peck has illustrated her book with a profusion of splendid photographs which make it an exceedingly artistic production. We have seen no finer use of photographic illustrations than this book contains. They run beyond two hundred in number. The letter press is almost perfect and the book-maker has done his work admirably.

If there is a single delinquency in the volume, it is in the failure to take sufficient account of that wonderful feature of eastern life today, the presence and influence of Christian missions. It is of course true that the ordinary unobserving traveler sees but little of missionary work. But Mrs. Peck is not a traveler of that sort. She indeed mentions the missions and missionaries on a number of occasions, but, as it seems to us, does not quite preserve a sense of the significance which their presence has added to the Orient in our time.

The book is a sort of narrative which one dislikes to leave until it is quite finished, and the illustrations add attractiveness to the volume which certainly contains more than its price value in substantial and entertaining records. (New York: Thomas Y. Crowell and Co., 1909; Pp. 349, illustrated, $3.00 net.)

CIVICS AND HEALTH, By William H. Allen. This work is much more than a mere routine statement of factors connected with public health. It is a very vivid and illuminating story of the work which is now being attempted in dealing with children and indifferent citizens in reference to public health. The vast waste which the nation suffers because of insufficient attention to health laws is stated in terms which cannot be misunderstood. And the efforts which are now being made successfully to correct the errors out of which disease and bad morals arise are described. Special attention is given to such maladies as those commonly observed in school children, both of the poorer classes and of the well-to-do. Among these diseases are mouth breathing, usually due to adenoids; preventable infectious diseases; the evils resulting from eye-strain in children, malnutrition, deformities, and inattention to the teeth. Other matters are discussed which are directly related to public health and should be given serious attention by parents, teachers, and the guardians of the public. The work being done both in this country and Europe to remedy evil conditions is described, and ample instructions are given, the observance of which would be of incalculable benefit to any family or community. The story of the fight for clean milk, for humanized medicine, and for the suppression of alcoholism and the evils that arise from the use of tobacco is sure to be of interest to all who have the future of the nation upon their hearts. This book cannot be too highly commended to all who are concerned with child culture and with physical and moral health. And who is outside of this circle? (Boston: Ginn and Company. Pp. 403. $1.25 net.)

THE EDUCATIONAL IDEAL IN THE MINISTRY; the Lyman Beecher Lectures at Yale University in the year 1908. By William Herbert Perry Faunce. Of these addresses the author says, "They contain no information on any subject; but are designed to give —what is perhaps the only gift one man can make to another—a point of view." That point of view is briefly set forth in the following words which at the same time illustrate the vivid style of President Faunce: "Many ministers today have a dim and baffled feeling that their work is somehow not fully correlated with the life of the modern world. They stand like David when he had rejected Saul's armor and had not yet found his own, bravely facing the gigantic form, but uncertain as to the method of attack. They are striving to define their own calling afresh and adjust it to novel and rapidly changing conditions. Must the prophet decrease because the teacher has increased? The writer has attempted to show that the two spheres of preacher and teacher are closer and more vital than has yet been recognized; and that the educational conception of the ministry will be especially fruitful in our time." The chapter headings tell of the interesting and timely character of the book. They are: "The Place of the Minister in Modern Life" "The Attitude of Religious Leaders Toward New Truth," "Modern Uses of Ancient Scripture," "The Demand for Ethical Leadership," "The Direction of Religious Education," "The Relation of the Church and the College," "The Education of the Minister by His Task." To the man who feels the peculiar problems confronting the church of our day, this work by President Faunce will bring illumination and inspiration. (The MacMillan Company, 1908. $1.25, net.)

"THE HOUSE OF RIMMON," by Henry Van Dyke. Dr. Van Dyke's literary work covers a wide field. But hitherto he has ventured only slightly into the realm of poetry. The present work is a poetic drama in four acts, dealing with the biblical episode of Naaman, the Syrian captain who sought cleansing at the hands of Elisha, the prophet of Israel. The characters of the play include Benhaded the king, Rezon the high priest of the House of Rimmon, Naaman captain of the armies of Damascus, Tsarpi his wife, and Ruahmah the captive maid of Israel. From the slight material afforded by the biblical narrative a story of considerable dramatic power is constructed. Naaman's policy is that of resistance to the encroachments of Assyria, but the high priest, who has been offered large bribes by the Assyrians, bends the unfaithful Tsarpi to his counsels and through her treachery Naaman is stricken with his lingering disease after draining a poisoned cup. The love and devotion of Ruahmah the captive maid forms a foil to those plots. The captain is informed of the prophet's power, makes the journey to Samaria, and at last wins complete victory over his foes both in the house of the god Rimmon and in the field. Whether the play has dramatic possibilities is questionable. But as literature its charm is indisputable; its fidelity to the general facts of history is sufficient; and its appeal to the reader is strong. (New York, Charles Scribner's Sons. 1908. Pp. 121, $1.00 net.)

THE ORGANIZED BIBLE CLASS, by J. H. Bryan, Superintendent of the Adult Department of Bible-School Work in Missouri. The volume is a bound book of methods on this growing feature of the modern Sunday-school. Mr. Bryan has had large and varied experience which he gathers up into a helpful text. The City Problem of Getting the Public's Attention. Shall We Advertise Religion?

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN

We have been observing lately that the churches are adopting means of bringing their message to public notice which equal in ingenuity those adopted by the business houses. The church has been forced in every age to adapt itself to the changing social environment. Once there were no newspapers and no printed page. Gossip was a social necessity and the news of the doings of the church traveled with other news free of charge. When the printed page became more common, men gossiped less.

Now it has come about that in the city flat-dwellers do not know each other. They do not need to know their neighbors to have the gossip of the world which comes in the morning and evening papers with an occasional special edition besides. Now when the merchant would reach the people he cannot depend upon the news of his bargains to travel by word of mouth. He is compelled to buy display advertising and with picture and bold-face type tell the story of his business.

Professional Ethics Against Advertising.

The professions, being the most conservative part of our population, have been the last to hold out against modern methods of publicity. The physicians, through their organization, formulate a code of "ethics" which has one of the first words of its decalogue, "Thou shalt not advertise." Other professions without the same compactness of organization, enforce the principle as well as possible.

What shall be the attitude of the church? Shall it be dignified and let men seek it? Or shall it adopt all modern methods of publicity and seek men? The answer to those questions depends upon the ideals of our religion. If we are to be ascetics like John the Baptist, we can afford to wait for the multitude to hunt us up in the wilderness. If, however, we have the passion for souls which was in Christ Jesus, we shall find our chief life interest "to seek and to save that which was lost."

Churches Employ Diverse Methods.

The methods of church advertising are about as diverse as any other kind of advertising. The other day we noted men scattered all over the city at the noon hour advertising a divine of the Church of the Nazarene and promising to show the public "The Old-time Religion." On another day men were all over the city announcing a sermon by Rev. A. C. Dixon of the Moody Church on "The Blood Atonement." If this sort of religious ware is worth the advertising, how much the more should we feel an interest in commending the view of religion we hold to the public.

Probably no medium for advertising the church is more favorable than the secular press. It speaks with authority to the multitude. It goes into practically every home. It is read more generally than the higher grade journals. The secular press has, of course, often criticized the church. It has written up false ministers. It has garbled our sermons. On the other hand, have we always been as friendly as we should have been? If we had furnished carefully prepared excerpts of our sermons they would have gone into print in place of what the reporter remembered. Most of our churches wait for the reporter to find out about the new building enterprise or about the new method of church work. What wonder that the facts have not been properly stated. Intelligent and friendly coöperation with the great newspaper offices would give a different flavor to the reports given the public. Friendly reports of the church's activities in the secular press is one of the most valuable means of church advertising.

Newspapers Not Always Accessible.

There are many times, however, when we cannot command the news columns of the daily paper. There are times, too, when we need to express more vigorously our interest in the spiritual welfare of our fellow-men. Then the paid advertisement is used most effectively. The Moody Church has often bought a column in an evening paper for a short sermon by the pastor. Other churches have advertised their special services in the theater column. These efforts convey to the population around the church the news that everybody is wanted. Most churchmen are ignorant of the widespread feeling that the churches are exclusive and aristocratic. An advertising campaign goes far to correct this popular feeling.

Next to the newspaper, the mail is the most valuable advertising medium. The mail finds a man alone, just where the zealous preacher would like to find him. There are many other appeals in the mail of every sort. Some are cast into the waste-basket without being read. Where the point is presented briefly and forcibly it will command attention. The preacher's habit must be completely reversed. In the sermon he prepares his way by argument and illustration for half an hour and then presents his climax. He dares to use this method for he has his audience where they cannot escape for a half hour and he feels secure.

Advertisement Not Like Sermon.

When he writes church advertising this method must be reversed. Instead of saying as in sermon-style: "Believing that music was a part of primitive worship and that it has been useful through the ages in directing our religious motives, we have a very pleasant announcement to make to you; this announcement is that the choir of our church will give on next Sunday evening a song recital"—he would better say like the department store "ad": "SONG RECITAL! Wesley Ave. Church, Sunday evening at 7:30 p. m. Seats Free!" In the first case the busy reader might consign the wordy invitation to the waste-basket. In the second, the climax comes first, and if there is any hope of enlisting the reader, he receives the whole message.

Occasional Canvass Profitable.

Every church ought to conduct an occasional canvass of its neighborhood. The names of the non-churchgoers would furnish one mailing list. The names of the adherents of the church would furnish another. Why not send the church calendar to the whole list occasionally? If one activity of the church did not appeal another might. A mimeograph letter from the pastor on a religious subject might occasionally do good. A preacher ought to sell a set of commentaries and buy a mimeograph or a printing press, if there is no other way.

Perhaps the least effective advertising is the dodger circulated promiscuously. It looks cheap; all too often it is wasted in the distribution. Yet the church might organize a messenger system through the Sunday-school for distributing tracts and cards at the door. The little messenger of the church will be received favorably and his cards will be read. This is one of the cheapest means of gaining publicity. A church printing press makes it still cheaper.

Advertising Now a Profession.

Advertising is now a profession, with its well-established rules. The principles of this advertising are as often disregarded by the church as by anybody, for church folks are still amateurs in this great field. Some of these principles ought to become a part of our advertising creed.

The first thing necessary is to have goods of merit. Money spent on advertising inferior articles is wasted money in the long run. A man with a certain line of photographic goods can advertise year after year if these are really the best. The best soap can be safely exploited year after year. Let a preacher fear to advertise a sermon which has no message but is simply a bouquet of oratorical daisies. Let him not present less than his best. But if he feels a new note needs to be sounded in the community life, a real sermon cannot have too much announcement. A church cannot afford to feature music in their advertising, unless it is unusually good. Only the best deserves to be advertised.

Honesty Invaluable in Advertising.

Another principle in advertising is honesty. We cannot afford to misstate or to overstate. The department store that prints a price too low sells a stock of goods at a loss rather than risk arousing popular disfavor. The store that advertises cotton as silk is wasting its money. The church must be temperate in its statements, in sending out advertising, or it will do more harm than good. Mere bragging will not take the place of solid facts.

Another principle of advertising is persistency. Sometimes a church makes a spasmodic advertising campaign. It usually complains of lack of results. The church that adopts an advertising policy for the year and puts the expense in the budget will not complain about results. Why do many of us buy ———'s soap? Because from childhood we have seen the advertising; at last our inertia was overcome and we bought the first cake. We continued to use it because it was good soap. The church must not expect to succeed with advertising on a less vigorous and persistent policy.

Advertising a Means of Saving the Lost.

Foreign missionaries on their return justly complain of the lack of enterprise in the home church. While they go to the bazaars to preach to a crowd we ring a bell and preach to empty benches. That accounts for the fact that foreign churches have a higher percentage of growth than our own. Let us take as our motto, "All things to all men." If we dare not adopt such sensational advertising methods as Isaiah employed, we ought at least to express our interest in the spiritual welfare of our fellow-men by methods that will be effective to win them to a like faith in Jesus, who thought his chief work was to seek and to save the lost.

CHICAGO CHURCH NOTES.

Nelson Trimble of the Christian Center, Baltimore, visited our ministers' meeting recently. He had been visiting in Iowa and stopped off here to study institutional church work.

Our ministers attended the Peace Congress held in our city recently. Many distinguished visitors spoke.

The Pennsylvania railroad announces a rate to the Centennial convention at Pittsburg of $14.25 for the round trip from Chicago. As this rate is fixed by the Central Passenger Association it will doubtless be offered by all the roads entering the Centennial city. It is a fare and a half at the prevailing rates.

The Protestant churches of Austin are arranging to build a hospital to be managed by these churches. George A. Campbell is chairman of the committee. The ladies of the Christian church served a dinner to one hundred leading citizens recently as they discussed the project.

The meeting held at Irving Park recently was ended abruptly by the storms that came last week in Chicago, but thirty were added to the church; twenty-five by confession of faith.

Pastor Mullins has resigned at Oak Park, preaching his farewell sermon on May 2.

O. F. Jordan and C. G. Kindred attended state board meeting at Bloomington, on Tuesday of last week.

The Second district convention will be held in the Memorial Church on May 20, 21. Among the visiting speakers will be P. C. Macfarlane of the Brotherhood Movement, A. W. Fortune of Cincinnati, G. W. Muckley of the Church Extension Board and Johnson Myers president of the Baptist City Society. The state speakers touring the state will speak, among them being Bert Doan, Clarence Depew and H. H. Peters. The programs will be distributed at the churches soon. With such an attractive program we ought to rally out our district in unusual force. The men's clubs of Chicago will have a special invitation to hear Mr. Macfarlane.

Charles Pearce of Ohio has been called to the West Pullman Church. He comes to us with splendid recommendations. He expects to pursue some studies in the University of Chicago while at West Pullman.

Church Starts With Clean Slate

Notable Achievement in Raising Big Church Debt by Clever Methods—Champaign (Ill.) News of May 3, Tells Story.

Interest yesterday at University Place Church of Christ centered in the "Clean Slate" which had not yet all been "cleaned." Some months ago the workers, led by Pastor Fisher set out to pay off all indebtedness against the church by the time of their centennial convention at Pittsburg in October. A blackboard was provided, three feet by ten; this was divided into a sufficient number of squares, each representing $20 to cover the entire debt, about $5,800. Two weeks ago it was found they were still $2,000 short. Sunday, May 2, was set as "Clean Slate" day; the work was organized. Each evening for the two weeks the workers from the eighteen sections of the church community in Champaign and Urbana met at the church to report, for prayer and planning. Each day the squares were gradually painted white, "cleaned," and yet when the appointed day came twenty-eight of them, representing $540, remained black. Yesterday morning the minister referred to the campaign; led us all to see the advantage of getting out of debt, and called for pledges, and when all were in there was a margin for sinking fund of almost $400. This insures all indebtedness being paid October 1. When the young man wielding the brush painted the last square white the congregation burst into applause, and the "Clean Slate," cleaned now indeed, was borne in triumph from the room. University Place Congregation has had a remarkable growth and this movement will be of great advantage to them in making possible the development of plans for greatly enlarging the scope of their work.

The G. L. Wharton Home for the Children of Missionaries

After long and careful consideration final action has been taken looking to the opening of the Wharton Memorial Home at Hiram this fall. A beautiful tract of nearly twelve acres of land, fronting on West Church street, in the southwest part of the village has been purchased. This property is the highest ground in the village. A row of magnificent maple trees extends along the front. The location is all that could be desired for beauty. Because of its situation on a sandy knoll, no more healthful spot can be found in a region noted for its healthfulness. It is two blocks from the public school, three blocks from the college campus, and about the same distance from the church, yet it is far enough to one side to afford needed quiet and seclusion. The ample grounds offer opportunity for all kinds of fruit, a garden, chickens, and a cow or two if desired. It seems an ideal place for a real home for the children who must return to this country and remain here during the school age, while their parents continue in missionary service in heathen lands.

For some months the question of size and style of building for the Home has been under consideration. A happy solution to the problem for the present has been reached in the purchase of this land, since the ten-room house now on the property will be sufficient for immediate needs. A little later, when it is required, a permanent building will be erected to meet the growing demands. The ample frontage will make this possible without disturbing the house now in the lot. This policy was pursued by the Congregationalists in providing such a home for the children of their missionaries at Oberlin, Ohio.

We are sure that many of our missionaries will feel the lifting of a burden of anxiety upon reading this announcement. The opening of the Home this fall will mark one more forward step by the Disciples of Christ before their Centennial.

There still remains the necessity of securing a large sum to complete the fund of $25,000 needed for founding this work on a self-sustaining basis. No better investment can be made in the Lord's work. Those who are able to contribute large sums should do so. All who are interested in foreign missions and are missionaries ought to help according to their ability. Address THE WHARTON MEMORIAL HOME, Hiram, Ohio.

Notes From the Foreign Society

The churches in Woodford county, Ky., will in the future support their own missionary on the foreign field. This is a decided step in advance.

M. D. Adams, missionary of the Foreign Society in India, and its oldest missionary is just getting over a painful surgical operation recently performed.

The prospects for Children's Day were never before so bright for a great offering. All the signs point to an increase of not less than $10,000 in the receipts.

The churches of Columbus, Ohio, combine their offerings and will in the future have their own representative on the foreign field. The living-link column continues to grow in length.

Last week the Foreign Society received another gift on the Annuity Plan. The total gifts for the year now amount to $16,120, an increase of $11,720. A number of other gifts will come in before the close of the missionary year.

The church at Pasadena, Cal., becomes a living-link in the Foreign Society. F. M. Dowling is the minister. This makes nine living-links in the state of California. California is coming to be one of our great missionary states.

Sunday, May 2, Secretary F. M. Rains assisted in the dedication of the great new church at Winchester, Ky. The property cost $74,000, and about $29,000 was raised to cover the $28,000 debt. This is one of the best missionary churches in our brotherhood. The new church building in no way interfered with the usual large missionary gifts. J. H. MacNeill is the minister.

The Foreign Society has received $22,147 in cash and pledges for the two colleges—one at Vigan, Philippine Islands, and the other at Bolengi, Africa. The total amount required is $50,000. Of this sum R. A. Long proposes to give $10,000 if we can raise $40,000 besides by August 1. The time is growing short. It is hoped that the friends will make a note of this. We must secure $17,853 for this special purpose in the next three months.

During the month of April the Foreign Society received $37,544, a gain of $4,430 over the corresponding month, 1908. The churches as churches gave $31,404, a gain of $3,636. There was also a gain of seventy-nine contributing churches. The total receipts for the first seven months of the current missionary year amounted to $118,895, a gain of $25,179 over the corresponding time last year. The churches as churches have given $79,794, a gain of $9,659. There has been a gain from every source of income except bequests, which show a loss of $4,118.

WITH THE WORKERS

A new building is to be erected by the church at Santa Clara, Cal.

J. M. Grimes, Tarkio, Mo., has accepted a call to the church at Bethany, Mo.

Benj. L. Smith, Cincinnati, Ohio, preaches for the church at Salina, Kan., May 9 and 16.

Miss Adelaide Gail Frost is to speak at the Ohio State Convention, at Elyria, May 24-27.

The church at Oklahoma City, Okla., is preparing for the coming of Scoville and his helpers for a meeting.

A. J. Bush and song evangelist Brady are in a meeting at Wichita Falls, Texas, with a very hopeful outlook.

Sunday, May 16, is the day set for the dedication of the new church at Lincoln, Neb. F. M. Rains will be in charge.

C. W. Cooper, who has been pastor of the Central Park Church, Topeka, Kan., has accepted a call to the church at Holton, Kan.

Harry G. Hill has entered upon his third year with the Third Church, Indianapolis, Ind., and with a most promising outlook.

Edward Clutter, evangelist, closed a short meeting at Murray, Neb., April 24, in which there were twenty-seven additions to the church.

Offerings for home missions at Minier, Ill., $22.32; their Easter offering was $20. These are the largest offerings at this time of year in the history of the church. W. W. Walston is the pastor.

Marion Stevenson, national superintendent of Bible-schools, recently spent two weeks in Indiana in attendance upon district conventions in the interest of the Bible-school work in Indiana.

The church at Columbia, Mo., has brought its Home Missionary offering to $270; surpassing their apportionment by $70. The pastor, M. A. Hart, writes that they expect to make it $300, thus becoming a living-link in the home work.

O. L. Hamilton and his helpers are in a meeting at Fort Scott, Kan., under the direction of the state board. Forty-five additions the first ten days.

W. H. Bagby, Missoula, Mont., is preaching the following series of Sunday evening sermons, during the month of May: "A Fast Young Man," "A Model Young Man," "A Model Mother," "An Incorruptible Judge," and "A Romance of Lowly Life."

During the five years of the ministry of S. W. Nay at Kansas City, Kan., the congregation has grown from 150 to 626. They have raised more than $200,000 and led in the organization of two new churches in the city, which now have pastors.

A building to cost $35,000, with an auditorium that will seat 1,000 people, Sunday-school room seating 600, is being erected by the church at Greeley, Colo., where A. E. Dubber is minister. They expect to complete the work during the present summer.

At the recent meeting of the Kansas Christian Ministers' Institute two papers were read on "Union of the Disciples and Baptists," one by Thomas R. Young, pastor of the First Baptist Church, Topeka, and the other by O. L. Lyon. The convention voted to have both of these published.

An attractive announcement of the commencement of William Woods College, May 27, has just been received. They are to be twenty-seven regular graduates; twelve graduates from special courses. The baccalaureate sermon will given by F. W. Allen, Paris, Mo., and the address to the undergraduates by W. A. Fite, Fulton, Mo.

The First District Oklahoma Christian Missionary Society will hold its annual convention at Enid, May 12 and 13. Addresses are to be made by O. L. Lyon, President Zollars, Prof. F. H. Marshall, S. H. Horne, George Weimer, H. S. Gilliam, William LeMay, W. H. Kindred, and others. Randolph Cook, Enid, is president of the district.

A. F. Hensey, who is supported in his work at Bolengi, Africa, by the Euclid Avenue Church, Cleveland, O., will reach home about the 18th of May on his first furlough. No doubt he will be in great demand for addresses about this interesting work at Bolengi.

Scoville and helpers are in a meeting at North Yakima, Washington, where they dedicated a $57,000 church building April 24, with the amount pledged exceeding the indebtedness by $6,000. M. L. Rose, the pastor, has done a great work in this field. There were 201 professed conversions the first week of the meeting.

W. B. Craig, pastor of the Central Church, Denver, Colo., has been assisting W. B. Cleaver in a meeting at the Central Church, San Antonio, Texas. This is in return for the meeting in which Mr. Cleaver did the preaching at the Denver church. During Mr. Craig's absence from his pulpit it is being supplied by B. O. Aylesworth, president of the Colorado Agricultural College.

The Pacific Christian announces that L. P. Schooling closed his work with the church at Pullman, Wash., on Easter Sunday. In writing of this a member of the church says, "In losing Brother Schooling the Pullman church suffers the greatest loss in its history." We have known of the excellent work Mr. Schooling was doing in Pullman, a work that affected the life of the entire community.

A recent statement in the Christian Century concerning a union meeting of the ministers of the Baptist and Christian churches in St. Paul, calls out from Walter Scott Priest, Columbus, Ohio, the good announcement that the ministers of the two churches in that city have been meeting together for a year past. There are six ministers of each body, and the fellowship has been delightful. We should be glad to know of other places where this delightful plan is followed.

The seventh district convention of Oklahoma met with the Woodward Church, April 13, and 14. E. D. Hendrickson was president. Principal addresses were delivered by H. C. Gresham, G. W. McQuiddy and H. I. Bryant.

H. H. Cushing has closed his work at Gloversdale, N. Y., and accepted a call to the church at Watertown, where he began his work, May 2. The church at Watertown has a beautiful building erected in 1903, and in one of the best parts of the city of 30,000 inhabitants. It is mutually understood that the engagement between the church and their new minister is to be continued at least five years.

There is a growing desire among the schools in Indiana for the employment of a state superintendent of Bible-schools. The state Bible-school Board is in correspondence with a number of good men, one of whom will soon be employed. During Mr. Stevenson's attendance upon the conventions a very large number of the best schools in the state pledged their hearty support to the Bible-school man as soon as he was announced.

The church at El Paso, Texas, under the leadership of H. C. Robison, is making a fine record for regular healthful growth, and increasing efficiency. During the month of March there were fifteen additions to the church. During April five baptisms, seven reclamations, and five from other churches. "One of these is J. C. Francis, a strong preacher of twelve years experience." Mr. Robison is a thoroughly trained man, and is wielding a strong influence in directing the forces that determine the life of the city.

George B. Stewart, pastor at Warrensburg, Mo., is spending a few weeks in Colorado Springs.

The Stuart Street Church, Springfield, Ill., reports over 140 additions since the close of the Billy Sunday meetings. C. C. Sinclair is the pastor.

We are indebted to the courtesy of the Institute Tie for the excellent likeness of Evangelist Gipsy Smith and Mrs. Smith, printed in our issue of last week.

J. M. Lowe of Goodland, Kan., can assist in a meeting in his part of the state during June. Here is a good chance for some church to get a month's preaching by one of our strongest men.

Frank Thompson, pastor at Cairo, Ill., reports fourteen additions to the church at regular services during April, most of them adult confessions. The prayer-meetings, he says, are the largest in the history of the church.

Austin Hunter closed a meeting at Rockford, Ill., May 2. There were seventy-one additions, fourteen the last day. He says, "W. D. Ward is doing a fine work in Rockford and has the love and esteem of all the people. Mr. Hunter's next meeting is Baltimore, Md., Nelson Trimble, Pastor.

Des Moines ministers reported accessions to their churches May 2 as follows: University Place, two by letter; Grant Park, one by confession of faith, one by letter; Valley Junction, one by confession; Capitol Hill, one by letter, two confessions; Highland Park, one by letter, one confession.

The Disciples of Mississippi have chosen West Point as the location of the college they plan to establish. Jackson was the chief competitor of the victorious city. This is a praiseworthy enterprise for the brethren of that state. The founding of a college should mark a new epoch in their history.

The First Christian Church of Springfield, Ill., voted last Sunday to build a new church edifice and appointed a building committee. Both their Sunday-school and church congregation now tax the capacity of the old building, and besides, modern appointments are greatly needed for progressive work. We congratulate the pastor, F. W. Brenham, who built the beautiful house in Decatur, on the privilege of building another and we expect to see Springfield erect one of the best church buildings in the brotherhood.

Mr. S. M. Cooper of Cincinnati, president of the acting board of the American Christian Missionary Society, spent some days in Chicago during the past week in attendance at the Peace Congress. He was accompanied by Dean Rogers of the Law School of the University of Cincinnati. Mr. Cooper and Dean Rogers are members of the Walnut Hills Church in that city, of which A. W. Fortune is the pastor.

The congregation at Long Beach, Cal., has inaugurated the "merger service," a combination of the Sunday-school and morning worship. F. M. Rogers, the pastor, formerly of Springfield, Ill., West Side Church, having "tried out" the plan in Illinois believes it will succeed in California just as well. The combined service begins at 10 o'clock and closes at 12 o'clock and includes Bible study, preaching and communion. The Long Beach church has recently become a living-link in the Foreign Society.

W. F. Turner has finished three months of his new pastorate of the Central Church in Peoria, Ill. Audiences and interest have both gained steadily. Nineteen have been received into membership. The Bible-school recorded its largest attendance Easter with 329. Howett Street on that day had 229, their largest. It has been decided to organize Howett Street chapel into a Second Church before the Centennial convention. The new minister will be William Price, who has preached there for two years while in Eureka College where he will graduate in June. He is able and consecrated and will do a fine work. Evangelistic campaigns in both fields will be held this fall.

Telegrams

Cincinnati, Ohio, May 8.—Good reports from May offering. Many new living links. Churches doubling previous offerings. Stormy weather makes it necessary to follow offering heroically. Let every pulpit sound bugle blast for America next Sunday. Don't forget! Don't neglect! Don't fail!—H. A. Denton.

North Yakima, Wash., May 9.—Eighty-six this closing day of meeting; 594 in eighteen days of invitations. In every way the greatest meeting ever held in the Northwest; $3,660 pledged for current expenses for next year. Scoville without question our greatest evangelist and true to gospel, church and preacher. His helpers worthy of great praise. —Morton L. Rose, Pastor.

Red Oak, Iowa, May 9.—Meetings one week old, crowded houses. Forenoon and evening meetings were held in our opera house and the good people jammed it to the doors and out into the street. We are having a great awakening. Thompson the Egyptian is a great power and preaches the gospel of a great God. Kirkpatrick is a marvelous singer. Souls are responding and old conservative Red Oak is being stirred for once in her history. We are expecting great things in the next two weeks and we shall not be disappointed.—George H. Nicol.

Hopkinsville, Ky., May 3.—Just closed short but delightful meeting with Harry Smith and his wonderful church. Visible results are 127 responses to invitation. I have never had a better meeting although have had much larger visible results. Proportionally these results are as large; as, after all, numbers depend on place, pastor, and condition of church. Brother Harry Smith is the best organizer of a meeting I ever knew. His character and standing after thirteen years are phenomenal. This small town and literary church have a real city preacher. I leave for Oxford University for ten weeks next Saturday, returning for the fall work about September first. Send all communications to my wife at Latonia, Ky. —Herbert Yeuell.

Hopkinsville, Ky., May 3.—Herbert Yeuell meetings here closed last night. Twelve days of invitation. One hundred and twenty-seven in all. The literary and professional elements of the town in regular and delighted attendance. Yeuell's preaching positive, doctrinal and intensely spiritual. His courtesy to local pastor and pastors of other churches refreshing. He lectured four times to overflowing houses, seating capacity a thousand. No easy task in college and chautauqua town. Money easily rolls into a Yeuell meeting. Holds a really big meeting without the slightest claptrap and needs no troupe. His preaching among our students produced a real reformation. Yeuell's voice is an instrument of sweet and powerful music. His vocabulary copious and his diction beautiful and vigorous. Yeuell happily is not number crazy but no stone is left unturned to bring about the largest possible number of real converts. Mrs. Yeuell a charming and winsome personality whose influence in the meetings is most happy.—H. D. Smith.

Death

RICHARDSON.—Clement J. Richardson, son of W. F. and Leora M. Richardson, died on April 21, 1909, aged twenty-seven years. Clement had been for several years suffering with tuberculosis, and had spent most of this time in Roswell, New Mexico. While he had never gotten well, he was so much better, and gained so steadily in strength, that we expected him eventually to overcome the disease. But a sudden attack of pneumonia prostrated him; and he desired to come home with his mother and sister, who were with him and were planning to return soon. They started at once with him, but he did not survive the journey, and fell asleep by the way, without struggle or pain.

The funeral services were held on Monday, April 26, Bro. George W. Muckley conducting the services, assisted by Bro. Barclay Meador and Bro. F. L. Bowen; and our dear boy was laid away in beautiful Forest Hill Cemetery, to await the resurrection morning. Clement became a Christian while yet a little boy, and his life was beautiful in its childlike trust and purity. He was loved by everyone who knew him, and his memory is a blessing in our home. The dear people of our church here were so kind and tender in their ministry of comfort as to greatly lighten the burden of our hearts, and add to the affection in which we already held them. We shall see him again, in that land where the inhabitants shall never say, We are sick.

Mr. and Mrs. W. F. Richardson.

NOT DRUGS.

Food Did It.

After using laxative and cathartic medicines from childhood a case of chronic and apparently incurable constipation yielded to the scientific food, Grape-Nuts, in a few days.

"From early childhood I suffered with such terrible constipation that I had to use laxatives continuously going from one drug to another and suffering more or less all the time.

"A prominent physician whom I consulted told me the muscles of the digestive organs were partially paralyzed and could not perform their work without help of some kind, so I have tried at different times about every laxative and cathartic known, but found no help that was at all permanent. I had finally become discouraged and had given my case up as hopeless when I began to use the predigested food, Grape-Nuts.

"Although I had not expected this food to help my trouble, to my great surprise Grape-Nuts digested immediately from the first and in a few days I was convinced that this was just what my system needed.

"The bowels performed their functions regularly and I am now completely and permanently cured of this awful trouble.

"Truly the power of scientific food must be unlimited." "There's a Reason."

Pittsburg News

President William H. Taft will attend the Centennial October 16, and make an appropriate address on that greatest of all days of the convention.

The Pittsburg Sun, an afternoon paper, published a two column article on the Centenary of the Disciples of Christ. It was well prepared and held a very prominent place in the paper. This among other things is an indication of the interest that the city is beginning to take in the coming Centennial.

The regular monthly meeting was held in the First Christian Church, McKeesport, Pa. The morning session was devoted to the Ministerial Association. B. S. Johnson read a luminous and most enjoyable paper on "Isaac Errett." In the afternoon the C. W. B. M. auxiliaries and the W. P. C. M. S. Board held short meetings.

E. B. Quick of Dravosburg, has been chosen as the successor of J. C. Crosby at Braddock, Pa., and will begin his work the first Sunday in June. The semi-annual convention of the churches of western Pennsylvania will be held in Johnstown next week, beginning Tuesday and continuing three days.

O. H. PHILIPS.

203 Bissell Block, May 3, 1909.

An Appreciation

In the call of Rev. D. H. Shields to Eureka, Ill., the church at Salina wishes to give expression, at least in a small measure, to the esteem and high regards in which he is held.

Not that he needs our testimonial, and we would avoid foolish and fullsome praises; but a plain and candid expression of our esteem and heartfelt gratitude at this time is certainly in keeping with the promptings of our heart.

First, as a man: He came to us direct from college, twelve years next June, 1909, young and inexperienced, and has gone in and out among us for nearly twelve years, lived his plain, earnest, honest life in the Christian ministry, in our homes, in the pulpit, before the public and in the capacity of civic officer. This length of time and varied activity should reveal what is in a man of worth or weakness, merit or demerit. In the test he has more than made good. Not only is he a man among men, but we have found him to be a man of God. His voice has rung clear, his conscience ever domained, his movements in the open and above question, and no breath of suspicion has clouded his good name. No explanation or defense has ever been called for on account of the moral conduct of Mr. Shields. As a man he stands four-square to every wind that blows.

Second, as a preacher and pastor: The best evidence of his strength and efficiency in these respects is the continuous growth of the church in members, in harmony and unity, in moral earnestness and spiritual power and in all departments of the church activity. He leaves the church in a position of commanding influence both in the community and state. In the pulpit he is especially strong, illuminating every subject he touches. He carries his audience to heights where they enjoy his moral vision. Always earnest, always eloquent, always helpful.

While duly conservative, loyal to the book, to the tested truths of the past, "the things that remain," he is at the same time progressive in the most sane and wholesome sense. Those who listen to him know his face is toward the rising sun. As his clear mind and sound heart work before you, he leads you into an intellectual atmosphere so breezy and stimulating that it is intensely pleasing.

Equally does he touch the heart and awaken in it the noblest impulses. Rarely does he fail to leave his audience in the hush of the Divine Presence, the mind conscious of truths dawning and the soul tremulous with holiest emotions.

In the realm of thought Mr. Shields is distinctly a leader. But his leading is not into doubt, conjecture and fruitless speculations. His is the leadership that crystalizes in civic reforms, in better daily living, in moral and spiritual growth, in the enthronement of the Master in the lives of men.

Third, as a citizen: Mr. Shields has won merited distinction for his intelligent grasp and practical views upon municipal affairs and law enforcement as touching the liquor question and other evils affecting the home and the moral health of the community.

At a time when law-defying joints brazenly plied their nefarious, corrupting and deadly traffic upon our streets—the city becoming a party to the crime by collecting regular stipulated fines—Mr. Shields was elected mayor by reform forces and made oath that he would enforce the law. He did not forget his oath and as the Kansas City Star said recently: "He is the man that drove the joints out of Salina." In this he did a work for the community, for temperance and good government, not equaled by any other citizen or officer in the history of Salina.

While the Eureka Church has not employed his wife, we take it, yet deficient indeed would be this appreciation without suitable reference to the worthy companion and faithful wife, Sister Shields. Reared here, a product of Salina, all Salina respects and honors her. Equally beloved is she in the church with Mr. Shields. As the minister's wife she has filled her place well. The smoothness with which the church machinery has run is largely due to her wisdom and tactful influence. Her quiet, amiable and unobtrusive spirit has filled the church like a sweet melody and her daily life has been a gracious and peaceful benediction throughout its bounds.

They leave the church united, strong, hopeful and in its heart of hearts they are both deeply entrenched and beautifully enshrined. May they and their little ones, together with their every undertaking be richly blessed is the prayer of this congregation.

be where he was most needed, and he did what he could with those who were adding furrow to furrow across the path of the fire. It rolled up to them roaring, stopped, flung a shower of burning filaments before it, sank and swept aloft again, while the sparks rained down upon the grass before the draught it made.

Blackened men with smoldering clothes were, however, ready, and they fought each incipient blaze with soaked grain bags, and shovels, some of them also, careless of blistered arms, with their own wet jackets. As fast as each fire was trampled out another sprang into life, but the parent blaze that fed them sank and died, and as last there was a hoarse cheer. They had won, and the fire they had beaten passed on divided across the prairie, leaving the homestead unscathed between.

Then they turned to look for their leader, and did not find him until a lad came up to Dane.

"Courthorne's back by the second furrows, and I fancy he's badly hurt," he said. "He didn't appear to know me, and his head seems an kicked in."

It was not apparent how the news went round but in a few more minutes Dane was kneeling beside a limp, blackened object stretched amid the grass, and while his comrades clustered behind her, Maud Barrington bent over him. Her voice was breathless as she asked, "Yon don't believe him dead?"

Somebody had brought a lantern, and Dane felt inclined to gasp when he saw the girl's white face, but what she felt was not his business then.

"He's of a kind that is very hard to kill. Hold that lantern so I can see him," he said.

The rest waited silent, glad that there was somebody to take a lead, and in a few moments Dane looked around again.

"Ride in to the settlement, Stapleton, and bring that doctor fellow out if you bring him by the neck. Stop just a moment. You don't know where you're going to bring him to."

"Here, of course," said the lad, breaking into a run.

"Wait," and Dane's voice stopped him. "Now I don't fancy that would do. It seems to me that this is a case in which a woman to look after him would be necessary."

Then, before any of the married men or their wives who followed them could make an offer, Maud Barrington touched his shoulder.

"He is coming to the Grange," she said.

Dane nodded, signed to Stapleton, then spoke quickly to the men about him and turned to Maud Barrington.

"Ride on at a gallop and get everything ready. I'll see he comes to no harm," he said.

The girl felt curiously grateful as she rode out with her companion, and Dane, who laid Winston carefully in a wagon, drew two of the other men aside when it rolled away towards the Grange.

"There is something to be looked into. Did you notice anything unusual about the affair?" he said.

"Since you asked me, I did," said one of the men. "I, however, scarcely cared to mention it until I had time for reflection, but while I fancy the regulation guards would have checked the fire on the boundaries without our help, I don't quite see how one started in the hollow inside them."

"Exactly," said Dane, very dryly. "Well, we have got to discover it, and the more quickly we do it the better. I fancy, however, that the question who started it is what we have to consider."

The men looked at one another, and the third of them nodded.

"I fancy it comes to that—though it is horribly unpleasant to admit it," he said.

On the coffee question a lady says:

"I used to be so miserable after breakfast that I did not know how to get through the day. Life was a burden to me. When I tried to sleep I was miserable by having horrible dreams followed by hours of wakefulness. Gas would rise on my stomach and I would belch almost continually. Then every few weeks I would have a long siege of sick headaches. I tried a list of medicines and physicians without benefit.

"Finally, I concluded to give up my coffee and tea altogether and use Postum. The first cup was a failure. It was wishy-washy and I offered to give the remainder of the package to anyone who would take it.

"I noticed later on in one of the adver isements that Postum should be boiled at least fifteen minutes to make it good. I asked the cook how she made it and she said, 'Just the same as I did tea, being careful not to let it steep too long.'

"I read the directions and concluded Postum had not had a fair trial, so we made a new lot and boiled it 15 to 20 minutes. That time it came to the table a different beverage and was so delicious that we have been using it ever since.

"My sick headaches left entirely as did my sleepless nights, and I am now a different woman."

Illinois District Conventions

FOURTH DISTRICT

The Fourth District Annual Meeting will be held at Pontiac May 26 and 28. Lodging and breakfast are given free. Dinner and supper are served at the church dining room. We note the name of Mrs. Maria R. Ford of Porto Rico on the C. W. B. M. program for Wednesday afternoon, and a splendid array of speakers and subjects for the sessions of Thursday and Friday.

FIFTH DISTRICT

The district convention this centennial year will be held in Taylorville, June 1 to 3. The C. W. B. M. session will be held Tuesday, June 1. The district sessions will be held Wednesday and Thursday. The program is strong and practical. Many of the speakers are well known throughout the brotherhood. This centennial year every church in the district of fourteen counties should be represented, both with delegates and offerings. The names of all churches sending an offering will be printed on the back of the program distributed at the convention. Wait not. Send your offering now. "Be sure to come." O. C. Bolman, Sec'y.
Havana, Ill.

SIXTH DISTRICT

The convention of Illinois' Sixth District will be held at Rantoul, June 2 and 3. The C. W. B. M. sermon will be preached on Wednesday afternoon by Rev. F. B. Thomas. The program includes the names of the strongest men of the district with President Hieronymous of Eureka, J. Fred Jones of the whole state, and O. F. Jordan of Chicago, as "imported" talent. Vital subjects will be discussed.

Dixon Is Still On the Map

By A. R. Spicer.

Our Bible-school is in a contest with the great school at Canton, Ill. C. B. Rhodes, superintendent, and Harry Stauffer, assistant, are our faithful leaders; being mail clerks with alternating runs, they alternate in charge of the school, but their plans harmonize like clock work.

On Adult Class Day seven adult classes were organized, and they have their certificates framed and before them each Sunday.

We are having additions at regular services; baptized five recently at midweek service, and had one confession, all adults.

One of our new members, A. J. Horner, made the church a beautiful present, and a much-needed one, that of a five-tray individual communion set.

The C. W. B. M. have W. H. Waggoner for a week's missionary institute and Bible study this week.

The official board and church are planning for an aggressive evangelistic compaign this fall or winter. The leaders have not as yet been selected.

The church and community are looking forward to a new church building, which is a paramount need in this strategic little city of northern Illinois.

One of our young men, Elmer Rice, has been singing for W. F. Shearer, in his recent meetings. Brother Rice is one of Dixon's best, and it's just a question of time when he will be in the front ranks with our great singing evangelists.

Vol. XXVI. CHICAGO, ILL., MAY 20, 1909 No. 21

Possible Harm in a Successful Revival

There is probably no subject in our modern church life tnat demands re-examination and criticism as does our Evangelism. A wide-spread sense of the church's impotency in its regular methods makes many a pastor tolerate a type of evangelism against which his better judgment vaguely, but strongly, protests. Even in this day of phenomenal revivals in our own brotherhood and in all sects, the feeling of doubt, of suspicion, is wide-spread. While some are glorifying God for the unprecedented out-pouring of his grace, others are shaking their heads in skepticism, evidently not convinced that the results are so significant as the face of the returns would indicate. There is much confusion of mind upon the problem among Christian leaders, and when attempts are made to point out the weaknesses and faults of our evangelism there is surprising superficiality.

With the W. A. Sunday meetings in Springfield, Illinois, as our typical case, we would be expected, no doubt, by many readers, in writing upon the possibility of harm in evangelism to select Mr. Sunday's slang, his theology, and his ten thousand dollar collection for himself as the big items for any criticism we might make. To do this, however, would be to betray the same superficial conception of the problem as is exhibited by most critics of evangelistic procedure.

To our mind there are more serious possibilities of harm than those evils which we can trace to the vulgarity of Mr. Sunday's speech. We believe in clean preaching. We offer no excuse for any man's use of inferior language in the pulpit. The theme, the soul and the preacher's own mental wholesomeness demand pure and earnest speech. But in assessing such a meeting as that in Springfield we would dismiss that point with a sentence.

The theology of the evangelist is, taken by itself, particularly crude and, to us, impossible. But we have already pointed out in a previous article that the dominant note of his preaching was not dogmatic, but ethical. Nobody took Mr. Sunday seriously as a teacher of doctrine, but only as a preacher of righteousness. Therefore to make one's judgment of the meeting turn on a criticism of its theology would betray a small and finical mind.

With others we too believe that the financing of the meeting should be organized in such a way as to pay the evangelist a reasonable compensation without this compensation being made so large as to excite doubt in the public mind as to the preacher's simplicity of motive in his work. But we do not regard this item as important enough to enter vitally into a criticism of the meeting as a whole.

All these points seem to us to be flaws in the meeting, but more or less negligible in a final assessment of it. The comparison of one evangelist with another on a basis of considerations like these seems to us to be a superficial procedure. The serious possibilities of harm lie deeper. They are involved in the essential enterprise of the evangelistic meeting itself.

Let us consider some of these.

The revival may do injury to the religious life of the community by stimulating religious feeling beyond the point where the church can maintain it in its normal appeals.

This is a serious possibility of harm. It makes inevitable a certain disillusionment after the evangelist has gone. And the last state of an individual, a church or a community that has suffered such disillusionment is worse than the first.

It is unfair to reply that the church is at fault when such reaction ensues. It may be at fault; and again it may not be. It is quite possible that the church is unable, in the nature of the case, to utilize certain incentives to action that are part and parcel of the revival meeting.

Pastors and office bearers in the church must learn to face this question before entering upon a great revival: Will the meeting fit naturally into the ideals and methods of our regular church life? A revival does not stand in its own right. Its value depends on the direction given to religious effort in the community before the evangelist appears and after he goes away. Its significance, therefore, is never indicated by any numerical results nor by any emotional delectation. Its value is relative—relative to its connection with the on-going kingdom before and after.

From this point of view it is clear that the revival that looks big on paper and that feels big for the moment to the people of the community might be exotic—neither fitting into the past work of the church nor fitted into by subsequent church activity.

Another possibility of harm may lie in the training of the church to the use of sensational methods in its regular work. This is one of the most obvious of the baneful effects of the great wave of evangelism now sweeping over the country. Churches are being educated to a false standard of success. Numbers and enthusiasm, good and important in themselves, are taken as the only standard of success and anything that will bring numbers and create enthusiasm is seized upon by hard-pushed pastors.

In the long run this cannot but make for the weakening of the church. Her real power in the community is exercised through modest and quiet activities. Indulgence in artificial and sensational modes of getting results renders her blase and impatient with those processes whereby, after all, Christian character and social welfare are promoted.

In the revivalistic exploitation of children we have an illustration of the injury resulting to the church from present day evangelism. We will hardly need to argue the statement to our intelligent readers that the typical revival meeting is not the place for children to be brought to commitment. The meaning and importance of this step in the child's experience calls for the most delicate personal attention from pastor and parent and Sunday-school teacher. No defense can be made of the practice of herding children to the front in a revival hot with hypnotic excitement.

Yet in those churches where the revival machinery is used for this purpose little patience exists for the use of those quieter, systematic methods of instruction by which the child's soul opens up toward God as the rose opens to the sun. Why take so long and spend so much effort in doing what can otherwise be done by wholesale in a single week? is the impatient question asked by those who have become accustomed to the revivalistic method. Thus the opportunity to enrich the conversion experience of children through careful instruction is passed by in favor of the mechanical methods of the revival.

In a further paper we shall consider the criterion of evangelistic success.

There is a tendency in our time to make all reading and all study easy. The substitution of gossip for news in the daily press, which we skim today and forget tomorrow, the seeking of soft and easy snaps to meet the demand, are illustrations of this vicious habit. The wise man will seek for the high places in literature; will walk with Homer and Shakespeare and Dante and Browning and Hawthorne, with men who will compel him to mingle some thinking with his reading. The Germans have a proverb that reading is an excuse for not thinking. Some reading is. The value—or, if my conservative reader thinks that is too strong a phrase, one value—of the Bible is that it compels thinking. The Bible is a literature of lofty souls. We cannot understand them unless we climb: hard thinking is the price we pay for broad vision. I like Paul partly for the same reason that I like Browning: they are both difficult to understand. The meat is sweeter because we have to crack the nut. No doubt there is much in the Bible that is easily understood; but even the simple experiences, or the experiences more simply narrated, yield far more to him who studies than to him who merely reads.—Lyman Abbott.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

THE PRICE SIR, THE PRICE

Of course we are rich. Therefore must we be prodigal? Our riches may make a fool of us as they do of the proverbial young man. We are rich, yet we are enormously in debt and the last and richest year of all our years of grace ran us more in debt. Worst of all it was not the debt of investment, but the debt of waste. We put 65 per cent of our national income into the war budget. $525,000,000 for war—$30 for each family of us. And it is all expense. There is no investment. A battleship lasts but a few years and costs enormously while it lasts besides. Capitalize the cost of the army and navy and the sum we attach staggers comprehension. The income on $6,000,000,000 would not pay the bill to the workers who must pay the tax. In other words if each family were to put out at current rates of interest a sum sufficient to pay their part of the cost of our army and navy in times of peace they would tie up from personal use and give over to military uselessness the sum of $600 apiece.

THE BURDEN OF THE PAST

Our civil war has cost us to date over $6,000,000,000. That makes no account of the greater cost to the devastated southland. We could have paid almost twice the value of every slave freed and been the saver. Fourteen million human lives has been the terrible toll of war in this last and most Christian century. In the history of the world it is estimated that more than 16,000,000,000 human lives have been lost in war. If the last century's wars cost $40,000,000,000 what must have been the cost from the beginning.

Historians may dilate on the gains of civilization from battle, but we are beginning to study the matter with a more philosophical temperament and to feel that but for war the progress of the world might have been forwarded a millenium. War, except it be in defense of freedom, costs most dearly to every principle upon which freedom is built. It destroys not the worst but the best. It destroys industry and invention; it kills the strength and brawn of the nation and leaves the weak and wan to sire the future; it brings that enmity that retards at the cost of that fraternity which enhances progress.

THE PROGRESS OF CONCILIATION

Within the last six years, eighty pairs of treaties have been ratified between the different nations. Each of these make arbitration obligatory on all matters not involving independence and national honor. At the Second Hague Conference thirty-five nations voted for a universal treaty of obligatory arbitration while but nine failed to support it. These thirty-five nations represented four-fifths of the world's population. The Third Conference will doubtless see that work pretty well begun by the independent powers. It will also doubtless make a permanent Court to adjust all difficulties that may be referred to it, including a large list that must be referred to it. The one draw-back is the delusion of "national honor." It is the national survival of the code duella. No reputable civilized person is tolerated in his use of it today. Soon no reputable nation will be. Our personal and national principles will soon penetrate through to our international relations. We will settle differences as individuals, corporations, and even states in the one nation do now settle them—by a judicial court whose decisions will be enforced by an enlightened public opinion and, if need be, by the strong arm of an international police force.

THE FUTURE WAR

It is doubtful if there will ever be a struggle of the civilized nations again. The giants cannot afford to fight. This is an industrial age and industry pays terrible toll to war. The future war will be one of economic strength, said Jean De Bloch. Great armies, with modern accoutrement, are of tremendous cost. They must fight hidden from each other and with artillery chiefly. They must call out practically their entire militia population and all have enormous debts already hanging to their necks.

Then war will be so terrible as to almost destroy itself soon. The latest rifle will penetrate a skull at 2½ miles and can be fired eighty times per minute. It is thirteen times as effective as forty years ago. The prospect is good for a three mile gun that will shoot a steel bullet every second and require a belt of 575 cartridges, and it will use smokeless powder and a "silencer" that will make the position or even direction of the enemy a mystery. Sharpshooting will make visible lines or officers an impossibility. One round of the latest shrapnel bomb will send 1,000 deadly pieces of iron over an area one-half by one-quarter miles, and be fired with such rapidity as to make life impossible under its deliverance. Artillery can be effectively aimed from even greater distances and in undiscoverable ambuscades. Illuminated bombs will turn night into day. The airship will at least be the most effective scout ever put in commission if indeed it does not carry a deadly weapon that will be irresistible on both land and sea. With the "Nautilus" under the water and the perfected air ship in the air the best navy will carry a hazard such as to make it of doubtful efficiency.

AMERICA'S "BIG STICK"

Many enthusiastic admirers of Theodore Roosevelt feel that his "big stick" bodes as much ill to us as his civic program gave us of good. Their could be no wilder vagary than that of the gallant Captain Hobson, and no policy more at odds with the time than that of vieing with the nations for supremacy as a navy builder. Who menaces our shores? Here more than in any old country nation is Lloyd-George's phrase applicable. England and Germany may stand, armed to the teeth, daring one another, but no one is daring us nor would they dare to dare us. David Starr Jordan hit the thing off wittily when he said that we could insure all our coast lines against loss by war with the cost of a single Dreadnaught and get English and German companies to take the risk. Not even a heathen could imagine so vain a thing as any reason why any European nation would desire to attack us unless it was because of some overt act of our own. Then we are left to Hobson's "night-mare." Captain Hobson is gallant and when on any other topic quite sensible. He is a brave man and he has shown it in times of peace as well as war, but he is navy nurtured and the grooves of his brain are tented and bristling with battle dreams. It would be quite as sensible to turn the settlement of the saloon question over to the brewers as to give anything but the technical end of the war question into the hands of the military men.

Japan is an overcrowded island empire that farms far up the mountain sides and far out into the sea to keep its teeming millions fed and clothed. She fought the Manchurian war to a whirlwind finish and won before its resources were exhausted. Had she had a less worthy cause and an enemy that had any heart in the fight she would have soon been bankrupted by her battles, and lost. She desires only peace to build up her resources, and above all she could not hazard a war with America across ten thousand miles of sea. Our friendship and not our enmity is the hope of her future and she is too acute not to recognize it.

Then against whom are we building Dreadnaughts but against the "night-mare" of our jingoism.

THE COST OF WAR IN TIME OF PEACE

The materialism of the pagan never reared its head higher above our Christian civilization than when it coined the slogan "in times of peace, prepare for war." The golden age of utter disarmament has not come, but the iron age of utter materialism is past. So long as there are criminals among the nations there will need to be police in national armament to restrain them from preying upon the rights of weaker neighbors. But to suspicion every neighbor of being a potential thief is a relic of the barbaric. It belies our Christian faith in things. History will record this era as one of not only prodigal expenditure, but as the darkness before the dawn of the better day of conciliation and arbitration. The economic insanity of the Dreadnaught panic will reveal to the nations their impossible rivalry in building engines of destruction to keep each from the other's throat. It will also reveal to them the fact that they do not wish to fly at each others throat, but that the building of Dreadnaughts has given them the nightmare of barbarism. Lloyd-George phrased it rightly when he termed it "the building of navies against a night-mare."

Germany has not had a war since '71, yet every peasant is today carrying two soldiers upon his back and Germany's chief menace is the fact that she has a well trained army with nothing to do except carry a chip on its shoulder and a vast poverty stricken industrial class groaning under the burden. The very cost of her army in times of peace has so drained her resources that a war in these times, when dollars will fight the battles in the end rather than men, make it impossible for her to even defend the Fatherland without facing a national poverty that will ruin her. Germany is the imperialistic "bad boy" among the nations. She refused to consider disarmament at the last Hague Conference. She fails most signally to ratify the treaties of arbitration which the nations are now signing in pairs. She is developing an industrial efficiency that would give her second place at least in the markets of the world if not lead her to first and then she shuts those markets by the menace of her militarism. The day is past when every man's home must be his castle and he must be ever ready to defend it. Industrial supremacy is the name of the new era and the watchword of the nations that would rank first. Let Germany turn her strong young men into the factories and put her millions into trading ships and she will soon have a prosperous people and be intrenched behind the bulwarks of the nation's needs, for no country in these days is going to throw the gauntlet of war over her docks when they groan with the prosperous trade of nations.

THE "FOOL-TAXPAYER" IN FRANCE.

Most taxpayers are entitled to the epithet. Economists are generally agreed that current methods of collecting taxes are about the limit of unscientific administration and the very irony of equity. If this be true in the other countries it certainly is thrice true in the land of "liberty, equality, fraternity." Horses, carriages, windows, salt, sugar and many of the commonest articles of necessity are arbitrarily taxed. Taxes of this kind are called imposts; impositions would better describe them. Now the Clemencieu government proposes to levy an income tax and make the whole system over. Earned incomes will be subject to a lesser rate than those simply "enjoyed" and foreigners will pay more than citizens.

The Federal Council of the Churches in Chicago held a luncheon at the University Club last week to take steps toward securing a District Secretary for Chicago and Illinois and the states immediately adjacent. This effort will mark a distinct advance in the work of the Federal Council and ought to promise a much greater unity among the churches of this region.

P. J. Rice, of Minneapolis, calls our attention to an error in his article on Gipsy Smith, two weeks ago. He did not say the evangelist was no "orator," but no "ranter." "In a very true sense," Mr. Rice adds, "he is an orator. He has a marvelous voice and uses it with telling effect and splendid control. Besides he moves his audience as few public speakers ever do."

The churches in and near Chicago will be interested to know that a large number of ministers and teachers from the pulpits and colleges of the Disciples are to be in attendance at the University during the summer quarter and will be glad to supply the pulpits of any of the churches in need of ministers. Our pastors in the city who are to be absent from their pulpits for a time on vacation will have opportunity of selecting from those who will be in attendance such supplies as they need.

In answer to numerous inquiries as to the official route to Pittsburg from Chicago we are glad to inform our readers both in Chicago and the West that the amplest and most convenient arrangements are now being developed for Centennial trains from Chicago. THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY will be in a position to assist you in making the trip to Pittsburg delightful both in comfort and in the companionship of the friendliest people in the world. It is not too early to make inquiries even now.

The provisional program for the 24th International Christian Endeavor Convention at St. Paul, Minnesota, July 7-12, has now been issued. The sessions will be held in the Auditorium and Armory, and the leading churches of the city. The program promises an exceedingly interesting series of meetings. The general theme of the Convention is "Thy kingdom come" and the application of this theme to the individual, the home and society, to civic and social life, to business life, and to all the world, shows the scope and intent of the program makers. All signs are favorable for a very large and inspiring convention and every society of Christian Endeavor ought to arrange for representation at St. Paul.

The buildings of the Texas Bible Chair, erected by the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, for instruction in connection with the State University at Austin, Texas, were dedicated on April 30th with a program including representatives of the University of Texas, the Young Men's Christian Association, the Christian Woman's Board of Missions, and various other Christian agencies of the state and city. The work of the Bible Chair has long since justified itself in the regard of those who watch educational progress in our day. The Bible courses for University students given by Professor Jewett include the life of Christ, studies in the Gospel of Mark, the earlier prophets, the life of Paul, early church history, and comparative religion.

Passing through Chicago on his way to Toronto Gipsy Smith spent the greater part of a day recently in conference with members of the Laymen's Evangelistic Council, in regard to plans for his mission to be held in this city beginning October 2, 1909. "The Gipsy" has spent a large part of the year in America and is sailing for England on the 2nd of June. In the course of his talk with the members of the Council he remarked that at the close of his mission in Toronto he will have addressed over three millions of people during this American tour; though he much prefers to talk, in his modest, unassuming way, of the personal work he does with the individual. He expressed a regret that his limited time in Chicago would prevent his having a conference with the ministers of the city in regard to plans for the campaign. While two other short missions will be held at the close of the campaign in Chicago, he comes to America preëminently for the Chicago Mission.

An interesting gathering was held at Providence, Rhode Island, the last week in April, looking toward a thorough federation of all the church forces of that state. Twenty-one of the twenty-six Protestant churches were represented in the gathering. Mottoes such as "some church responsible for every square mile," "to overcome our overlooking, overlapping, over-organizing," "to learn all the facts and to ally all the forces" were conspicuously displayed. The meeting was characterized by the greatest enthusiasm, good fellowship and awareness regarding the problems of the time. A program for united Protestantism was adopted, which we publish elsewhere. This is the first case in which a state has been so thoroughly organized, and perhaps it was well that the little state of Rhode Island should be the pioneer in this movement. The federation idea is gaining rapid headway, and its results are already being seen far beyond the mere influence of such great gatherings as the one in Philadelphia, in December, and the one in New York four years ago.

The ecclesiastic may assure his sectarian constituents that Church Federation means to preserve the denominations intact, but the practical minded laymen of the churches are bound, once they are committed to Federation, to look beyond Federation to out and out union. Mr. David R. Forgan, the dean of Chicago's bankers, declared his view of it the other day in these words:

> "I hope to see the day when there will be one great church, big enough and broad enough to embrace the dignity of the Episcopalian, the order of the Presbyterian, the freedom of the Congregationalist, the fire of the Methodist, and the water of the Baptist."

The speech was delivered at a Federation meeting and closed with this telling sentence: "Our fathers were dead sure that they were right about the things that separated them from one another; let us be just as sure, but in a different way—dead sure we are right in those things that unite us." It is from the hard headed practical laymen of the churches that the strongest pressure will eventually come to overthrow sectarianism and answer Christ's prayer for the unity of his followers.

In connection with our words of two weeks ago on the subject of the union of Baptists and Disciples, and especially the note of warning then sounded regarding the danger of trusting too much to the advice of outside representatives of either Disciple or Baptist interests, we have had forcible reminders in the form of letters and reports which have come in since that date. One of these, written by a brother who has been actively at work attempting to secure a local union of Baptists and Disciples in the city where he lives, says: "I am tempted to wish that your warning of the possible danger in carrying such negotiations to a satisfactory end should have come to us earlier. Our efforts at union with the Baptists in this place have come to naught apparently for one of the reasons which you stated as a danger to such negotiation. The retiring pastor of the Baptist Church here, it appears was bitterly set against the union being effected; and their church, under his influence, adopted a resolution which forbids any further talk of this nature for the present, at least. At the same time a large element of the Baptist community appears to be directly in favor of such an effort. And the brotherly agreements reached elsewhere may be of use to us as a suggestion and model sooner than we now think." Other testimonies of similar kind could be quoted if there were need. Those who are seriously working at the task of uniting local congregations of Baptists and Disciples must be prepared to make their plans and carry them out on the basis of the judgment of those immediately concerned and without waiting for the approval of outside counsellors whose judgment is so likely to be colored by denominational self-interest.

We have received a number of articles protesting in strong terms against the position taken by B. B. Tyler in his article on "Gipsy Smith at Denver" in a recent number of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY. One of the best of these is from Richard Dobson of St. Cloud, Minnesota. Mr. Dobson was for a number of years an effective worker among our English churches and was also in active coöperation with the Free Church Councils of Great Britain. He protests against Dr. Tyler's characterization of Gipsy Smith and his work. He attended the Gipsy's meetings in St. Paul and was profoundly impressed by them. He believes that the practical teachings of the evangelist are precisely what this generation needs. He says, "Let us have less fuming about 'our plea' and more emphasis upon our practice. Let us talk less about 'our position' and more prayer for and patience with those who differ from us; less sentiment about ordinances and a better appreciation of their spiritual significance; less bickering and more brotherliness; fewer concerts and ice cream socials and more prayer meetings, fewer cents in our offerings and more dollars; less ambition for telegraphic additions and more anxiety for retentions." He adds, "I strongly protest against Brother Tyler's application of the term 'syndicate' to the English Free Church Council if he means by syndicate an association of persons for the promotion of some financial scheme. The Free Church Council is engaged in a mission of world wide evangelism and any profits arising from Gipsy Smith's campaign are devoted to this purpose. The Free Church Council movement in Britain has been of immense value to the spiritual life of the church. Would to God that a similar movement existed in this country. Brother Tyler was exceedingly unfortunate in his source of information when he quoted the Christian Commonwealth, which has ceased to speak for evangelical Christianity in England, and does not represent any appreciable section of religionists."

We hold no brief for theh University of Chicago, but, traduced as it is, we feel a certain moral obligation to call attention to any word of truth spoken on its behalf. Mr. Guy W. Sarvis, a graduate student at the university writes to The Delphic of Drake University, an interesting and evidently sincere statement of the spirit of the great school. After setting forth the ideal of the university as a school of research, whose professors are devoted not to the repetition of tradition, but to the discovery of new truth, Mr. Sarvis writes of the divinity school in which his chief work has been done. The work of this department has been, he says, "very satisfying to me. Perhaps no department of the university has been more maligned or misrepresented. It is true that an occasional freak appears and is magnified some hundreds of times by newspaper reporters; but, as Bro. Medbury has said so often, sensational newspaper reports represent only the unusual. The greatest surprise that has come to me in the months I have been here is the devout, reverential, religious spirit of almost all the men on our faculty. Class-room work does not tend to develop these characteristics, but rather the spirit of critical analysis and exact definition. In spite of this, I have rarely met a body of men more genuinely interested in the propagation of a living and virile gospel and the promotion of godliness in the world. At the present moment, Prof. Burton is abroad on a mission to China which has for its purpose the establishment of a great Christian university in that country. On the other hand, there is no shrinking from facts, no dismissing of arguments with a wave of the hand, no calling of contemptuous names. The whole spirit of the divinity school is that of earnest seeking after truth. On the whole, the University of Chicago is one of the most marvelous of modern educational institutions. Its equipment is unsurpassed, its surroundings are beautiful, and its faculty scholarly and efficient to an unusual degree. It has no traditions from a historic past, but it has vital contact with a living present."

The Consecration of Children

It has long been evident to students of Christian institutions that the practice of infant baptism, while wholly unscriptural and misleading as to the intent of the ordinance and misused in its application to the unconscious period of childhood, has had a very great social significance as a mark of the church's interest in the family at one of the moments of its profoundest emotional experience.

The birth of a child is an event which has singular power to unite the members of the family in a sense of responsibility and in an atmosphere of affection probably not equalled by any other incident. The Roman Catholic Church and the Pedobaptist churches have fixed upon this happy moment to secure recognition by the family of its relation to the church and appreciation of the church's reciprocal interest in it.

Those Christians who, like the Disciples and the Baptists, have rightly protested against the practice of infant baptism, have perhaps unconsciously at the same time failed to take advantage of the social as well as the religious value that lies in some public recognition of the little child. For this reason an effort is being made in a number of churches in these two bodies to emphasize this feature of the family life by a service which shall avoid all appearance of baptism or christening, but shall at the same time utilize the unquestionable values which lie in the public recognition of the child as under the care of the church.

Such a service should be very simple, but may, at the same time, be very impressive. It could be arranged either in the Sunday-school or the church service. If the parents are present with the child, a few words of counsel to them regarding the training of the little one in Bible knowledge and religious interest would deepen in their hearts a sense of obligation which no amount of preaching can create or foster. Such a brief message should be followed with a prayer, and neither the parents nor others present could fail to understand that the church does not defer its interest in the child until it has entered or even passed the critical period of character formation, nor does it leave this matter wholly to the chance influences of the Sunday-school. But it takes direct personal interest in the religious education of the child in the home and in the church. We believe that such a service of consecration, divested of every resemblance to infant baptism, but made of equal impressiveness, would remedy one of the manifest defects in the usual attitude of our churches toward the little child.

The Yellow Journal

It is a current and popular method of awakening interest in certain types of journalism for the editors to secure contributions attacking this or that institution or individual or group in the supposed interest of public welfare. The muck-racking principle so caustically commented upon by President Roosevelt months ago has carried very far in the popular magazines. At the present time one of these journals is publishing a series of articles which, under scare heads, undertakes to point out the alarming tendencies of modern university teaching on the subjects of economics, domestic life, and biblical literature. The statements of university men throughout the country are compiled, sometimes in a manner to express their real convictions, at other times giving statements which they have uttered only for the purpose of criticism or condemnation, and all these are put together as the sober and accurate records of university opinion in our age.

Of course the publishers of this journal are not giving this material space merely for public information. Their purpose is to exploit the journal by the same methods of sensationalism which have prevailed successfully in other journalistic offices. If their attacks upon the university instructors of America are to be taken seriously, it would mean that ninety-five per cent of all the institutions of the country have gone wrong and that the university is only a hotbed of anarchy, infidelity, and of questionable ethics.

With a degree of naivete which is diverting, the editor of this same journal says in a private letter to one of the men whose views have been quoted in part and have been held up to public criticism, "Our object in printing this series of articles is not in any sense to institute an attack upon the universities or upon the modern methods of thought or teaching, but merely to bring before the public the attitude of the leading professors of the country upon the vital questions of the day." The disingenuousness of such procedure is sufficiently clear. The contributor is bidden to gather, after the manner of a grub street writer, stray sentences from the teachings of men of repute in the leading universities of the country, as if he and the journal he represents were vitally concerned in showing the heretical and dangerous character of such teaching. To its readers the journal poses as profoundly concerned to promote the welfare of the nation by disclosures of the questionable ethics of the men who occupy conspicuous positions as public instructors, but to these men themselves the editors pose as only mild and amiable reporters of current views in which they profess to be impartially and profoundly interested.

It is this type of journalism which has brought the American newspaper and magazine into such deserved reproach on the other side of the Atlantic. The very name "American" as applied to journalism is a synonym for the insincere and unreliable. Perhaps the price we pay for freedom of the press is very heavy. Public men engaged in political, educational or religious activity are never free from the lurking and malicious practice of unprincipled journalism, either of misquotation or of caricature. It is unquestionable that even this licentiousness of the press is preferable to enforced silence as under the regime of "lese majeste," and yet there should be a higher standard of ethics in the journalism of a nation so progressive and fair minded as the American people. The next great reform that America must inaugurate, after the saloon has been destroyed and the divorce court scandal has been suppressed, will be the purification of the American newspaper and magazine, both secular and religious, from the reproach of partisanship, sensationalism and misrepresentation.

The Eloquence of Silence

The more deeply one penetrates into the essential facts of life the more he becomes convinced of the power of silence and the futility of speech. Carlyle once said of his countrymen: "The English are a dumb people. They can do great acts but not describe them. Nature alone knows thee, England. Thy epic unsung in words is written in huge characters on the face of this planet—sea moles, cotton trades, railways, fleets, and cities, Indian empires, Americas, new orients—legible throughout the solar system."

One is not quite sure that these words are true of England today. And he is more than certain that they are not true of America. Here certainly there is much noise. The press is clamorous; politics keeps up its constant note of insistence rising to deafening tumult at times; conventions are always demanding the attention of the public with the consideration of every question imaginable from a peace congress to a tailors' association. The pulpit certainly secures as much public notice as at any time in the past. If it does not as profoundly impress the generation as once it did, it is not because of its failure of speech. All this outbursting of words, this eloquence of debate, argument and affirmation is a part of our modern life. The nation enjoys it and believes in its effectiveness. Yet it is questionable whether the world owes to speech any such debt of gratitude as that which it owes to silence.

Nature is silent. The psalmists wondered at this marvel of the mighty works of God. Man is demonstrative and vociferous; God is modest and silent. The movements of the stars are without clamor. Spring comes with the miracle of awakening life and yet is almost voiceless. The songs of birds and the murmur of waters singing their way to the sea are faint and far off notes in the vast quietness of the advancing year. No artist is at work painting the gorgeous tints of the flowers or the forests. There is no show and ostentation. The voice of an occasional storm is almost the only breaking of the silence. Heaven and earth are full of the glory of God, but they are not clamorous. "There is no speech nor language; their voice cannot be heard."

The primitive races of mankind thought of deity as necessarily vocal and self-uttering like themselves. They could not conceive of silent gods. To them every sound of nature was a direct utterance of higher powers. Hence came their idea of "revelation." They imagined it to be the outward spoken vocal consignment of knowledge to men. This idea has lingered long. It has its echoes in Greek oracles and Roman auguries; in Hindu shrines and Egyptian monuments. In all these the gods were believed to be speaking directly to man. Humanity never quite learned the lesson that it was usually man speaking to God, and accepting the echo of his words as the voice of the Highest.

Even in Hebrew life which was most of all sensitive to the divine, there seemed no other way of expressing the great truths of life save in terms that predicated speech of God. It seemed necessary to use the old anthropomorphic terms to represent that silent and inner word of grace which comes not in earthquake nor tempest nor in scorching flame, but in the still small voice within the human soul. Humanity is vastly in love with speech. It has babbled its childlike ideas in so many languages that it has come to feel that only words can convey thought. And in its constant talk of God, the highest of all its concerns, it has fallen naturally into the belief that it was God who was speaking.

If there is one thing which the Bible discloses more impressively than another it is the fact that God, who has never from the first ceased to seek means of reaching the heart of man, has spoken in the silence of the spirit rather than in the voice of oracles. Those great souls, of whom the Old Testament speaks, who were willing to pay the price of silent and lofty meditation upon the will of God, came forth at last with words which were sanctioned by the sense of that inner union which they had enjoyed with Jehovah. In the silence of the night, in the wild stretches of the desert, in the quiet of humble homes, or even in the crowded and tumultuous gatherings of men, they were still alone with God. And never did the divine Spirit cease to utter in the secret place the message which they were prepared to receive. The measure of that truth was necessarily conditioned by the prophet's capacity to receive it and had to pass through the lenses of his own personality. But it was the voice of God speaking in the quiet place to the awakened soul and then uttering itself in the trumpet tones of the prophet's public message.

It is the discovery of this fact, so patent in the pages of the Old Testament and in all religious history, that has disturbed and shocked not a few of the sincere and earnest believers of our generation. It seems so much easier and more satisfying to believe that God spoke in human speech, because speech seems to us so much more natural than silence. Our very civilization estimates so highly the powers of utterance in the thousand ways which enrich and illumine man's life that we can hardly adjust ourselves to the discipline and eloquence of unspoken truth. This has led not a few to feel that with the emphasis upon the spiritual intuition of the prophets as the organ of their knowledge of God's will rather than the vocal utterance of deity, there has passed away the essential validity of revelation. In pained and astonished protest they rise up to ask if, then, the old foundations are not entirely gone, and if we are not denying that God has ever really made known his will to men. But this is an unthoughtful and inadequate view. God's education of man has always been in silence. It is not as a remote and separated personality that he has spoken to man, but rather in the quiet of the soul. He is not at distances removed, but is "closer than breathing and nearer than hands and feet." Dogma utters itself in speech, but truth enters silently into the open heart.

The Theatre a Sociological Instructor

By Miss Jane Addams.

A dozen plays on the stage at the present moment whose titles might be easily translated into proper headings for sociological lectures or sermons:

1. "The Battle" might be called "The Need for Model Tenements."

2. "The Melting Pot," "The Value of Immigration."

3. "The Easier Way," "The Entrenchments of the Social Evil."

4. "The Strong People," "A Strike and Its Unfair Suppression."

5. "The Man of the Hour," "An Effort to Combat Municipal Corruption."

6. "The Lion and the Mouse," "The Ruthless Methods of Big Business."

7. "The Dawn of a Tomorrow," "Optimism as a Rectifier of Social Wrongs."

8. "The Third Degree," "Sweating in Police Courts Resulting in False Confession."

9. "Salvation Nell" has been called rightly or wrongly, "The Divine Comedy of the Poor."

10. "The Writing on the Wall," "An Exposition of the Methods of Trinity Church in Administering Its Property." (As this play, however, is still being tested in Philadelphia, a New Yorker would say it was not yet before the public.)

11. "Sampson," "The Results of Frenzied Finance."

12. "The Flag Station," "The Accidents Resulting from Long Hours of Labor."

This list does not even mention the plays of Ibsen, Shaw and Hauptman, which deal so directly with the moral issues, that the moralists themselves wince under their teachings and declare them brutal.

Unanswerable Arguments for Children's Day

By Stephen E. Corey

Satan is Opposed to World-Wide Missions.

If there is anything that arouses the fears of the Prince of Darkness it is to see the children in line for the conquest of the world for Christ. He knows that if they are on fire for missions, his sway is doomed. He hates Children's Day. He frowns when he sees a man give $50,000 for missions, but he trembles when 50,000 children give one dollar each for missions. The one man has given as much as the children, but the 50,000 lives will be lined up against him long after the man is in his grave. God is for world-wide missions and Christ is for world-wide missions. The Devil is opposed bitterly to the whole enterprise. Let us enlist our Sunday-schools on the right side, not simply in sentiment but in deed.

It is Only Fair to the Sunday-schools.

It is certainly an injustice to deprive the children of the education, inspiration, and unselfish service which this day makes possible. Here is a day that eclipses even Christmas in its opportunity for the exercise of unselfish love service. The young life needs a channel for the expression of Christian ideals—and here is the channel. Great things are going on in the world. The Sunday-school army has a most honorable part in the advance movements of Christendom. The boys and girls deserve one day of recognition when they can exercise their powers. Children's Day for Foreign Missions is the most joyful of the whole year. Probably one million people attend these services in our churches. Last year almost 4,000 schools observed the day. The Children's Day offering was $75,180; it will probably be $100,000 this year.

It Will Wake up the Neighbors.

There is nothing that will arouse the interest of outsiders like Children's Day. It is genuine, joyous, wholesome, victorious. It reminds folks that you are doing something. It downs the criticism that the church is dead. It makes the critics sit up and take notice. It teaches your religious neighbors that you believe in applied Christianity. It warms the souls of the cold and indifferent. Whose heart can resist the squeeze of warm little hands? Children's Day will make friends that could not otherwise be won. The outside people believe in a Sunday-school that does stirring things.

We Must Not be Faithless to Our Missionaries

The Foreign Society has sent forth more than 160 missionaries. They are in Japan, China, Tibet, The Philippines, India, Africa, Cuba and Scandinavia. They have gathered about them over 400 native evangelists and teachers. They have baptized thousands of converts, organized churches, built hospitals, established schools, erected orphanages, healed the sick, and preached the gospel to vast multitudes. They are making Jesus Christ known in our stead. They are doing a work at which the angels rejoice. They are following the command of Christ to be witnesses unto Him to the ends of the earth. They are our brethren—we have sent them forth. To fail to support them is to be infidel and deny the faith.

It is the Will of Christ.

Children's Day is dedicated to the saving of a lost world, and Christ said: "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature." Christ expects every agency of His church to obey Him, and the Sunday-school is an agency of His church. In fact it is His future church. Children's Day for Foreign Missions in the Sunday-school is an opportunity to obey Christ in His supreme command.

Is a Part of Our Plea.

To be non-missionary is to be heretical. We claim to be a New Testament people. The one supreme passion of the New Testament church was to make Christ known to the world. If we are true to our plea we must make our churches and Sunday-schools missionary. To do otherwise is to deny the "faith once delivered unto the saints." The Sunday-school is a Bible-school. It meets to study the Word of God. This Word of God is a library on missions. Take the missionary idea out of it and the Book disappears. The Sunday-school can not be truly a Bible-school unless it is missionary. It is not enough that the leaders of a school assent to missions. To be missionary means to do missionary work. The children will never grow into the missionary ideal unless they can express that ideal by doing something. Children's Day offers the opportunity. To be true to our position as a people of the Book, we must harness up the Sunday-schools to the great command of the Book, "Go ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature."

Children's Day is Possible for Any School.

If your school is small that is all the more reason for the observance of Children's Day. You can make it a great, joyous day and get the whole community to attend. You can make it the event of the year. Your school will be happy and the neighborhood will be pleased because you have done something worth while. It is as possible to observe Children's Day as it is to conduct a successful Sunday-school picnic. It is a happier occasion for the children and the value to the child heart is unmeasured. It simply requires that some one with moderate ability in training children take it in charge and work patiently at it. Pick out some one with tact, who loves children, and put them to work. In hundreds of country Sunday-schools Children's Day is the high day of the year. The children enjoy it more than any other season. It is the bright spot of the year. No school can afford to miss it.

Our Sunday-schools in Foreign Lands Observe Children's Day.

Get in line! Monterey, Mexico, Sunday-school sends for Children's Day supplies; Australia ordered 1,000 copies of the exercise a month ago; Matanzas, Cuba, will observe Children's Day; Akita, Japan, always does; our Sunday-schools in Jamaica keep the day; we have already heard from England; Canada is preparing for the day, and Bolenge, Africa, will hold the children's festival. Ho! Ye sleepy Sunday-schools in America that have not yet ordered Children's Day supplies! Wake up! Don't let the ends of the earth lead our Lord's Sunday-school army! Get in line!

Adult Class an Avenue to Social Service

By W. D. Endres

Many Christian people who are also students of social problems and conditions are convinced that the church ought to do more than it does to promote social welfare. Church work has pretty generally been conducted without much thought of its vital relation to the community in which it is located. But we are now coming to see that there is a mutual obligation, and a recognition of the fact raises the problem of ways and means by which we can make ourselves effective in the community life. Churches are following time honored customs, official boards are conservative, many preachers are likewise conservative, indeed the entire machinery of the church has been made with a view to increase its own strength rather than to make itself a servant in the community. Under such circumstances what can be done? How can things be set going in such a way as to include this larger purpose? One way which is easy, available, and effective in nearly every church, is the Adult Bible Class.

Larger Obligation of the Church.

Obviously the first and greatest work to be done is to educate the church to a sense of its larger obligation. It must realize that it is a part of the business of Christian people, as such, to interest themselves in the social welfare, especially of the local community. This can most effectively come from those who are already in the church. What better and more genuine Christian service could the Adult Class do than this very thing? It is assumed that Christians have good hearts, then let the class instruct them that here is a righteous duty which they should seek to discharge.

But men must be interested in these problems as well as interested in them and I do not hesitate to say that this may legitimately come within the scope of the Adult Bible Class. We are in danger of overlooking the great fundamental importance of instruction. There is danger too of relying too confidently on the agencies we already have. The free public schools, the colleges and the universities, the press, the public library, and the lecture platform are the principal ones. But great as these things are they do not meet entirely the demands of the situation. Let us look at them for a moment. The vast majority of the children in the public schools do not pass beyond the grades. Maybe they get a peep into some very inferior text book on civics, maybe not. And even those who go to high school get no instruction worthy of consideration in any of the social sciences. When we remember also that only a fraction of those who finish high school ever go to college, and that the number is smaller still which goes on to the university, we begin to appreciate how great the number is which the schools fail to reach for our present purpose.

Utilizing the Power of the Press.

At this point the press comes to our rescue. But we must remember that only a portion of it is aiding our cause. Do not think that I do not value the power of the press. It has determined the outcome of elections, declared war, and overthrown governments. But it is not an agency of unmixed good. Its work tends to confuse and defeat quite as much as to instruct and promote. From the little county weekly to the great metropolitan daily, the real facts they set forth are so mingled with political prejudices and sensational accounts as to seriously cripple them as instructive agencies.

In the Magazines we get some good reliable information and fortunately they are widely read, but by no means by all, nor by as many as the daily paper. Of course, the great supply of good scientific books at moderate prices must not be overlooked. But it is astonishing how few of these are on the shelves of our smaller public libraries and how unsoiled are those which are there.

There remains the lecture platform with its good and evil. To be sure we have upon it the real leaders, thinkers, and instructors of our time. But we have also the spellbinder and the office seeker whose only interest is his personal success, and the grain of instruction if at all, is in a bushel of chaff. The last national campaign was conducted on a high plane, yet there was little dispassionate discussion of the issues aside from the work of President Taft and Mr. Bryan. It is perfectly evident that these combined agencies do not cover the ground. There is need, sore need, for wholesome instruction especially for those who are not effectively reached by those agencies discussed above, and their name is legion.

Bible Class an Opportunity.

Here then is an opportunity, yes a Christian obligation, not only to erect Christian ideals, but to impart actual knowledge of conditions and to consider ways and means to escape them. Why not study such problems as: child labor, the gainful employment of women, capitalism, trades unionism, housing in the cities, the family, municipal government, foreign population, etc., giving special attention to local conditions? With the ideal of our Lord before us, is not the time far better spent to study the sins and follies with which we are surrounded and which are working hardships on us every day, than to dwell upon the hypocrisies of the Scribes and Pharisees which happened on the other side of the globe more than twenty centuries ago? Could we use an hour to higher purpose than to lead a class of forty or fifty men to see the terrible results of child labor, pointing out its un-Christian fruits and help them to form resolutions to strike it whenever and wherever an opportunity is given? For us to neglect these vital things, and instead to pore over the phraseology of the New Testament, or even of Jesus, is to tithe mint and anise and cummin, and to neglect the weightier matters of justice and mercy.

Neither New Nor Impracticable.

Nor is this a new or an impracticable thing. There are scores of classes meeting in the churches at the Sunday-school hour and studying these problems with interest and righteous profit. There are helps within the reach of every such class. Professor Henderson's new book, Social Duties, published by the University of Chicago Press, is designed for this very purpose. It covers a wide and very interesting field, gives a good list of reference books, and sells at $1.25. Dr. Josiah Strong of New York is also writing a series of lessons on social problems which are published in the Homiletic Review and also in pamphlet form under the title, The Gospel of the Kingdom, which may be had for 50 cents per year. It has a list of reference books.

Such a class will thus have opened up a field of Christian activity, which until recently has been closed. Christianity will have a new and richer import. Things which were vague and indefinite will become tangible and real, and the individual will have a respect and a confidence in his religion which he had not before experienced. With the way thus opened for a practical application of Christian principles, those who attend such a class are almost sure to become actively interested in community affairs. And it is perfectly clear that a church which fosters such an institution to any reasonable extent can be of great practical service to the community in which it is located.

Paris as a Student Resort

By Kilbourne Cowles

Perhaps to the American just arrived in Paris, the modest little sign, "American Students Atelier Reunions," which may be seen outside a building on the Boulevard du Montparnasse every Sunday evening, means very little. But should the stranger happen to be remaining in Paris to study painting, sculpture, music or any of the arts that call so many of our young people across the sea, he or she will soon learn that the "Reunions" are an important feature of American student life in the Latin Quarter, which as everybody knows, is the stamping ground of students of most everything from most everywhere.

The meetings or reunions, are held in the Academy Vitti, an art school under the management of Signore and Signora Vitti, Italian teachers of painting. Many young men and woman who have drifted so far away from the life religious, that they would not bring themselves to enter a church, do most willingly and cheerfully find their way through the dimly lighted gate, and traversing a picturesque old courtyard, climb two long flights of stairs to the attic-like studio of the academy. There, for the most part, regardless of creeds or prejudices, they take part in the simple yet beautiful service, singing the dear old hymns, joining in the responsive reading, listening to the pastor's intersting and helpful address and enjoying the music that is always a feature of the evening and which is contributed by artists and very advanced students.

The picturesque raftered room adorned with sketches and hung with unfinished studies also adds its charm and gives an informal touch to the meetings which are usually crowded. Several hundred, with a remarkably large proportion of men, find seats in the body of the room, while a great many stand and others perch themselves at the back of the atelier upon boxes, easels and artists' stools pressed against the wall.

Cosmopolitan Audience.

The audience is interestingly cosmopolitan for while consisting mostly of Americans and Canadians, there is a large sprinkling of students of many other nationalities who have come, possible unbidden, but who are not refused a welcome in this little way station of hope and courage. Some of the boys and girls, for many seemed scarcely out of their teens, wearing the look of eager youthful enthusiasm, come, I fancied, from homes of wealth and refinem nt, but there are many others whose life here in gay, beautiful Paris, it could be plainly seen, is one of struggling poverty. Some whose talent gives promise of greatness are working bravely with brush, chisel, or pen, hoping for golden success, and others are laboring, sadly enough, with only the forlorn hope of earning enough to get home to America. Just here, let me say that students at home who are longing to come to Europe for greater advantages should be quite sure of the strength of their talents and the length of their purses before they set forth. It is a great mistake for parents to allow their sons or daughters to embark without being sure of sufficient means for the duration of the stay contemplated, for Paris is a long, long way from home and it is very hard to be poor and ill and even hungry in a foreign land. The minister in charge of the reunions, Rev. Ernest Warburton Shurtleff D. D. acts as an elder brother to all those of his great flock who are in any distress of mind, body or estate, and his home is a haven for the lonely or discouraged. He and Mrs. Shurtleff seem peculiarly fitted for the work here, being keenly sympathic in both the trails and triumphs of the students, helping them in every way possible in their times of need and rejoicing and encouraging them in their hours of success. They hold frequent receptions in their home to which the students may come, meet each other, make friends and feel that there is a wholesome, pleasant social side to their student life.

A Pastor to the Stranger.

It is no uncommon thing for Doctor and Mrs. Shurtleff to have sudden calls for immediate aid and I was told of a pathetic case, when one evening as the minister and his wife were going out to a studio dinner, they found as they opened their door a scrap of paper on which was written, "I am alone, sick, with no money—come to me." The name signed was strange to them but they went at once to the address given and found a very sick girl in a bare, cold room in which there had been no fire or food for a week. The girl had simply succumbed to hunger and cold and on the several occasions that she had attempted to get out of bed she had fainted. Although she had not attended the Vitti reunions, she knew of Dr. and Mrs. Shurtleff, and when she felt that she was facing death she begged their concierge to take the meager note that her weak fingers could pen and leave it at their door. They took charge of her immediately, providing every necessary comfort, and under their tender care, she soon grew well enough to continue her work. Her talent was great and with their help she quickly became able to support herself. Her gratitude was sincere, but she told these good friends frankly that she was not a Christian and never could be for she had long since lost her belief. Dr. Shurtleff asked her to come to the reunions in order that he might keep in touch with her and one night after several months' attendance, she said to him. "I am still an unbeliever, but I do love the hymns you sing here," and it was not so very long afterward that she went to him, confessing a regained faith, eep and earnest. Now she is a successful artist, married to one of her own profession and her home is one of happy Christianity.

There are many other such incidents that could be related were Dr. Shurtleff not so modest and did he not so carefully guard the secrets of those who come to him with their trouble. The bright side of the student life is quite as prominent if not more so, than the gloomy one, and Dr. nd Mrs. Shurtleff enjoy their association with the hundreds of clever, charming Americans in the students' quarter.

Shares Joys Also.

Fourteen years ago these atelier meetings were established by the Rev. Dr. Charles Wood, now of the church of the convenant, Washington, D. C. Coming here for a brief stay he found a lack of religious influence in the "American" Latin Quarter, and he gath-

This loving labor among he young Americans, is no part of foreign missions and is supported entirely by voluntary subscriptions.

An inconspicuous little box is placed in the atelier where students who can and wish, may drop coins and no other collection is made. Rev. Sylvester W. Beach, of the First Presbyterian Church, Princeton, N. J., who had charge of the reunions for a number of years, is the treasurer of the fund in America and Dr. Wood is chairman of the committee.

While our boys and girls attend these meetings, there is little danger of them becoming expatriated for the American holidays are always noted at the reunions. Frequently prominent Americans speak on these occasions as well as at the regular Sunday night gatherings. Among those who have shown a deep interest in the work and spoken, are: Mr. Henry White, the American Ambassador, President George Harris of Amherst, President Charles F. Thwing of the Western Reserve, Dr. Henry van Dyke of Princeton and Herr Pastor Charles Wagner, author of "The Simple Life," and who has written enthusiastically of the methods and aims of the atelier reunions.

Dr. van Dyke's Popularity.

Dr. Henry van Dyke, who has been lecturing at the Sorbonne (the University of Paris) this winter on "American Men of Letters," has certainly received an amount of appreciation that must have warmed his heart and made him feel that there is a literary tie that binds together the two great widely separated republics.

His lectures were given to overflo ing houses and French and Americans vied with each other in the matter of applause. His closing lecture was attended by a scene of enthusiasm that was more French than American in its tumultuousness and the Doctor was almost overwhelmed by the ovation given him. He bowed and smiled repeatedly and then as the furore continued he raised his hands in happy protest as the audience, carried away with admiration and good-will, continued to wave, clap and shout, "Vive le van Dyke!"

Before closing this letter I wish to mention the restlessness now apparent in Paris among the working classes. The postal and telegraphic strike is over, but there remains an air of unrest and many feel that the strike was essentially a sort of rehearsal for future and more serious demonstrations of the power of the people to upset government regulations; that it was merely for practice and for arousing a spirit of rebellion which will, sooner or later, bring about another upheaval equal to the terrible revolution.

The clericals think the trouble is due to the divorcing of state and church, and they charge the threatening tribulations of France to the growing disregard for the old Catholic religion. Be that as it may, the future of France is darkened by a cloud of dangerous discontent, and those Americans who love the bright, gay country cannot but feel a fear of what may come.

The Blade, the Ear and the Full Corn

By Arthur Holmes

In this day of masculine enthusiasm for things religious, the young minister who takes a city pulpit thinks much of men. His first impulse for them is the divinely paternal one of "working for men." With his young heart yearning and burning for that manly portion of the community which so largely lingers away from church, he sets himself to organize a men's Bible class in the Sunday-school. He takes it in charge himself. He prepares the lesson; teaches the lesson; writes personal letters; makes evening calls; button-holes men on the streets; reads the latest things on men's organizations and on the problems of men's worlds.

For every problem he has a solution; for every man's ill he has a proprietary panacea, bottled, corked, labeled, ready with the spoon to take it.

Working Capital and Temperament.

If he is a man of great capacity for work; with a strong emotional nature and plenty of time, he will surely build up a large class. Men of more or less parasitic disposition will gather around him, lean upon him, bring him their trials and woes, bask in the warmth of his stronger will, get what they can and keep on doing about the same as they have always done. His church will be known for its marvelous "men's work" and the megalomaniac soul of a little minister would be quite nicely satisfied.

If however, growth comes with experience and an analytic conscience compels him to measure results in terms of individual soul-growths, then he will some day inevitably be well nigh cast down. In the prayer of that moment, when his fine achievement appears nothing but the re-shifting of sand grains by the restless waves of the sea, there may come to his soul a great new thought. A brand new enthusiasm will be kindled by this brand new conception. Henceforth he goes forth girded with the motto: Work not for men but with men!

The brotherhood idea takes hold of him. It glows with a new meaning. He now works with his fellowmen; he is a brother to every man; he listens to instruction, and learns the wisdom of not knowing; he hears tales of woe; pours out sympathy for the working man and tears asunder his brain-cells over the problems of the employer. He goes into stores, offices and even work-shops, mingles with street crowds and in every way seeks, and believes he is finding, the throbbing hearts of his fellows.

At this stage he generally affects a change in his attire trying to conform more nearly to the every-day man's ways. This may proceed no farther than the wearing of a colored necktie or it may reach the limits of a nauseating wrestle with a strong cigar at a men's banquet. The new view expresses itself otherwise in the organization of a church brotherhood, the meetings of which he religiously attends. He talks economics, sociology, science, politics and labor problems.

Living Down to Men's Standard.

Again, if he has the capacity he will build up a big brotherhood and add a multitude to his congregation. Again, too, if he keeps on growing, there will come the sickening thought that after all, the crowd he has gathered are essentially untouched; they follow merely the diversion of the hour, a demagogue, a minister who has lived down to their standards of interest and expresses for them only the ideals which they feel but have no words to express.

In that second bitter hour of prayer another saving vision will graciously come to the earnest soul. This time it will be epitomized in the slogan: Men at work for men!

His former attitudes will be at once reversed. Out of his multitude of disciples he will select a few apostles. In these he will kindle a zeal for unselfish service away and beyond their daily meed of work or ordinary gifts for charity. With them he will labor until they catch a glimpse of his consuming inner fire and be willing, after a hard day's work, after all church service is done, after their share of expenses is paid, after the standards of their professions have been fully lived up to, after every admitted duty is fulfilled, still to call upon the deeps within themselves and add, in holy sacrifice, some bit more of service, altogether unselfish, never to be paid for, never to be appreciated by any one, even those for whom it is done.

This new impulse may express itself in a variety of organizations. Almost certainly it will not include the selfish one of merely adding to the home congregation. That motive for work is forever perished in the overwhelming tide of inspiring men everywhere to work for men anywhere.

The three stages just described are beautifully illustrated in the work done by the Church of the Ascension in New York city, under the supervision of Mr. Alexander Irvine.

The Meetings Described.

"To these evening services some working people came. Mr. Irvine preached about the things of which they wanted to hear. He preached of Socialism, of Morris and Ruskin first, then of some ideal commonwealths, those of Plato and Lycurgus, More's Utopia, Bacon's and the Brook Farm experiment.

"After a few weeks it was decided that there should be an aftermeeting at the close of the service. The first Sunday night thirty people stayed for the aftermeeting. It was held in the chapel informally. They talked about the sermon. . . . Soon some people began to come. . . . They were asked to speak.

"The meeting took on more formality. They are now conducted by a chairman who calls regularly upon three or four speakers for five minutes apiece, after which the discussion is thrown open to the audience.

"These are not cool meetings. Working people are not cool on economic questions."

Note that the first page is marked by the organization of a meeting at which Mr. Irvine preached for men; the next by the remarks on the sermon and participation by certain other speakers; then by the formation of a "people's forum," crowded with laboring people often incoherent; all thinking and coming into life intellectually, and asking why things are as they are with them; a large proportion of wage earners, and with them an increasing number of those who pay wages, wealthy pew-holders in the chruch, brought in touch with an aspect of life little known to them.*

Simplicity of Energy.

An almost entirely opposite expression of this same third attitude is to be found in the example quoted from Miss Richmond's little book: "Some clergymen who feel the call of the city fling themselves unselfishly into its life, but dissipate their energies by becoming directors of many boards, attending many meetings, and making many addresses on a great variety of topics. This was not his way. Having in mind always that the exercise and development of his members in his own congregation in the Christian life was his highest duty, he set himself to the task of studying first the needs of the city in which they lived; then the possibilities both social and spiritual of the many agencies created to meet these needs; and last the aptitudes and capacities of his people. The city was their workshop and into it he fed them freely, associating them with every uplifting work that was going forward. Some of his men visited prisons and became volunteer probation officers in charge of individual boys, others founded an equitable loan company for the poorer sort of borrowers, and many worked hard in municipal campaigns. . . .

"The church had no group of charitable buildings, no new charities to which it could point with pride; it was the city as a whole that bore eloquent witness of the power of his preaching. But in however many places outside church boundaries his people may have made their power felt, all the work that they did was religious work; they always so regarded it, and their first loyalty was always to their church and its leader. Sometimes it seemed to me, an on-looker, that he played upon the community as upon a great organ, drawing from it new and inspiring spiritual harmonies." **

In some bright, new day in the far future one more vision may come to dazzle the eyes of men. This will be the futility of men's work and the mighty effectiveness of boys' play. It may then be found that after all, the reapers have been exceedingly busy garnering the husks of the grain.

A Program for United Protestantism

Adopted by the Federation Gathering of Twenty-one Rhode Island Denominations.

1. A thorough study of the local field by the local church or churches in coöperation, with a new view to more adequate ministration to its every real need.

2. Definite attempts to combine weak, dependent churches, especially when of kindred basic polity or doctrines, for more effective pastoral services, the needs of the community being greater than local church or denominational interests.

3. Interdenominational coöperation particularly of kindred denominations, for a larger colportage or circuit ministry.

4. A new standard of ministerial equipment, measured not by the time honored requirements of the past, but by the demands of this age, with its new social and industrial problems.

5. A sincere and intelligent interest in the welfare of the working man, that he may secure for himself and his family the rights and privileges to which he is justly entitled.

6. Some definite basis of exchange of representatives of ministerial bodies and labor organizations, that each may learn the viewpoints and understand the problems of the other.

7. Discriminating study of the foreigner, avoiding the injustice of wholesale classification and criticism, and meeting the individual opportunities created by national and racial differences.

8. Open the church doors widely for the foreigner, and welcome his children in your Sunday-schools.

9. Denominational support of foreign churches where demanded, and interdenominational coöperation to meet the larger opportunities.

Aspects of a Spiritual Religion

By J. M. Lowe.

II. SPONTANEITY.

"Let your light so shine." It will shine if you will let it. The spiritual seeks evermore to permeate and control the common life.

"Neath the harsh noises of our day,
A low sweet prelude finds its way."

The good Quaker poet knew. That inner light, fed of course by the true light, led him on and out into a large and beautiful life. Growing old and weary, waving his hand, he said "my love to the world," and fell asleep. A scientist in Scotland, lying full length upon the ground, was studying a heatherbell. A highlander approaching said, "What are you doing?" "Studying this flower," said the scientist, "ever see one?" said he, pulling the flower from the ground and handing both it and the glass to the highlander. As the strong countryman studied the beautiful and delicate structure of the plant, a tear stood in his eye and he said, "I'm sorry you showed me this flower." "Why so?" "Because," said he "I have stepped on so many of them." Here is the spiritual history of the race in miniature. How many flowers of beauty and of grace have we stepped upon. How many sweet and gentle influences have come creeping modestly into our lives, and we have allowed some coarse brutal thought to crush them.

"Be still and know that I am God." He is not in the whirlwind but in the still small voice. Have you heard it? In sober truth, I have heard this inaudible voice from the throne room. It spoke unbidden and seemingly with its own organ of speech. God is busy within us and about us and our only safety and happiness lie in coöperation with Him. Our own physical growth from childhood was spontaneous. Our wills were not invited to assist, and our anxious appetites called loudly for building material. Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness for they shall be filled. Growth is God's way of bringing things to perfection. We tend the plant. Its growth is from God. It can be suppressed, it can be crushed, but no human power can lift it from the seed. How small a part has man in the growth of things. His work is to keep things out of the way. Let your light so shine.

There is somewhere a picture called "Life." It is of a frail nude child making its way painfully up a rough and rocky steep. How beautiful and how wonderfully suggestive! Dear precious life; it must come to its own, but against what odds! What a refined and delicate heart had the artist who made the picture. Asking no assistance yet this frail figure must climb higher and higher. Such is the spiritual life. We can understand Wordsworth when he says:

"Thanks to the human heart by which we live,
Thanks to its tenderness its joys and fears.
To me the meanest flower that blows can give Thoughts that do often lie too deep for tears."

Very like unto all of this is the coming of Jesus. Born in barren poverty like the woodland rose, plotted against in his boyhood by a crafty king, his public life beset by plots and intrigues, opposed by those who should have helped. Finally face to face with death, foreseen, deliberate death. Then the cruel nails, the stinging thorns, the agony. With what a struggle did love find its way into our world. Along such a crimson pathway of pain crept this child of heaven the son of his love. At last hidden in the grave from which bloomed the lily of an endless life. The thought overwhelms me. Although coming from my brain and flowing from my pen, it seems greater than a hundred lives like mine. It uplifts me. It transforms me. It redeems me from cruelty and meanness forever. Let this sweet strong love of God like a river flow into our lives. Like the kindling rays of morning, let it flood the windows of our souls. Like the hovering spirit of spring, let it cause our lives to bud, blossom and bear the precious fruit of immortality.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

What was the length of the Sabbath day mentioned in Genesis 2:1-3?

The author conceived of the work of creation as accomplished in six days of the ordinary length. The later view that such days were perhaps geological periods was certainly not in the mind of the writer nor of those to whom the records first came. The Hebrew people of the age from which the priestly account of creation comes had long since become accustomed to the week of seven days, based apparently upon Babylonian custom. Into such a week the whole scheme of creation is thrown by the writer, and the final day of that week is reserved for God's rest day.

How would you teach the traditional stories of the early part of Genesis to children?

In exactly the form in which they are given. The biblical narratives are admirably adapted to teach children the very truths which are most important for children of all ages to know. Parents and teachers need not be troubled because the Genesis stories do not present scientific facts. They present what is more important than merely scientific facts, namely, religious truths, and truth is always greater than fact. The child who is trained in the public school system of our present generation will lay aside the mere framework of these earliest Bible stories as soon as he arrives at years where they no longer have significance for him as narratives of actual events. But he will never lay aside the truths which they contain and of which they have proved themselves the most admirable vehicles in all literature. They teach the reality and nature of God, the worth of man as the greatest of all created beings, the moral discipline to which human life must be submitted if it is to be worthful, and the divine condemnation upon sin. These realities have never been taught more impressively than in the early narratives of Genesis. We do not go to these stories for scientific or historical facts but for religious instruction, and as such they will always be worth teaching just in the form in which we find them.

Why did Jesus speak of the Gentiles in the slighting way recorded in Matthew 6:32 and 10:5? B.

Jesus necessarily confined his own ministry and that of his first disciples to the Jewish people. To go among others would have been to dissipate their strength. It was not that other nations were not as dear to Jesus as the Jews, but he needed to complete his ministry in that one small section of the world in order that all the world might share the results of his completed task. More than this, the Jews were the people in whose history preparation had been made for such a message as the gospel. Jewish ideals of religion and conduct were much higher than those of the Gentile world. He forbade his disciples to go into the ways of the nations beyond Palestine until they were really prepared with the gospel message based on the redemptive facts of his own life and death.

> Will you please explain the last clause of John 12:40—"That they should not see with their eyes nor understand with their heart and I should heal them?" F. W. W.
> "Please explain Matthew 13:13-15." Inquirer.

These questions both concern the same type of utterance on the part of Jesus. They go back to the description of Isaiah's vision (Isa. 6:9-10), where the prophet was apparently bidden to harden the heart of Israel and close their eyes lest they should see, understand, repent, and be healed. A study of the prophet's vision shows clearly that this was not a command to harden the heart of the nation, but only a warning that such would apparently be the result of even the best work that Isaiah could do. He would often feel discouraged because the outcome of his ministry was so disappointing. Yet he must not despair, for such was likely to be the visible effect of all prophetic teaching. Jesus took up this text in Isaiah and applied it to his own ministry among the hostile Jewish people. His parables were intended not only to reveal but to conceal truth because he knew that many were listening to his words who had no intention of accepting his teaching but only of finding fault and hindering his efforts. So he adopted the method of teaching in parables because he could explain their meaning to the disciples who were sincere in their attachment to him, and for the rest they would seem to be merely harmless stories. Jesus knew quite well that the primary effect of much of his teaching was to turn men away from him because his plan of life, with its simplicity and the hardships it involved, was in such contrast with the political hopes of the nation who wished a Messiah who would establish a kingdom and restore the ancient glories of the people. To such the teaching of the Master must have brought disappointment and discontent. But fortunately there was a group of those whose hearts were opened to the truth and from these the message spread into all the world.

> What is the explanation of Luke 10:42 in which Jesus says of Mary, "One thing is needful, and Mary hath chosen that good part which shall not be taken away from her?" W.

Jesus did not underestimate the kindness of Martha's anxiety for his entertainment. His affection for her was probably as great as for her sister, and perhaps there was some justice in Martha's feeling that Mary was too absorbed in listening to the Master and did not take quite enough interest in household matters. But Jesus wanted to show both sisters that the interests of good housekeeping are not the only matters that need woman's attention, and for this reason he spoke approvingly of Mary's regard for his words. He could not be with them long, and it was worth while to give attention to what he had to say to them in those precious hours rather than to be so much absorbed in household matters, even when their kindly object was his entertainment. The one thing needful that Mary had chosen was of course the message of the kingdom which Jesus was everywhere concerned to make known.

Correspondence on the Religious Life

By George A. Campbell

My Recent Reading

THE RELIGION OF SOCIALISM.

The two faiths of today that have proselyting warmth are Christian Science and Socialism. Socialism a faith? That is what John Spargo tells us in his book, "The Spiritual Significance of Modern Socialism." I have never known a Christian Scientist that was a Socialist. Is it because the soul of man is incapable of two enthusiasms at once? Or is it that the mental makeup of the two devotees is radically different? Mr. Spargo's book is well written. He writes burning sentences. He likes Micah and Hosea and is like them. To him modern Socialism is what Carlyle saw when he wrote "An unspeakable religion is struggling to speak itself." The "unspeakable religion" has spoken in socialism. It is spiritual because it is the greatest uniting force that humanity has seen. Millions of people of most diverse habits and customs, of every nation have been rallied by it to a common passion—the passion of universal brotherhood. It, according to the author, gives the only hope and inspiration that saves from the crass materialism of the present day. In the religion of socialism there is plenty of room according to Mr. Spargo, for both him who believes in God or simply in the process of evolution. "The glorious comradeship of a great cause" is wide enough for the religion of the agnostic and the Episcopal bishop.

We commend the book to those who wish to know the inner fire of Socialism. It is a plea for events as well as a treatise.

A SCOTCH BIBLE CLASS.

The Scotch mind seems to have a peculiar love for theological religion. Calvin was not Scotch; but Calvinism is, or was, for I believe extreme Calvinism has passed. Sandy Scott's Bible Class published by Bonnel, Silver & Company, is a little book giving an ultimate view of a Bible class of a few hard-hearted Scotchmen. They consider the great doctrines of the Bible and problems of life with avidity and freshness.

There are a goodly number of quaint remarks by various members. The Scotch words are interpreted by foot notes.

A STRANGE VIEW OF GOD.

"The Living Word" by Elwood Worcester, is published by Moffat, Yard & Company. In the preface we are told that the inspiration of this book was Gustav Theodor Fechner, "one of the greatest and least appreciated thinkers of the nineteenth century." The author quotes Pfleiderer as pronouncing the three motives of Faith as given by Fechner the best argument for God which the nineteenth century produced. The three reasons briefly stated are:

1. I believe in the soul because all men have believed in it. This is the traditional motive.
2. I believe other men have souls because it is good thus to believe and dangerous to doubt. This is the practical motive.
3. I believe in the souls of other men because on the whole it is reasonable to believe it and unreasonable to doubt it. This is the rational view.

These same reasons are applied to the existence of God.

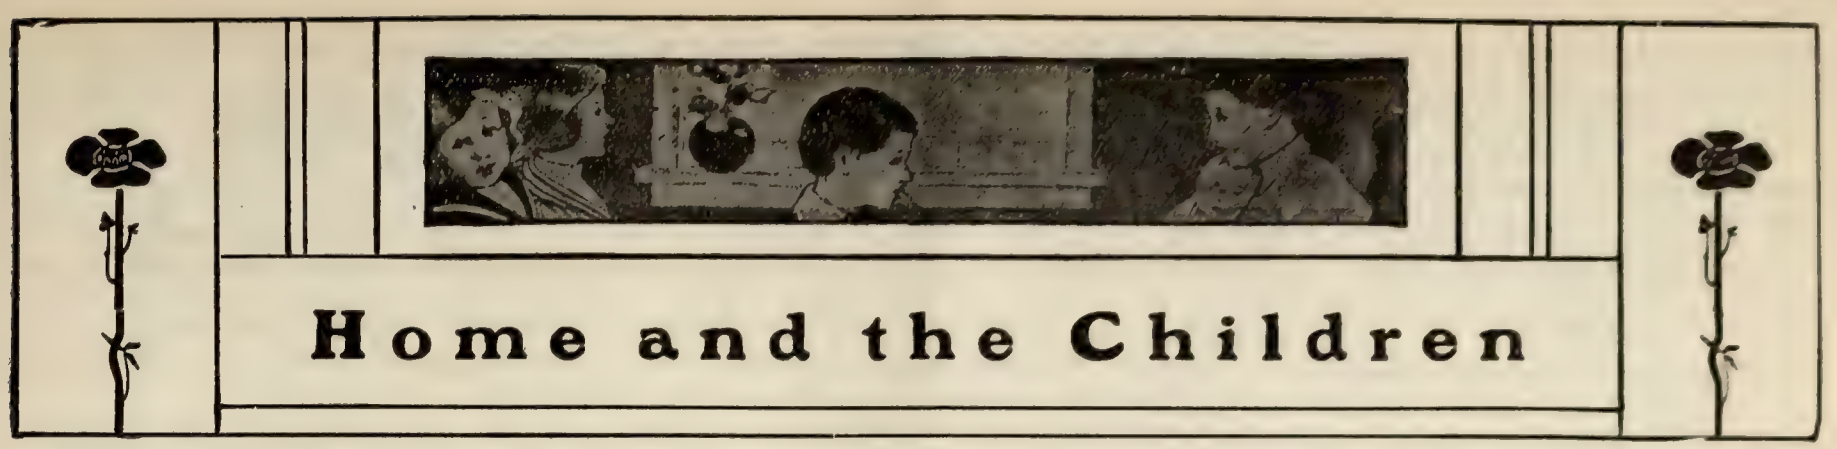
The Problem of Evil.

A book starting in thus cannot go far until it deals with the problems of evil. The one problem in religion is to have a good God. The scientific uncovering of the pain of nature has re-emphasized to our age the necessity of trying to harmonize the existing evil with the Christian idea of our altogether good God. The author realizes the momentousness of the problem. He knows that many noble souls in our day after a long search for light rest in hopeless sadness. As a foreword to his chapter on "The Goodness of God and the Evil of the World" he quotes Isaiah who represents God as saying, "I form the light and create darkness. I make peace and create evil. I the Lord do all these things." He thinks Isaiah would repudiate Zoroaster's doctrine of a good Ormuzd and a bad Ahriman. Also the doctrine of a devil who originates lies and tempts men.

"The devil explained is the devil dead." He contends further that if God created by his own choice evil, He is an evil Deity; and if he permitted evil when He might have prevented it He is a lazy Deity.

Is God the Source of Evil?

How then did evil arise? It comes not from God conscious or willing; but from the lower nature of God which in unconscious states gives off the bad that is all about us, just as man has impulses and passions which he does not will.



This theory to me is neither traditional, practical nor rational. I prefer to keep a great big black devil who is all but almighty if there is left us in this universe of complexities one Almighty being who is altogether good. To have a good-bad God is to have none. We cannot worship a God who out of his unconscious depths had evil springing, over which He has no control. The author fully appreciates a grave problem, but his hint throws no light upon it.

GOD'S GOOD WORLD.

"Steps Along the Pathway," by "Katharine H. Newcomb," published by Lothrope, Lee & Shepard Company, is another of that increasing number of books that plead for beautiful, practical lives. In these books the kind of a life our mothers lived, calm, cheerful, hopeful, trusting, religious, Christian, is made to rest upon "Metaphysical Principles." What are some of these principles? Seriously ask the meaning of your life? Do not fear. Be an inspiration to others. Trust. Love. Rest. Be positive. Say, "I am well." Don't be afraid of anything that presents itself as an obstacle.

All this is good. Whether the "Metaphysical Principles" gives the strength of character as just plain Christian teaching did may be questioned. Our mothers were strong, calm, splendid, without realizing it. However countless numbers would be infinitely helped if they would heed what the author says.

Too many are oppressed with complaining minds. They are negative, darkened souls. They need light and air. They need to cultivate good, clean, hopeful thinking. They need to believe vitally in God's good world.

Home and the Children

The Little Brown Dog

BY MAY ELLIS NICHOLS.

Little brown dog with the meek brown eyes,
Tell me the boon that most you prize.
Would a juicy bone meet your heart's desire?
Or a cozy rug by a blazing fire?
Or a sudden race with a truant cat?
Or a gentle word? or a friendly pat?
Is the worn-out ball you have always near
The dearest of all the things held dear?
Or is the home you left behind
The dream of bliss to your doggish mind?
But the little brown dog just shook his head
As if "None of these are best," he said.
A boy's clear whistle came from the street;
There's a wag of the tail and a twinkle of feet,
And the little brown dog did not even say,
"Excuse me, ma'am," as he scamped away;
But I'm sure as can be his greatest joy
Is just to trot behind that boy.

"Thank You"

I don't mean simply "Thanks!" or "Owh, Thanks!" or "Thanks, awful!" or any other cheap, "yellow-back" stuff that sometimes passes for gratitude, but that isn't worth the wind that it takes to make it. I mean the genuine article imported direct from the tropical regions of the heart, a real "Thank you!" that has a rich ring to it. Give a coolie a rupee and he immediately sounds it to ascertain whether it is genuine. So the genuineness of a "Thank you" is easily detected by the ring of it. It tells the difference between the real and the counterfeit.

A genuine "Thank you" is all to rare. Bogus ones are plentiful in so-called "tone society" where formal politeness is required. They may be as cold and formal and meaningless as "I'm sorry" but they are accepted at face value. But the genuine article coming from a real thankful heart, how nice it is. How good it makes the recipient feel even if his favour has not cost him much. But this is not all. It indicates so plainly the character of the one who says it.

So many people forget to say "Thank you." The other day I gave a fakir two annas. Not a salam or any other recognition of the favour escaped his lips. I called him back and made him return the money, just to teach him a lesson. I have seen hundreds of favours bestowed in European homes without any recognition.

These little civilities are often omitted in the home. A man receives some favour. If it is from some other man's wife he is profuse in expressions of gratitude. But if it is from his own wife he never thinks of recognizing the favour. Shame on him! But the wife may be as forgetful as the husband in this point. I know a family very different from this. The father and mother never forget to recognize a favour in the home. A button is sewed on, and a "Thank you" follows. A thousand other little accommodations receive their proper recognition. That sturdy rollicking boy is treated as politely as the father and mother treat each other, and he in turn says "Thank you" with such a sweet ring that it makes one's heart glad to hear him. And what a flavour this adds to the home life. This is worth a thousand times the trouble.

Then a "good morning," and "good night" passing between members of the family is all too rare, but when it is observed it adds so much to the refinement and home-i-ness of the home. It is indicative of refined character. It does far more than most people think in determining the future character of the children. Then, too, it makes the home so much happier.

Why should I not be more polite to my husband than to other people? Why should I not be more polite to my children than to those of other people If these little civilities are due to my friends they are surely due to my family. Would that we had more of them. —Witness.

My Little Minute Man

(Alice Francisco Ross in May St. Nicholas.)

I

I have a darling little son
Who never cared to have a gun.
He has red cheeks and sunny hair,
But never had a soldier's air.

If there should be a sudden raid,
And he were called upon for aid,
I greatly fear he'd run away,
Nor face the foe and win the day.

My little "Minute-man" is he,
And lest, perchance you may not see
Nor understand why he should wear
A name that none but soldiers bear—

The reason I will give to you:
When he is told some work to do,
"In just a minute," he replies,
But from his book lifts not his eyes.

If he is asked to shake the grate,
To bring a chair, or close the gate,
He does not hurry to begin it,
But always says: "Just in a minute."

And thus because he is so slow,
And when he's sent he does not go,
You see quite plainly why I can
Call him my little "Minute-man."

II.

I have another little son
Who always wished to have a gun,
He has red cheeks and sunny hair,
And quite a martial, soldier's air.

Although his heart might quake with fear,
Should there be danger lurking near,
He would not turn and run away,
But fight right well to win the day.

Yet not because he is so brave,
To him, also, this name I gave.
I've other reasons why I can
Call him my little "Minute-man."

This secret, too, I'll tell to you:
If he is asked some work to do,
"I will, this minute," he replies;
And off upon his errand hies.

If he is told to close the door,
Or bring a broom to sweep the floor,
He runs right quickly to begin it,
And has it done in just a minute.

And thus because he never waits,
Nor loiters, halts, nor hesitates,
You see quite plainly why I can
Call him my little "Minute-man."

Since one, when sent, is always slow,
The other always prompt to go,
We can be very certain, then,
There are two kinds of "Minute-men."

The "Just-a-minute" one, you see,
Is just the sort you shouldn't be,
When mother has some work to do,
And, needing help, has called on you.

The "Yes-this-minute!" Minute-man,
Who promptly does the best he can,
Will always have a host of friends,
For every one on him depends.

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XVI.

Maud Barrington Is Merciless.

Dane overtook the wagon close by the birch bluff at Silverdale Grange. It was late then, but there were lights in the windows that blinked beyond the trees, and, when the wagon stopped, Barrington stood in the entrance with one or two of his hired men. Accidents are not infrequent on the prairie, where surgical assistance is not always available, and there was a shutter ready on the ground beside him, for the Colonel had seen the field hospital in operation.

"Unhook the tailboard," he said sharply. "Two of you pick up the shutter. Four more here. Now, arms about his shoulders, hips, and knees. Lift and lower—step off with right foot, leading bearer, with your left in the rear!"

It was done in a few moments, and when the bearers passed into the big hall that rang with their shuffling steps, Maud Barrington shivered as she waited with her aunt in an inner room. Their trampling was horribly suggestive, and she had seen but little of sickness and grievous wounds. Still, the fact scarcely accounted for the painful throbbing of her heart, and the dizziness that came upon her. Then the bearers came in, panting, with Barrington and Dane behind them, and the girl was grateful to her aunt, who laid a hand upon her arm when she saw the singed head, and blackened face that was smeared with a ruddier tint, upon the shutter.

"Lower!" said Colonel Barrington. "Lift, as I told you," and the huddled object was laid upon the bed. Then there was silence until the impassive voice rose again.

"We shall not want you, Maud. Dane, you and I will get these burnt things off him."

The girl went out, and while she stood, feeling curiously chilly in an adjoining room, Barrington bent over his patient.

"Well put together!" he said thoughtfully. "Most of his people were lighter in the frame. Well, we can only oil the burns, and get a cold compress about his head. All intact, so far as I can see, and I fancy he'd pull through a good deal more than has happened to him. I am obliged for your assistance, but I need not keep you."

The men withdrew, and when a rattle of wheels rose from the prairie, Maud Barrington waylaid her uncle in the hall. Her fingers were trembling, and, though her voice was steady, the man glanced at her curiously as she asked, "How is he?"

"One can scarcely form an opinion yet," he said slowly. "He is burned here and there, and his head is badly cut, but it is the concussion that troubles me. A frantic horse kicks tolerably hard, you know, but I shall be able to tell you more when the doctor comes tomorrow. In the meanwhile you had better rest, though you could look in and see if your aunt wants anything in an hour or two."

Maud Barrington passed an hour in horrible impatience, and then stole quietly into the sick-room. The windows were open wide, and the shaded lamp burned unsteadily as the cool night breeze flowed in. Its dim light just touched the man who lay motionless with a bandage round his head, and the drawn pallor of his face once more sent a shiver through the girl. Then Miss Barrington rose and lifted a warning hand.

"Quite unconscious still," she said softly. "I fancy he was knocked down by one of the horses and trampled on, but your uncle has hopes of him. He has evidently led a healthy life."

The girl was a little less serene than usual then, and drew back into the shadow.

"Yes," she said. "We did not think so once."

Miss Barrington smiled curiously. "Are you very much astonished, Maud? Still, there is nothing you can do for me, and we shall want you tomorrow."

Realizing that there was no need for her, the girl went out, and when the door closed behind her the little white-haired lady bent down and gazed at her patient long and steadily. Then she shook her head, and moved back into the seat she had risen from with perplexity in her face.

In the meanwhile, Maud Barrington sat by the open window in her room staring out into the night. There was a whispering in the birch bluff, and the murmuring of leagues of grasses rose from the prairie that stretched away beyond it. Still, though the wind fanned her throbbing forehead with a pleasant coolness, the nocturnal harmonies awoke no response in her. Sleep was out of the question, for her brain was in a whirl of sensations, through which fear came uppermost every now and then. Why anything which could befall this man who had come out of the obscurity, and was, he had told her, to go back into it again, should disturb her, Maud Barrington did not know; but there was no disguising the fact that she would feel his loss grievously, as others at Silverdale would do. Then with a little tremor she wondered whether they must lose him, and rising stood tensely still, listening for any sound from the room where the sick man lay.

There was nothing but the sighing of the grasses outside and the murmur of the birches in the bluff, until the doleful howl of a coyote sent its cry out upon the wind, and the girl trembled as she listened. The unearthly wail seemed charged with augury, and every nerve in her thrilled.

Then she sank down into her chair again, and sat still, hoping, listening, fearing, and wondering when the day would come, until at last her eyes grew heavy, and it was with a start that she roused herself when a rattle of wheels came up out of the prairie in the early morning. Then a spume-flecked team swept up to the house, a door swung open, there was a murmur of voices and a sound of feet that moved softly in the hall, after which, for what seemed an interminable time, silence reigned again. At last, when the stealthy patter of feet recommenced, the girl slipped down the stairway and came upon Barrington. Still, she could not ask the question that was trembling on her lips.

"Is there anything I can do?" she said.

Barrington shook his head. "Not now! The doctor is here, and does not seem very anxious about him. The concussion is not apparently serious, and his other injuries will not trouble him much."

Maud Barrington said nothing and turned away, sensible of a great relief, while her aunt entering her room an hour later found her lying fast asleep, but still dressed as she had last seen her. Then, being a discerning woman, she went out softly with a curious smile, and did not at any time mention what she had seen.

It was that evening, and Barrington had departed suddenly on business to Winnipeg, when Dane rode up to the Grange. He asked for Miss Barrington and her niece, and when he heard that his comrade was recovering sensibility, sat down looking very grave.

"I have something to tell you, but Courthorne must not know until he is better, while I'm not sure that we need tell him then," he said. "In the meanwhile, I am also inclined to fancy it would be better kept from Colonel Barrington on his return. It is the first time anything of the kind has happened at Silverdale, and it would hurt him horribly, which decided us to come first to you."

"You must be more concise," said Miss Barrington quietly, and Dane trifled with the hat in his hand.

"It is," he said, "a most unpleasant thing, and is known to three men only, of whom I am one. We have also arranged that nobody else will chance upon what we have discovered. You see, Ferris is unfortunately connected with you, and his people have had trouble enough already."

"Ferris?" said Maud Barrington, with a sudden hardening of her face. "You surely don't mean——"

Dane nodded. "Yes," he said reluctantly. "I'm afraid I do. Now, if you will listen to me for a minute or two."

He told his story with a grim, convincing quietness, and the blood crept into the girl's cheeks as she followed his discoveries step by step. Glancing at her aunt, she saw that there was horror as well as belief in the gentle lady's face.

"Then," she said, with cold incisiveness, "Ferris cannot stay here, and he shall be punished."

"No," said Dane. "We have no room for a lad of his disposition at Silverdale—but I'm very uncertain in regard to the rest. You see, it couldn't be done without attracting attention—and I have the honor of knowing his mother. You will remember how she lost another son. That is why I did not tell Colonel Barrington. He is a trifle—precipitate—occasionally."

Miss Barrington glanced at him gratefully. "You have done wisely," she said. "Ethel Ferris has borne enough, and she has never been the same since the horrible night they brought Frank home, for she knew how he came by his death, though the coroner brought it in misadventure. I also fancy my brother would be implacable in a case like this, though how far I am warranted in keeping the facts from him I do not know."

Dane nodded gravely. "We leave that to you. You will, however, remember what happened once before. We cannot go through what we did then again."

Miss Barrington recalled the formal court-martial that had once been held in the hall of the Grange, when every man in the settlement had been summoned to attend, for there were offenses in regard to which her brother was inflexible. When it was over and the disgraced man went forth an outcast, a full account of the proceedings had been forwarded to those at home who had hoped for much from him.

"No," she said. "For the sake of the woman who sent him here we must stop sh-rt of that."

Then Maud Barrington looked at them both. "There is one person you do not seem to consider at all, and that is the man who lies here in peril through Ferris' fault," she said. "Is there nothing due to him?"

Dane noticed the sternness in her eyes, and glanced as if for support towards Miss Barrington. "I fancy he would be the last to claim it if he knew what we do. Still, in the meanwhile, I leave the affair to your aunt and you. We would like to have your views before doing anything further."

out, Maud Barrington sat down at a writing-table. "Aunt," she said quietly, "I will ask Ferris to come here at once."

It was next day when Ferris came, evidently ill at ease, though he greeted Miss Barrington with elaborate courtesy, and would have done the same with her niece, but the girl turned from him with visible disdain.

"Sit down," she said coldly. "Colonel Barrington is away, but his sister will take his place, and after him I have the largest stake in the welfare of Silverdale. Now, a story has come to our ears which if it had not been substantiated would have appeared incredible. Shall Miss Barrington tell it you?"

Ferris, who was a very young man, flushed, but the color faded and left his cheeks a trifle gray. He was not a very prepossessing lad, for it requires a better physique than he was endowed with to bear the stamp of viciousness that is usually most noticeable on the feeble, but he was distinguished by a trace of arrogance that not infrequently served him as well as resolution.

"If it would not inconvenience Miss Barrington, it would help me to understand a good deal I can find no meaning for now," he said.

The elder lady's face grew sterner, and very quietly but remorselessly she set forth his offense, until no one who heard the tale could have doubted the origin of the fire.

"I should have been better pleased, had you, if only when you saw we knew everything, appeared willing to confess your fault and make amends," she said.

Ferris laughed as ironically as he dared under the eyes which had lost their gentleness. "You will pardon me for telling you that I have no intention of admitting it now. That you should be so readily prejudiced against me is not gratifying, but, you see, nobody could take any steps without positive proof of the story, and my word is at least as credible as that of the interloper who told it you."

Maud Barrington raised her head suddenly, and looked at him with a curious light in her eyes, but the elder lady made a little gesture of deprecation.

"Mr. Courthorne has told us nothing," she said. "Still, three gentlemen whose worth is known at Silverdale are willing to certify every point of it. If we lay the affair before Colonel Barrington, you will have an opportunity of standing face to face with them."

The lad's assurance, which, so far and no further, did duty for courage, deserted him. He was evidently not prepared to be made the subject of another court-martial, and the hand he laid on the table in front of him trembled a little.

"Madam," he said hoarsely, "if I admit everything what will you do?"

"Nothing," said Maud Barrington coldly. "On condition that within a month you leave Silverdale."

Ferris stared at her. "You can't mean that. You see, I'm fond of farming. and nobody would give me what the place cost me. I couldn't live among the outside settler fellows."

The girl smiled coldly. "I mean exactly what you heard, and, if you do not enlighten them, the settlers would probably not object to you. Your farm will be taken over at what you gave for it."

Ferris stood up. "I am going to make a last appeal. Silverdale's the only place fit for a gentleman to live in in Canada, and I want to stay here. You don't know what it would cost me to go away, and I'd do anything for reparation—send a big check to a Winnipeg hospital and starve myself to make up for it if that would content you. Only, don't send me away."

His tone grew almost abject as he proceeded, and while Miss Barrington's eyes softened, her niece's heart grew harder because of it, as she remembered that he had brought a strong man down.

"No," she said dryly. "That would punish your mother and sisters from whom you would cajole the money. You can decide between leaving Silverdale, and having the story, and the proof of it, put into the hands of Colonel Barrington."

She sat near an open window regarding him with quiet scorn, and the light that shone upon her struck a sparkle from her hair and set the rounded cheek and neck gleaming like ivory. The severity of her pose became her, and the lad's callow desire that had driven him to his ruin stirred him to impotent rage in his desperation. There were gray patches in his cheeks, and his voice was strained and hoarse.

"You have no mercy on me because I struck at him," he said. "The one thing I shall always be sorry for is that I failed, and I would go away with pleasure if the horse had trampled the life out of him. Well, there was a time when you could have made what you wished out of me, and now, at least, I shall not see the blackleg you have showered your favors on drag you down to the mire he came from."

Maud Barrington's face had grown very colorless, but she said nothing, and her aunt rose and raised the hammer of a gong.

"Ferris," she said. "Do you wish to be led out by the hired men?"

The lad laughed, and the hideous merriment set the white-haired lady's nerves on edge. "Oh, I am going now, but, for once, let us be honest. It was for her I did it, and if it had been any other man I had injured, she would have forgiven me."

Then with an ironical farewell he swung out of the room, and the two women exchanged glances when the door closed noisily behind him. Miss Barrington was flushed with anger, but her niece's face was paler than usual.

"Are there men like him?" she said.

Miss Barrington shook off her anger, and rising, laid a gentle hand on her niece's shoulder. "Very few, I hope," she said. "Still, it would be better if we sent word to Dane. You would not care for that tale to spread?"

For a moment the girl's cheek's flamed, then she rose quietly and crossed the room.

"No," she said, and her aunt stood still, apparently lost in contemplation, after the door swung softly to. Then she sat down at the writing table. There was very little in the note, but an hour after Dane received it that night, a wagon drew up outside Ferris's farm. Two men went quietly in and found the owner of the homestead sitting with a sheaf of papers scattered about the table in front of him.

"Come back tomorrow. I can't be worried now," he said. "Well, why the devil don't you go?"

Dane laid a hand on his shoulder. "We are waiting for you. You are coming with us!"

Ferris turned, and stared at them. "Where to?"

"To the railroad," Dane said dryly. After that you can go just where it pleases you. Now, there's no use, whatever, making a fuss, and every care will be taken of your property until you can arrange to dispose of it. Hadn't you better get ready?"

The grim quietness of the voice was sufficient, and Ferris, who saw that force would be used if it was necessary, decided that it was scarcely likely his hired men would support him.

"I might have expected it!" he said. "Of course, it was imprudent to speak the truth to our leader's niece. You know what I have done?"

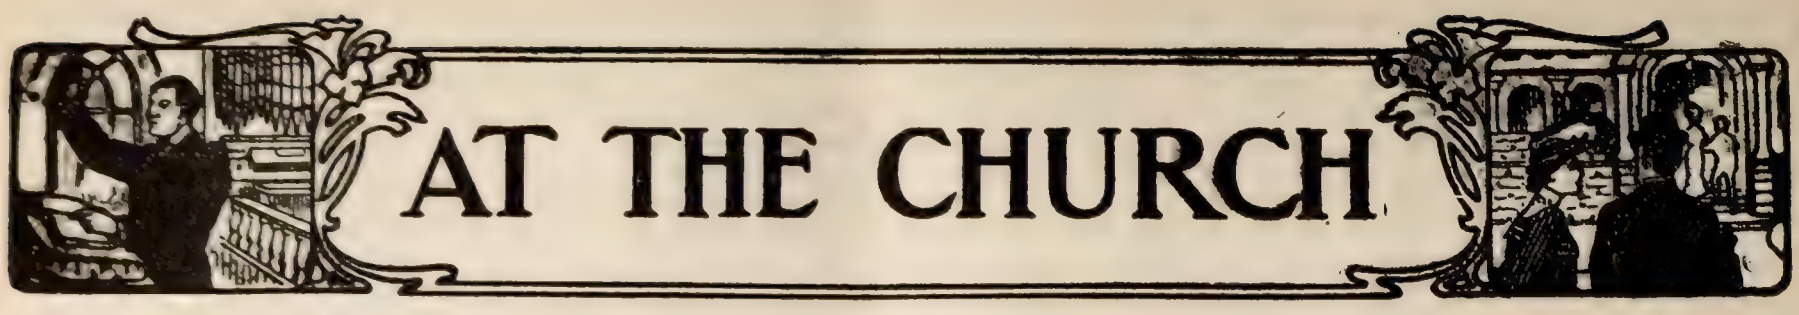
"I know what you did the night Courthorne nearly lost his life," said Dane. "One would have fancied that would have contented you."

"Well," said Ferris, "if you would like to hear of a more serious offense, I'll oblige you."

Dane's finger closed on his arm. "If you attempt to tell me, I'll break your head for you."

Next moment Ferris was lifted from his chair, and in less than ten minutes Dane thrust him into the wagon, where another man, who passed a hand through his arm, sat beside him. It was a very long drive to the railroad, but few words were exchanged during it, and when they reached the settlement one of Ferris's companions mounted guard outside the hotel he found accommodation in, until the Montreal express crawled up above the rim of the prairie. Then both went with him to the station, and as the long cars rolled in Dane turned quietly to the lad.

"Now, I am quite aware that we are incurring some responsibility, so you need not waste your breath," he said. "There are, however, lawyers in Winnipeg, if you fancy it is advisable to make use of them, and you know where I and Macdonald are, if you want us. In the meanwhile, your farm will be run better than it ever was in your hands, until you dispose of it. That is all I have to tell you, except that if any undesirable version of the affair gets about, Courthorne or I will assuredly find you."



Then there was a scream of the whistle, and the train rolled away with Ferris standing white with fury on the platform of a car.

In the meanwhile Maud Barrington spent a sleepless night. Ferris's taunt had reached its mark, and she realized with confusion that it was the truth he spoke. The fact that brought the blood to her cheeks would no longer be hidden, and she knew it was a longing to punish the lad who had struck down the man she loved that had led to her insistence on the former leaving Silverdale. It was a difficult admission, but she made it that night. The outcast who had stepped out of the obscurity, and into her peaceful life, had shown himself a man that any woman might be proud to mate with, and, though he had said very little, and now and then his words were bitter, she knew that he loved her. Whatever he had done, and she felt against all the teachings of her reason that it had not been evil, he had shown himself the equal of the best at Silverdale, and she laughed as she wondered which of the men there she could set in the balance against him. Then she shivered a little, remembering that there was a barrier whose extent he alone realized between them, and wondered vaguely what the future would bring. (To be continued.)

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

Uselessness of Faith Alone

The studies of the Book of Acts, which have proved so interesting thus far through the year, are at this lesson interrupted with three lessons taken from the Epistles, two from James and one from Hebrews. It was probably the intention of the lesson committee to follow the story of the Jerusalem conference where the question of Gentile believers was discussed and settled, with these lessons which deal with the practical application of Christianity to human life, and especially with the significance of Paul's doctrine of faith as the indispensable ground of pardon and hope. These three lessons are followed by a review and the temperance study which complete the quarter.

Violation of Pedagogical Principles.

Teachers may find some difficulty in passing abruptly from the interesting narratives of Acts to the discussions of James and Hebrews. The mistake of such a method has long been apparent to those who have used the International Lesson Series. The Book of Acts can be admirably taught to one grade of pupils who are totally unprepared for the Epistles, and to mingle two such contrasting types of Scripture in the curriculum of the same grade of pupils is to violate every pedagogical principle. But our purpose is to make the best of the situation and to wait for better days when the character of the child mind, so well understood by teachers in every other line of instruction, shall be sufficiently recognized in the Sunday-school to avoid experiences of this order.

The Book of James is quite generally believed to be one of the earliest documents of the New Testament. There are, to be sure, suggestions in the book itself of a late date. But the balance of impression seems to be in favor of the earlier time, between 45 and 52 A. D. Of the four different men bearing the name James, who are named in the New Testament, only one can be the writer of this brief book. The apostle James is excluded by his early death. Tradition, which early fixed upon James the brother of the Lord as the writer, seems sufficiently vindicated by the contents of the book.

James' Prestige in the Early Church.

In our last lesson James was seen as the chief figure in the Jerusalem church, held in reverence by all of its members as well as by the Jewish community outside. His family relationship to Jesus and the loftiness of his personal character gave him a position of undisputed priority among the disciples, particularly after Peter's association with the Gentiles, which must have caused no little prejudice among the conservatives. Of James' early career very little is known. He is mentioned among Jesus' four brothers—James, Joseph, Simon, and Judas; and Paul (I Corinthians 15) affirms that to James Jesus appeared after his death. Perhaps such an experience was needed to dissipate the doubts which had separated the brother of Jesus from the disciples during our Lord's ministry.

Close Similarity to Wisdom Literature.

The book itself shows the strong impression of Jewish environment and teaching. In its form it seems more closely related to the wisdom literature of the Old Testament than to the prophetic. And this is at once an indication of the dependence of James in thought and in expression upon the words of Jesus. The latter, while they share the spirit and enforce the teachings of the prophets, are in their method and style far more closely related to the proverb-like messages of the sages. The book of James is not a systematic treatment of any question. It is rather a series of brief and pregnant utterances upon practical matters connected with conduct. It puts almost no stress upon doctrines of any sort, but insists that the faith of Jesus is to be held as a living reality, bringing forth the fruits of modesty, humility, and self-restraint in Christian life.

Does James Contradict Paul?

One of the favorite inquiries of the church particularly in the Reformation period, was whether the teachings of Paul, who so strongly emphasized faith and deprecated dependence upon works of the law, do not directly contradict those of James, who with equal emphasis insists that faith is useless standing alone, and that works are the chief element in salvation. Indeed, some commentators went so far as to advocate the view that James, writing, as they supposed, after Paul's epistles had begun to circulate, was throwing all the force of his influence and teaching against what he regarded as the harmful doctrine of the apostle, who would absolve men from obedience to law and would magnify the saving power of faith alone. Others have tried to argue that Paul, writing later than James, was endeavoring to counteract the effect of the latter's teaching that works were effective in securing salvation, and threw his powerful personality into the advocacy of faith as a means of grace.

No Disagreement.

Neither view is correct, and both are based upon that common mistake—the failure to understand what each of these two New Testament writers meant by the terms he used. Paul, who had found that salvation did not consist in obedience to the laws, recorded in the Old Testament, but did rest upon the apprehension of Jesus and loyal submission to his progam of life, felt that no words should be spared in making men understand the glory of that freedom from the bondage of legal rites which to him was like a resurrection from the dead. On the other hand, James was troubled by the fact that there were people in the church of his day who insisted that mere belief in Jesus was sufficient without any practical outcome in life; that if one confessed the Lord and could say with reasonable confidence that he believed in his divinity, this was sufficient. Against such a false and heretical view James argues with all the force of his nature. By "works" Paul meant adherence to legal institutes which had no value for character. James means by "works" those natural fruits of the Christian life which are the indispensable proofs that a man has accepted the leadership of Jesus and is seeking to imitate him in spirit and in life. There is no disagreement between the two writers.

Faith and Works.

In the long history of the church these two elements of Christian life have ever been closely related. There have been some periods which emphasized faith at the expense of its practical outworkings in life. No more dangerous heresy could be propagated than that which makes salvation contingent upon the intellectual acceptance of doctrines, even the most profoundly true ones. A man is neither better nor worse for believing intellectually that Jesus of Nazareth is God's son. That confession might be made by him every day throughout his life and yet his conduct never be lifted out of selfishness and sin. It is only as this faith blossoms into obedience and character that it has any significance. On the other hand, one might imitate the virtues of the Christian life without any real conviction of their value. And there have been times in which the church has seemed to emphasize an outward conformity that remained wholly superficial and meaningless. Against this the noblest spirits in the church from Paul's day to ours have protested. It is not eloquence nor tongues nor preaching nor benevolence nor even martyrdom that can avail without love. And love is the outpouring of faith in Christ. Love, therefore, and its fruits, faith and its works, are indispensable counterparts. Faith and works have often been likened to the two oars of a boat. With either one alone the boat only travels in useless circles. But with both it goes straight on its way.

Abraham's Children.

The writer of this epistle emphasizes strongly the significance of Abraham as the father of the faithful, not merely because he believed in God but because he actually wrought out his faith in character. The Jew who prided himself on descent from Abraham and counted this the open sesame to salvation was shown that there was no value in faith alone even to Abraham, but only in faith as it voiced itself in life. Using the same illustration of Abraham's faith, Paul showed that it is not by works of merit, by prayers or fasting or the mortification of the flesh, that God is pleased, but by the faith that works through love.

Rahab's Faith.

Rahab, the woman of Jericho, is another illustration used by James. She believed the story told her by the spies concerning the coming of Israel and the impending capture of Jericho, but her faith in the message of her guests would have been of no avail had she not been at pains to provide for them and to secure their promise that she and her family should remain unmolested in the sack of the city. So evermore is faith made effective through character. Indeed salvation is character; there is no salvation save that which comes from gaining the character made possible of attainment through faith in and obedience to our Lord.

PRAYER MEETING

By Silas Jones

THE UNITY OF THE SPIRIT IN THE BOND OF PEACE.

Topic, May 26. Eph. 3:14; 4:16.

Unity of the Spirit awaits the complete triumph of democracy in the church. The remedy for the divided state of Protestantism is spiritual enfranchisement for all, not a return to the principle of authority enunciated by the church of the middle ages. If unity cannot be attained through love of truth, through enlightenment, spiritual insight, deliverance from the bondage to sin, and the desire to use all available means for the Christian conquest of the world, it is an idle dream and we ought to let it pass from our thought. When the members of the churches really desire unity and are fit for the responsibilities of the church universal the divisions now much discussed and regretted will disappear.

One Body.

The church of the New Testament is one body, animated by one Spirit, and inspired by one hope. It acknowledges one Lord in whom it trusts and it gives expression to its unity by one baptism. Exalted above it and working through it and dwelling in it is one God the Father of all. In this age of commercial and industrial combinations the advantages of a united church are obvious. There would be a saving in money. Where now there are two, three, or four church buildings there would be one. The election of school directors would be disconnected from religious controversy. The preachers would have more time to preach the gospel and they would not be required to expose the heresy of the neighbor preacher. Of course this would necessitate a higher type of preacher. When a fight is between two churches a man can easily please his hearers even if his spiritual perceptions are dull. But when there is an uncomplicated fight against wickedness alone a man of high qualities is needed for leadership. The notion that we have to be sectarian in order to keep alive interest in the church is repugnant to sound Christian sentiment.

Many Members.

The useful man knows his task and is busy with it. He is therefore not denouncing others on account of their success. One who attempts work for which he is unfitted becomes dissatisfied with himself and with everybody else who is not a failure. He has not learned that no occupation is honorable unless a man is fitted for it. Of course there is sometimes friction between two capable men. It is worse than useless, it is wicked to invite strife by insisting that two strong men whose methods are at variance shall stand side by side at the same task. If the situation is such that they must work together they and others should make the best of it, but they should be far apart whenever it is possible. Then will each contribute his share to the progress of religion and each will respect the other. Unity does not mean that individual differences shall be ignored. It does mean that we shall appreciate service wherever and however it is rendered. The officious person who has no word of commendation for service that is done as he would not do it and who is trying to remake the world to suit his notions should be suppressed by the united action of all Christian people. Such a person destroys the peace and unity of the church. The early church had apostles and prophets and teachers. These were all commissioned to deliver the same message of life but they did not all follow one method. Paul could rejoice at the progress of the gospel even when men hostile to him aided in the preaching. He was not pleased with the motive but he approved the good result.

The Perfecting of the Saints.

Teachers and preachers are in the church for the purpose of building up the body of Christ. All the activities of the church that are worthy of encouragement have this end in view. We have therefore a standard by which to judge men and organizations. The question for us to consider in connection with a proposed enterprise is not whether it suits our convenience or whether it leads into new paths or along old ones but whether it will result in an increase of righteousness and love. Christians should get into the habit of looking at everything with reference to the matter of service. If one has a fondness for novelty and another for the familiar there can be no unity, but if all are concerned first of all for the progress of the gospel there will be unity.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

LESSONS FROM THE BIRDS AND FLOWERS

Topic, May 23, 1909. Luke 12:24-28.

One can quote scripture for almost anything. The saloon-keeper tells the story of how Jesus changed water into wine as a support for his business. The seeker for divorce could quote his words on the disruption of the family. The advocate of war would recall the sentence, "I have come not to bring peace, but a sword." The get-rich-quick schemer would remember the parable of the unjust steward. So the man who whittles before the corner grocery, or the college student who lives supinely off the "old man," or the girl whose feet know not the straight and narrow path to the kitchen might find the words, "they toil not, neither do they spin" ample justification for their course. But idleness is not the lesson to be learned from birds and flowers, nor does Jesus mean to teach it any more than drunkenness or dishonesty.

Jesus was a master interpreter of nature. The other side to his aversion to working miracles was his finding God manifest in those things which were perfectly natural.

God Seen in Growth.

When he wishes a final analogy for his fundamental teaching, the conception of the Kingdom of God, he goes to the natural growth of the fields and takes from them the picture, "first the blade, then the ear, after that the full corn in the ear."

"Consider the lilies, how they grow." The next verse reveals the fact that God is the one who clothes them. As God is behind every flower and his divine wisdom is producing the beautiful forms of lily and rose, so God had ordered the world in such manner that men are provided with food and clothes, and placed under laws which should make for noble and beautiful forms. Poverty and starvation are due mostly to society, not to God. Did you ever stop to think of the fact that many people have not to eat and wear because others are trying to help God, so to speak; to help Him provide themselves with more than they need.

Thus Jesus teaches us that as God has provided the things of the body, so man is not to give his whole mind to thoughts of and plans for Bodily Blessings.

Bodily blessings are but secondary things, food and drink and raiment are but machinery with which to work out the higher life. One should eat to live. One should be as well clothed as possible because that which is beautiful is closely akin to that which is good. But to live for these things is to be no better than the Roman degenerate who sits in his villa and gives his whole thought to his clothing and his meals. Jesus' teaching is that if men are industrious, sober, honest and righteous, the matters of bread and drink and clothing will all come of themselves. And barring some exceptions this rule will be found to be universally true.

The dual lesson of Jesus from the birds and flowers is that if we live for those things which fit one to be in the Kingdom of God, material things will not only largely take care of themselves, but we will find in our lives a growth of God's plans as beautiful as is the growth which produces the leaves of the flower.

God's plans like lilies pure and white unfold,
We must not tear the close shut leaves apart.
Time will reveal the calyx of gold
And when we reach that better land
Where tired feet with sandles loosed may rest,
I am sure we shall all say, "God knew best."

Twelve Little Boys

There are twelve little boys I would tell you about (Just think what a dreadful noise);
They are all of an age, just three and a half,
These twelve little blue-eyed boys.

There's a doctor, a preacher, a farmer lad,
And one is a soldier bold,
Who rides about with his pistol and sword,
Like the frog in the story of old.

There's the acrobat boy, with his heels in the air;
But I think and so would you,
That the sweetest of all is the boy who sings
"Two Little Girls in Blue."

Sweetest of all, did I say? There's one
Who sits—dear little man—
Just "thinking of mother" the red lips say,
As only a baby can.

There is one little boy, I am sorry to say,
Who will cry and pout and fret;
Who likens himself to a "bad, bad man,
Who loves no one," and yet

Somehow we think that he loves us all:
For the clouds soon pass away,
And a sweet smile dimples the tear-stained face,
Like a sunbeam gone astray.

There is "auntie's sweetheart" and "uncle's boy,"
And "brother's little brother,"
And "father's man"—I think you scarce
Could find just such another.

But when the hour comes for the good-night kiss
To these laddies so precious to me,
I find just one poor tired little boy,
As sleepy as sleepy can be.

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

LESSON XVIII. THE KINDERGARTEN CHILD

I. SPECIFIC AIMS OF KINDERGARTEN TEACHING. There are certain ends which the kindergarten teacher should keep clearly before her. (1) The impartation by Bible stories, songs, nature studies and brief memory verses of the simpler spiritual truths about the strong and good God who makes and sustains all the beautiful and wonderful things in the world and about His Son Jesus, the Friend and Helper of little children. (2) The formation of the more fundamental moral habits of obedience, unselfishness, happiness, etc. This implies the beginnings of discipline in the control of the egotistic tendencies of the child. (3) The development of such religious emotions as awe, reverence and trust. The children should come out of the kindergarten with an unclouded conviction that they are in the arms of the Great Loving Father who knows and can do everything, who loves them and wants to be loved and trusted by them in return.

II. REQUIREMENTS OF THE LESSON. The following elements will be present in every well taught kindergarten lesson:

1. SOMETHING TO WONDER AT. The wonderful and unknown is fascinating to children because it gives free scope to their imagination and belongs to their instinctive interests. The "wonder" stories of the Bible are perfect models of this class of lesson material. Do not stop to explain too much; the child will form its own mental picture in spite of your explanations, which will only confuse it. "I can understand well enough if you would not explain so much," said a little boy to his mother.

2. SOMETHING TO ASK ABOUT. This links the lesson on to the curiosity of the child. The more questions, asked with a real desire to know, that are provoked by the lesson, the more successful it is. It must be remembered that curiosity in the kindergarten age is in objects, their origins and uses, and not at all in ideas and their relations, and the teacher need not be discouraged if the class is not curious about what she considers the vital point of the lesson, which is probably too abstract for their young minds.

3. SOMETHING TO REMEMBER. The kindergarten age is the period of absorption, when the little soul is laying in stores to be organized into knowledge later on; hence in every lesson there should be something which the children are expected to remember and be questioned about on the following Sunday. To this end the lesson should be presented in the form of a story, not a homily or pious talk. The merely verbal memory, however, is weak, and memory verses should therefore, be short and frequently repeated.

4. SOMETHING TO SEE AND TOUCH. At this age the sense of hearing needs to be reinforced. This principle springs from the "sensational" mightily with those of sight and touch. "The point of contact" should be found in some concrete object connected with the child's everyday life. It is here that nature studies get their vital importance. The sight of the different stages of a plant's growth from seed to flower, and of its persistent turning towards the sunlight, will teach the child more about God's power and love than a hundred moralizings. Care should, however, be taken not to moralize too much as the child's interest is in the object itself, not its "lessons."

5. SOMETHING TO IMITATE. Character at this stage is acquired by imitation. Precept is of little use except to make parrots. Hence in addition to the personal bearing of the teacher as the greatest of all essentials in character training, the lesson stories should have some personal touch in them that the child can reproduce in its own way. Sometimes the children may be shown how to represent the point of the lesson dramatically in play-form as part of the class exercise. Children of this age imitate externals—expressions rather than feelings, arts rather than motives, words rather than their meanings. Hence care should be taken that the external features presented should have some vital connection with the inner moral truths that are to be taught.

III. THE INTELLECTUAL APPROACH. The teacher should never forget that the intellectual approach to the child is circumscribed by its lack of experience. Especially should it be kept in mind that the child gets knowledge by absorption rather than by reason. It learns THINGS rather than ABOUT THINGS! it FEELS truth rather than knows it intellectually. Indiscriminate curiosity and the instincts of wonder and imitation are the chief vehicles of its information. Hence the importance of having the right atmosphere, a true and beautiful environment. Hence positive instruction in the form of abstract statements or moral precepts should have small play in the teaching of this period. To speak technically, the method should be "inductive;" that is to say, the child should be allowed to work out the truth in its own way, always of course from the right models. Memory may be used to a limited extent, but it should always be re-enforced by the use of imagination and self-activity.

IV. THE MORAL APPROACH. The kindergarten child is unmoral though not immoral. It is inclined to be egoistic and lawless. The will is undeveloped and spasmodic, showing little power of self-restraint. Action has not yet become deliberative, and conscience is rudimentary.

(1) IMITATION AND SUGGESTION. Imitation and suggestion are the chief means of moral training in this period. By imitating the teacher and the actions of the characters in the lesson stories, the child will learn by practice to walk in the right way. Right courses of conduct will be "suggested" by what these models do rather than by what they say. It follows that moral teaching at this age should be positive. Wrong ideas and actions should be discouraged, not so much by prohibition, as by setting an example in another direction. The word "don't" should be sparingly used.

(2) AUTHORITY. This does not mean that the children should not be brought under authority as such. On the contrary, the will of the teacher and the rules of the class must be supreme, under the limitation, however, that the will of the child should never be "broken." Authority in some sense is of the very essence of religion, and thus early in life the child should be taught the meaning of "Thou shalt." The weakness of much kindergarten work is just the forgetting of this and the substitution of pleasure and self-interest for discipline and obedience.

(3) THE PLAY INSTINCT has also moral value. Even the simplest games have rules, and these demand self-control, patience, order, and the sense of routine. The wise teacher need not, therefore, be afraid, even in the Sunday-school, of play for its own sake.

V. RELIGIOUS APPROACH. (1) THE SUPERNATURAL. A child's religion is not yet differentiated from the rest of its life, but is found everywhere. The child of this age is a natural myth-maker, personifying everything and revelling in the supernatural, which is, however, to it perfectly natural. The rain is "the tears of the angels;" the wind is "God's breath." Hence the miracle stories of the Old Testament—which grew up in the kindergarten stage of Israel's history—furnish a "point of contact" between the soul of the child and the God of Christianity, and an ideal transition from those crude myth-makings to more orderly and moral conception of God and his working. It must be remembered that the child thinks of God as a man, and has no difficulty in "understanding" his omnipresence and omnipotence. The New Testament stories being more highly moralized and less anthropomorphic, are not so suitable.

(2) AWE. The sense of awe has much to do with reverence and worship. The child soon loses interest in what is known unless it be connected with the satisfaction of its bodily needs; but the unknown is a perpetual source of delight. Here again the Old Testament "wonder" stories—God talking with Abraham, the giving of the Law on Sinai, etc.—will lay just the right kind of foundation for reverence and worship.

(3) ORIGINS. The child is interested in causes of things, and the origin of the natural world and its movements. Stories of creation and miracles—crossing of the Red Sea, calling down fire from heaven, the flood, etc.—have here their fitting place as leading the child into right ideas of God as Creator and Sustainer of the world.

(4) HOME LIFE. The home life of the children should furnish clues for teaching about God the Father and His loving care of His children. To the child with a happy home, prayer needs no explanation, and no exception should be taken to the concrete and egoistic character of its prayers; but in the class prayers, the moral and religious elements should be chiefly prominent in order that by practice and imitation the child may learn that "Man does not live by bread alone."

(5) CAUTION. A normal child of this age has little or no conception of sin or of the need of salvation and should know nothing else than it is God's child from the beginning. It is a crime against child-nature to twist its mind into any theological straight jacket. Child conversions are as abnormal as convulsions.

LITERATURE. Same as preceding lesson.

QUESTIONS: (1) What are the aims of kindergarten teaching? (2) Name five requirements of the lesson. (3) How should the following characteristics of childhood be appealed to? (1) Its sense perception, (2) its sense of wonder, and (3) its faculty of imitation. (4) Describe how the child gets knowledge. (5) What does this teach us about abstract teaching? (6) Name three important elements in the moral training of the child. (7) What is the place of authority in this training? (8) How can the "play instinct" be utilized? (9) How would you utilize the child's vivid imagination for the purpose of religious training? (10) What religious value can you get out of its "sense of awe?" (11) Of what value is the "home life" in the religious training of the child? (12) Would you teach the child of this age about sin and salvation? Explain your answer.

THE FRENCH WAY.

(From "Success Magazine.")

I popped the question to Marie,
  Like any other beau:
She blushed and smiled and answered, "Oui."
  For she is French, you know.
"My dear," I asked her, bending low,
(I feared my cake had turned to dough)
  "Whom do you mean by we?"
  "O, U, and I," said she.

Our Readers' Opinions

"Befogged"—What Shall We Teach Our Children

Brother Moore can readily answer the criticism of J. S. Hughes in the Christian Century, of April 29. But what of the young who read such vaporings?

They read J. S. Hughes': "Christ Himself did not baptize, and Paul disclaims that there was any baptism in his commission, though he himself was also baptized." What does the child think? One may read to him: "Jesus was making and baptizing more disciples than John (although Jesus baptized not, but His disciples). But will the child see that he who authorizes building the house is the builder? he who authorizes baptism, the baptizer? The child might quote, "Jesus yielded to a practice"!! Would he then as readily believe, "The Pharisees rejected the Counsel of God, not being baptized of John"? or would he cut the "Counsel of God" down to a "yielding to a practice"?

The child reads, "Baptism wasn't in Paul's commission," in Hughes' interpretation of the Corinthian Epistle. When we read to him, "Many of the Corinthians hearing, believed and were baptized," can we get the child to see that baptism was the obedience of what the people at Corinth heard—and so of all who obeyed—whether of Peter, or of Philip, or of Paul? Will the child grasp that Paul "delivered that which he also received" at Corinth, when told "it wasn't in Paul's commission"? Mirabile dictu! Paul and his companions must have used a great deal of self-manufactured impediments in their deliverances to have secured such uniform results in baptism!

Let J. S. Hughes replace his fiction with the fact, and it will more nearly read: "I, Jesus, baptized more than John (authorizing my disciples, to reject whose teaching is to reject me). When John is told of this, he will say, "He must increase, but I must decrease." John 3:26-30. "At Jerusalem I announce thro' my apostles to many nations the Law prophesied by Isaiah and Micah." To a Nicodemus of the 20th century Jesus would say: "I prompted Peter at Pentecost, when, in response to wonderment and conviction, he preached that I, Jesus, had shed forth the things seen and heard, and in my name and by my Spirit Peter said: 'Repent and be baptized, every one of you, in the name of Jesus Christ, for the remission of sins and ye shall receive the spirit of the Holy Spirit.' In the days I was with them after the resurrection, I taught them concerning the kingdom; and even Deacon Philip, full of my Spirit, preached the gospel concerning the Kingdom of God, and the name of Jesus Christ to Samaritans, who were baptized, both men and women."

Who will say that the command of Acts 2:38 bears not the authorship or authority of Jesus? Not Luke; for he writes Acts 2:38 in fulfillment of Christ's promise of "power from on high, and that repentance and remission of sins should be preached in his name unto all nations, beginning from Jerusalem." John, whom our brother quotes preeminently, writes: "This is the love of God that we keep His commandments." Aye, more, speaking of Jesus Christ as the propitiation for our sins, and also for the whole world, John writes: "And hereby we know that we know Him, if we keep His commandments. He that saith I know Him and keepeth not His commandments, is a liar, and the truth is not in him; but whosoever keepeth His word; in him verily hath the love of God been perfected." Is John's Savior promised without obedience?

What shall we teach?

WILL F. SHAW.

"Is Protestantism a Failure?"

I have read the editorial in the Christian Century of April 22 with above caption, several times over with much interest.

I do not think that is just the way to put the case.

Protestantism has not failed. It has fully served its purpose in the world economy up to the present hour. It may be passing: it probably is.

The spirit which directs the course of things by evolution produces these changes and if the time is ripe for a change it will be made and the nature of it as well as the means by which it shall be produced will be provided by a power far above the will of man.

It is our privilege and duty to watch for and read the signs of the times and put ourselves into a line with the evolutionary forces that we may be used by them to advantage of the world.

I am of the opinion that the coming trend of religious thought and action will be more world interested than the passing form of Christianity was. It may be discovered that the Catholic interpretation of Jesus has not been true to facts in every respect and that the religion which has been attributed to the Christ does not reflect his real thought or carry out fully his world purpose.

There is a spirit of deep inquiry working in the minds of thousands as never before, creating a determination to follow the "sources" to their sources and learn all that may be known to our age of this wonderful Man and his idea. I feel quite sure that the result will be a radical reconstruction of our ideas of religious life and service.

I feel sure that the coming religion will be a Christianity which will depend very little on the authority of writings regarded heretofore as sacred but on the life of the spirit within humanity, giving direction and power in the effort to realize the divine ideal in the individual and social life here on this planet.

Sincerely,

F. M. CUMMINGS.

Booker T. Washington and Prohibition

By William Oeschger.

In the hopes that what is here given may be of assistance in winning temperance victories these lines are written. Because of a fierce local option contest in a city where there is a large colored constituency the writer wrote Mr. Booker T. Washington for his views on the effect of closing the saloons on the Negro race and upon the race differences. In a letter sent to Mr. Washington on March 29, 1909, among other things, the following was incorporated:

"I write you these lines to ask you the direct question, Do you think that the prohibition of the liquor traffic, the abolition of saloons, will be a blessing to the colored race? Secondly, do you think that the race differences will be helped by the closing of the saloons, as you see the problem?"

To this letter the following reply was received:

"Tuskegee Institute, Ala., April 1, 1909.

"My Dear Mr. Oeschger: I have your kind letter of March 29. I am writing to say that I fully believe that prohibition in the South and elsewhere is perhaps the greatest blessing to the Negro race since Emancipation. Everywhere I have been I have noted a change for the better and that the relations between the white and colored races are becoming more and more friendly. I have had opportunity to observe these relations recently on trips I have made through the states of Mississippi and South Carolina.

LIBELOUS.

TOO TRUE.

"No one understands me!" he groaned; "no one on earth."

It is the old story wrung from many a tortured, youthful heart. The sufferer is generally mistaken, but the pain is no less poignant. Yet in this instance the man's complaint was true. Nobody on earth could understand him.

For he was an announcer of trains at the Union Depot.—Cleveland Leader.

WITH THE WORKERS

The Orange, Cal., church makes Home Missionary offering of $190. Four additions recently under C. C. Bentley's ministry.

Charles T. Radford has well in his grasp the situation at Monrovia, Cal., where the church was recently greatly strengthened by the Stivers meeting.

John T. Stivers is well into a remarkable meeting at Whittier, Cal. He reports the capacity of the building taxed and twenty additions at the close of the first week. Indications favor many additions.

The Japanese Christian Church of Los Angeles, celebrated its first anniversary with prepared exercises Friday evening, May 7. We understand that A. C. Smither, Mrs. Reba B. Smith, in addition to a number of Japanese Christians made addresses.

Jesse P. McKnight, the pastor at Magnolia avenue, Los Angeles, has been granted a leave of absence that he might take an extended tour abroad. He expects to sail from New York early in July and will travel through Europe and the Holy Land.

W. H. Martin and wife are in fair way to repeat their great Fresno work at Whittier, Cal. The time element is the only element lacking, and this is sure to come if the Lord gives these Christian workers the expectancy of life.

F. E. Hagin of Japan has been assisting Robert Grieve in a meeting at Glendora, Cal. There were thirty-two additions to the church. Mr. Hagin leaves this week to do convention work in the West under the Foreign Board.

Levi McCash always does a substantial work in the upbuilding of a congregation. His work at Ontario has moved steadily forward, month by month these two years. With a church membership of 115, they have a Sunday-school enrollment of 230.

Willis S. Myers, of the Naomi Ave. Church, Los Angeles, has taken a leave of absence to hold a meeting at Escondido, Cal. For a month now Fred Lee has been on the ground preparing the way, and a large tent has been provided, and a fine meeting will doubtless be held.

There are strong indications of a large delegation from southern California to the Centennial convention. The exact rates remain to be fixed by the general passenger agents which meet in Seattle early in June. A special train will be run through to Pittsburg from Los Angeles.

This is proving a season of evangelistic activity in the churches of southern California. S. M. Martin and Prof. Hogett, having concluded a successful meeting at Covina, are now leading the forces to victory at Fullerton. This meeting began last Wednesday evening, the 21st in a large tent brought to Fullerton for this purpose.

Mrs. H. T. Buff, the good wife of our venerable brother, who has served a life time in the Christian ministry, passed to her reward last week. She died at the home of her daughter, Mrs. Ernest Whipp at Brawley, in Imperial Valley, Cal. Burial took place at Pamona. A more extended notice will probably be furnished the papers.

The moving picture machine which created such an interest through the Central States in the March offering, is to make the tour to the western conventions this summer. F. E. Hagin of Japan, will be spokesman for it, and beginning with Texas he will make a tour of the Mountain States, returning southward by way of the coast conventions.

Grant K. Lewis, Southern California secretary, is in the field with his stereopticon lecture entitled "Uncle Johnnie Appleseeds," and everywhere splendid audiences gather to hear his message, and the responses indicate the largest offering in the history of this missionary enterprise. Mr. Lewis confidently expects that the churches of southern California will reach their apportionment of $1.00 per member for Home Missions this year. He is speaking every night at some church and twice on Sundays.

The church at Rialto, Cal., last year received $300 from our Home Missionary Society in order to support its pastor. This year they are self-supporting and their contribution for missions has about reached the $1,000 mark. This illustrates the fact that the surest way to preach the gospel abroad is to carefully sow the seed in the home land.

The work at Glendale, Cal., where the new church was organized last fall is prospering under the ministry of J. W. Utter. The new building is completed and was occupied for the first time on May 2. This will mark the beginning of a protracted meeting, the pastor and Prof. B. B. Stout doing the preaching. At the close of this meeting this splendid new property costing about $5,000 will be dedicated.

Grant K. Lewis, California, has received from the Centennial Committee at Pittsburg a set of thirty stereopticon slides which illustrate the beginning and progress of the Disciples of Christ. Among them are the pictures of the pioneer fathers, the Brush Run Church, scenes at Bethany, and other persons and places made notable by these historic movements in the church of God. Under the auspices of the Auxiliary to the C. W. B. M. he recently delivered this lecture at San Bernardino. It is an instructive, inspirational speech on our Centennial. Mr. Lewis will be glad to deliver it free of charge and for the good of the work wherever invited.

B. B. Tyler is to be present and contribute his personality and messages at the annual convention at Long Beach, Cal., to be held August 11 to 22. Other prominent brethren are expected. A full announcement will be made in the near future. On Sunday afternoon, April 18, Bercal Hall was dedicated by the young people of Naomi Ave. Church, Los Angeles. This splendid class consisting of 125 members, is probably the largest in Los Angeles. They have built this hall, and propose to make it the center of their Christian activity and social life for southeast Los Angeles. The building cost $1,000, and is on the property owned by the church. C. C. Chapman was dedicator and all the money was raised to meet expenses.

New Mexico-West Texas Convention

The New Mexico-West Texas Convention will be held at El Paso, Texas, May 29 to June 2, ticket limits being May 26 to June 5. One and one-fifth fare is granted east of El Paso and one and one-fourth fare west. Buy full fare ticket coming, and be sure to get certificate from agent, which will entitle you to reduced rate on return trip. We must have fifty tickets beside the clergy tickets. W. J. Wright, J. H. Mohortor, J. C. Mason and Mrs. Ida W. Harrison are among those who are on the program. The El Paso Church bids you a hearty welcome and will entertain you free.

H. B. Robison, Pastor.

The congregation at Hamlin, Texas., dedicated an excellent $3,200 church building, April 18. William Peem is the pastor.

H. A. Carpenter of Whitehall, Ill., has proposed that all the churches consecrate one Lord's Day this year to the appeal for ministerial volunteers. This suggestion must appeal to every man as both timely and vital. Responding to it, W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary, says: "Let Sunday, May 30, be the day! Let every preacher exalt his calling, and lead his congregation in prayer that the Lord of the harvest may send forth laborers into his harvest. Let him anticipate the service by talking personally with promising young men. Let him press the invitation after the sermon with as much earnestness as he does the call for confessions. Let him and all the leaders of the congregation follow up the occasion as consecrated common sense may suggest. Let both the numbers and the names of volunteers be reported both to the Centennial office and to the church papers."

Best Seal for Jelly Glasses

The way to be certain of keeping jellies unharmed by mold or damp is to discard troublesome paper covers and pour melted paraffine directly on the contents of each glass after jellies are cool.

Can We Stand the Test?

Since the first of the year we have been studying Acts of Apostles anew in all of our Bible schools. Never in our history have our Bible schools reached so many people as during the past few months, consequently, there has never been a time when so many people have been studying this great book, and never has it been studied so carefully.

What has God a right to expect of us as a result of this widespread and diligent study of this marvelous book? Nothing less than this: that the whole church from its youngest member in every Bible school to its maturest supporter should be moved by a deep, strong, intelligent missionary zeal which will surpass anything that the church has ever before experienced.

If this be not the result of our study of the book for the past few months, it will mean that we have been studying it indifferently under careless teachers, or that we are deliberately disobedient to the heavenly vision which moved the Apostles and the early church to the accomplishment of the great purpose of our Lord.

Children's Day for Foreign Missions, June 6, 1909, is a testing day for more than a million Disciples of Christ in the world. Will we stand the test, or shall we be weighed in the balance and found wanting? Loyalty to our Lord and the responsibility of our knowledge demand that every Bible school in our brotherhood secure the co-operation of the whole church on that day in making an offering which shall hasten the accomplishment of the eternal purpose of God to send the light of the Gospel to the uttermost parts of the earth. Can we stand the test?

This should be a matter of pride to us during this year of Centennial aims as well as a matter of loyalty. This year of all the years of our history, the school or church should feel ashamed that does not respond to this great teaching which has been before the heart of the church for these past few months. $100,000.00 from 8,000 Bible schools is a very small acknowledgement of our responsibility to this great opportunity and obligation.

MARION STEVENSON,
National Superintendent of Bible Schools.

Dedication at Hannibal, Mo.

Disciples in Hannibal, Mo., are rejoicing in the erection of a new church on the south side of their city. That side of the city is rapidly growing in population of late, mainly due to the erection of the Burlington shops and certain factories there. The church building proper is the gift of Mr. W. H. Dulany, who provided $10,000 on condition that not less than $5,000 in addition was raised to furnish the church and buy the lot. F. M. Rains dedicated the church Sunday, May 9. A large congregation essembled. At the close of the sermon $2,500 was raised which cleared the parsonage and furnishings of debt, thus giving the south side a property worth about $19,000.

The new house is of Gothic style, with corner tower. The outside walls are all of pressed brick. The auditorium is a combination one, with church auditorium and Sunday-school room on the same level. Both rooms have bowed floor so that when the folding partition is raised the two rooms make one large one. There is a gallery in the Sunday-school room. The class rooms are so arranged that the rostrum can be well seen from them. Every seat in both rooms is a good one from which to see and hear the speaker. In the basement there are the primary room, furnace—steam heat—dining room, wash room, etc. The baptistry is of cement under the pulpit rostrum. The choir loft is above the pulpit rostrum. The windows are of fine stained glass. Since this is the only church on the south side, a fine bell has been placed in the tower to remind the people of the approaching hour for church service, wherever they may attend.

This is a fruitful field. The Sunday-school already has had an attendance of 216 in the three Sundays of its existence. The church was organized only three weeks ago and the first sermon was on Saturday, the 8th, by F. M. Rains.

The new organization starts off with a membership of about 150, with prospects of many more to be added soon in the locality. This leaves the First Church with a membership still of about nine hundred. C. R. Scoville and his company, while holding a successful meeting at the First Church, laid the cornerstone of the new building November 11, 1908. Clarence E. Wagner, of Palmyra, has been called to the pastorate of this remarkable church, and with his splendid equipment in mind and heart we predict for the union of people and preacher great success in Christian work. He begins his pastorate May 16, with a beautiful and useful edifice and a loyal, consecrated people.

Northfield's Summer Program

Many Speakers from Many Denominations and Many Lands.

The program for the Summer Conferences at Northland clearly indicates that D. L. Moody's desire that Northfield stand for interdenominational gatherings is still being carried out. Speakers from nearly every evangelical denomination will be heard. And although sectarianism is seldom mentioned, the receptions and the friendly rivalry, over the number of delegates, and in the interdenominational baseball series, at which the umpires and many of the players are ministers, show how completely everybody finds a welcome in Northfield. Prominent among this year's list of speakers are: Rev. Henry S. Coffin, Dr. John Douglas Adam, Rev. John S. Carson, Dr. Arthur T. Pierson, Rev. G. A. Johnston-Ross, Rev. G. Glen Atkins, Rev. Frank W. Gunsaulus, Rev. J. H. Jowett, Canon Cody, Rev. John A. Hutton, Rev. J. Stuart Holden, and Dr. Len G. Broughton. Numerous other speakers will be announced later.

The program also indicates the international feature of Northfield. It attracts people from every section of this land and its influence has spread far beyond the borders of America. Speakers come to Northfield from nearly every country. Mission fields will be represented by prominent missionaries, among them being Dr. W. T. Grenfell, medical missionary of the Labrador, and Dr. S. M. Zwemer, who was one of the pioneers in Arabia. England, as in the past, furnishes some of the strongest speakers. In fact, Northfield has been the means of introducing to America some of the foremost English divines, notably Dr. F. B. Meyer, Rev. G. H. C. Macgregor, Dr. G. Campbell Morgan, and Rev. J. Stuart Holden. Rev. J. H. Jowett, of Birmingham, who will make his first visit to America in connection with the General Conference in August, is, however, well known here through his writings, which have won for him already a host of admirers on this side of the Atlantic. He is one of the dominant figures in the Non-Comformist church today. Rev. J. Stuart Holden, of London, will be welcomed again, and Rev. G. A. Johnston-Ross, of Cambridge, will return to Northfield after a two years' absence. Other Englishmen announced for the platform are Rev. John Kelman, of Edinburgh, Rev. Charles E. Brown, of the National Council of Evangelical Free Churches, and Mr. and Mrs. Charles S. Studd, members of the well known missionary family. Scotland will be represented by Rev. John A. Hutton, of Glasgow, and Canon Cody, of Toronto, will be among the Canadian speakers. Many of these pastors will aid in conducting the Ministers' Sub-Conference, which will be led by Rev. G. A. Johnston-Ross, and will take place during the August Conference. It is hoped that this will be as helpful as was the discussion of Laymen's Work which was held last year.

The dates of the seven different gatherings follow: Young Men's Student Conference, July 2 to 11; Young Women's Conference, July 13 to 20; Women's Home Missionary Conference, July 14 to 20; Summer School for Women's Foreign Missionary Societies, July 22 to 29; Summer School for Sunday-school Workers, July 22 to 29; General Conference of Christian Workers, July 31 to August 15; Post Conference, August 17 to about October 1.

George B. Stewart of Warrensburg, Mo., who is spending some time in Colorado Springs, is addressing the Y. M. C. A. there in a series of Sunday afternoon services.

Missouri State Convention

After thirty-four years the Missouri State Convention again returns to St. Louis. It will be held at the Union Ave. Christian Church, June 18-24. In view of the fact that it is more difficult to arrange accommodation at short notice in a large city than in smaller places, it is very desirable that all who expect to attend shall send in their names at once to the chairman of registration, Mr. T. C. Clark, 2712 Pine St., St. Louis, or to Mr. T. L. Horn, chairman of the entertainment committee, at 710 Washington Ave., St. Louis. Mr. Lee W. Grant, 910 Carleton Bldg., is chairman of the general executive committee, and Mr. C. Hy. Brown, 400 S. 4th St., general secretary. Mr. R. D. Paterson, care Buxton & Skinner, is chairman of the music committee. A boat excursion is being arranged for the benefit of the Orphans' Home on the last day of the convention, and Mr. Elmer Shepard, 5947 Easton Ave., has this matter in charge.

The St. Louis churches give a cordial invitation to the brethren throughout the state to be with them this centennial year. Lodging and breakfast will be provided to all the delegates and visitors who desire this.

PAUL MOORE.

A WOMAN'S IDEA OF SUMMER COMFORT

To every woman, especially the woman who keeps house, the topic of summer comfort in the home is one of never-failing interest.

This is particularly true where comfort in the kitchen is concerned as it is in this one room that the most trying part of the work is done such as cooking, baking, ironing, and heating water for wash-day purposes. Even in cool weather such work is not altogether welcome, but it becomes drudgery on days when the mercury is trying to jump through the top of the thermometer, aided by a hot stove that diffuses its almost unbearable heat through the kitchen.

But such days are past. With the New Perfection Wick Blue Flame Oil Cook Stove, kitchen drudgery becomes kitchen comfort, for this wonderful stove is so constructed that it not only produces quick results, but does it all without perceptibly raising the kitchen temperature.

All this means real comfort to the woman who works in the kitchen, especially when considered with the added advantages in the saving of time; in the doing away with all carrying of coal, wood and ashes; in having a stove that can be turned on or off, high or low, as required; and in not having to keep it lighted when not in use.

Then there is the saving of fuel to be considered; and it is here also that the New Perfection excels. Although equipped with three burners it has but one oil reservoir, thus reducing three separate filling operations to one.

Besides all this, the "New Perfection" is the only oil stove built with a cabinet top. Its commodious top shelf is particularly useful for warming plates and keeping food hot after it is cooked. In addition there are two drop shelves on which may be set the teapot or coffee pot and small cooking utensils. Also has two racks for holding towels.

Altogether the "New Perfection" is a stove of wonderful utility. Its extremely handsome appearance sets off any kitchen to full advantage. It is superior to the hot coal range no matter what the point of comparison may be—or whether regarded as a summer stove only or as a stove for year 'round use.

Another household article of unusual convenience is the Rayo Lamp, a scientifically constructed lamp that will adorn any room—whether library, parlor, dining-room or bedroom. The Rayo Lamp gives a mellow, steady light that does not tire the eyes. Its center draft burner of the latest design and its fine porcelain shade make it a lamp of combined usefulness and beauty.

The New Perfection Wick Blue Flame Oil Cook Stove and the Rayo Lamp constitute two household articles that will meet any woman's idea of home comfort. In the thousands of homes in which they are already used they are making things cheerful because of their absolute safety, great simplicity, and wonderful convenience.

WITH THE WORKERS

Six persons were received into the church at Belding, Mich., April 25. Five young ladies by baptism, and one man, head of a family. O. W. Winter, the pastor, is pushing the work.

Des Moines, Iowa, ministers reported additions to their churches Sunday, May 9, as follows: Finis Idleman (Central), one confession; Charles S. Medbury (University), two confessions; J. M. Van Horn (Capitol Hill), three confessions.

At Santa Barbara, Cal., where Sumner T. Martin ministers, the church is enjoying a Sunday-school institute conducted by E. W. Thornton, the Sunday-school man. The place and power of the Bible-school is appreciated as never before. The church is planning a great evangelistic campaign for this fall.

George L. Snively, evangelist, has removed from Greenville, to Lewistown, Ill. He intends to give his time constantly to evangelistic work. Just now Mr. Snively is in a good meeting at Valdosta, Ga., where R. W. Wallace is pastor. His next meeting is with George Pruvitt at Aurora, Mo.

From the report of the church at Chaplin, Ill., where T. L. Read ministers, we take the following for the year ending April 30: Sermons preached, 150; number added to membership, 109; letters granted, five; loss by death, three; gain, 101. Funerals, five; marriages, six. Money given for missions through all departments, $270.02. Amount expended for local improvements and back debts, $745.80; current expenses, $1,200; total, $2,215.84. Five organized adult classes. An average attendance of 112 for April.

John G. Slayter recently closed a meeting with the Connellsville, Pa., church, of which C. M. Watson is pastor. There were thirty-eight additions to the church. Twenty-eight were by baptism. Fourteen were men, with a total of twenty-four adults. These excellent results came in the face of sixteen days of rain out of the twenty-one days of meeting. When it didn't rain, it blew a hurricane, a weather condition unprecedented. Yet with fine courage Mr. Slayter preached his big, positive, inspiring message to the uplift of saints and the saving of sinners. When he left Connellsville for his meeting in Martins Ferry, Ohio, which begins May 11, he went from a congregation which had been greatly blessed by his presence.

Bolenge, Haut Congo, Africa.—Since my arrival here last October there have been one hundred and twenty people baptized at Bolenge, and eight more up the Bosira. We have not heard from Longa since the last incoming of the evangelists, so cannot report in full. We are prospering, but how much we need the school to train more evangelists, and how much we need more missionaries to help us! We received word recently that a score or more inquirers were waiting for baptism at Bonyeka. The distance is too great for them to come to us, and too expensive, and it's a hard and long trip for us in a canoe. We hope and pray that our friends will help us to take the gospel with greater speed. Hasten the steamer. Yours in his righteous cause,—Charles P. Hedges.

AUSTIN HUNTER IN ROCKFORD.

We have just closed a three weeks' series of evangelistic services, with Brother Austin Hunter of Indianapolis as evangelist. Seventy-one persons responded to the Gospel invitation, forty-eight to make confession of their faith in Christ and twenty-three to unite by letter or statement. There had been four confessions and baptisms the three Sundays preceding the beginning of the meetings, and there will be a good number of additions during the next few weeks. The church has been permanently quickened and strengthened. Northern Illinois is proverbially a difficult field for our people. Rockford is no exception. We have been fortunate here, however, in purchasing one of the most beautiful and advantageously located sites in the city. Our chapel, which seats comfortably about 300, is already too small. Brother Hunter was with us just three weeks and one day, beginning Easter Sunday and closing Sunday, May 2. We have never experienced worse April weather. During the first and third weeks there were only two evening each week without rain. The meetings were twice interfered with just at the most critical times. The attendance and interest were remarkable whenever the weather was reasonably good. Brother Austin Hunter is almost an ideal evangelist. He combines the highest culture, the deepest consecration and the broadest sympathies. He is a preacher of great power and an effective personal worker. Any church that secures him for a meeting will be greatly blessed. W. D. Ward,
Pastor Central Christian Church.

Some April Happenings in Kentucky

Work at Latonia is doing well, as told by H. C. Runyon.

J. L. Hall added two and worked hard in the Sandy Valley.

Six baptisms reported by G. H. Thomas in Second London District.

W. P. Collins is in Sandy Valley also. Four added and one preacher located.

J. B. Briney reports six added at Bardstown; five of them heads of families.

Three added in First London district, as reported by the evangelist, R. B. Baker.

J. B. Flinchum had a good month in Breathitt county. Nine baptized; two others added.

L. A. Kohler says the meeting at Bromley was quite a success, although there were few added.

G. B. Swann filled his appointments in Hopkins and Webster counties and reports matters as usual.

E. C. Lunger preached two Sundays at Second Church, Richmond, and matters progress as usual.

South Louisville had the services of J. B. Lockhart all the month and matters are progressing fairly well.

A. E. Robertson reports progress fair in Harlan county. A meeting to be held at the county seat in June.

Thirteen baptized by Z. Ball and two others added. He dedicated a new house at Goochland, Rockcastle county.

W. A. Wolfe says that matters are progressing very well at Springfield where he preaches three Sundays each month.

D. G. Combs was at work all the month. Added nine. He was at Providence in Webster county and one of the brethren writes all of his efforts.

W. J. Hudspeth held a meeting at Bromley, Kenton county, and another at Glencoe, Gallatain county. Nineteen added and a good work done at both places.

A. Sanders has resigned at Paintsville and gone to Lockland, Ohio, where he is already at work. He was useful at the place he has just left and in the surrounding country.

W. J. Cocke's work was at Ewing, Fleming county. He was asked to go there with a view of organizing a new congregation. He baptized twenty, reclaimed fourteen, eighty-nine united by letter or statement and eight came from other religious bodies, making a total of 131. Money raised to support preacher half time, meeting self-supporting. He is to be in The Purchase for much of the time during the remainder of the year.

H. W. Elliott was at work all the month; most of the time away from his desk. The total receipts were $756.77. This is an improvement over March and over the corresponding month of last year. This does not pay the expenses of the month. We urge all our friends who can help the work to do so promptly. Some churches are taking combined offerings. A prompt remittance from these will help us very much. This is our hard time of the year. Every dollar that can be sent in for the work is sorely needed. We are a month behind in paying the men. Help us to send all that is due them at the close of each month. H. W. Elliott,

Books You Need

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing among the Disciples of Christ. You need every one of this splendid list.

OUR CENTENNIAL BOOK.

"Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union."--Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic for this our Centennial year. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Boston W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Retail price, $1.00. No one should allow the Centennial to pass without possessing this book.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind., a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possibly only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these churches are given their present form."

Every Disciple of Christ will be interested in getting from his own pen the teachings of Professor Willett. No fair man will consent to judge him on the basis of newspaper reports. These books should be in every one's possession just now.

ERRETT GATES' ILLUMINATING WORK.

"The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples."

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 35c. Paper binding, 25c.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, PA.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, MASS.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes:

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

WITH THE WORKERS

Ford Ellis is the new minister at La Grande, Oregon.

John L. Brandt has been in a meeting at Modesto, Cal.

A new church was organized at Kensington Ohio, April 6.

Frank B. Titus has accepted a call to the church at Tekoa, Wash.,

The Sunday-schools of Richmond, Va., are to hold a picnic in June.

T. S. Hansaker has begun work with the church at Davenport, Wash.,

S. P. Spiegel, Wilson, Carolina, reports an offering of $50 for Home Missions.

R. L. Winn has been called to the pastorate of the Second Church, Woodland, Cal.

There will be thirty graduates from Virginia Christian College at its commencement June 1 and 2.

The church at New Franklin, Mo., has voted to ask their minister, J. E. Rains, to remain a third year.

C. N. Williams, Graham, Texas, has been called to become pastor of the church at Danville, Texas.

G. D. Edwards, Columbia, Mo., formerly pastor of the First Church, Carthage, Mo., spoke in his former church April 25.

S. B. Culp has closed his work with the church at Williamsport, Pa. He was given a cordial farewell reception by the people of the church.

"The Martin Family" Evangelists, are in a meeting at Stafford, Kan., with good interest, with seventy additions. Their next is at Anderson, S. C.

At the Mothers' Day celebration by the Sunday-school of the First Church, Lincoln, Neb., every man was asked to wear a white flower in honor of his mother.

The new Christian Church, Lincoln, Neb., has an "office" room convenient to the street, which is equipped with telephone, and made to serve the interests of the congregation.

The Sunday issue of the State Journal, Lincoln, Neb., contained an extended account of the history of the First Christian Church of that city together with a description of the new building and its dedication.

The Fifth District Illinois Christian Missionary Society annual meeting will be held at Taylorville, Ill., June 2 and 3. The officers of the board are H. J. Hostetler, Virden; L. P. Fisher, Cantral; O. C. Bolman, Havana.

The church at Chanderville, Ill., where I. A. Engle is minister is doing some extensive advertising. This is a feature of church work that has not been given the attention it deserves.

The church at Fitzgerald, Ga., reports the reception of two members by letter on May 2. The pastor has a teacher training class of forty, using Stevenson's handbook. After a trial of Moninger's book it was deemed best to replace it with the more finished and thorough book by Mr. Stevenson.

Frank E. Boren, minister at Vacaville, Cal., announces the following interesting series of sermons: Mornings, on "The Mission of Jesus," (1) To the Sinful, (2) To the Sorrowing, (3) To Society, (4) To the Sick; evenings, "The Simple Life," "The Strenuous Life," "The Spiritual Life," "The Life of Healing and Happiness."

"The Kingdom" which is published by a Congregational minister in Missoula, Mont., gives space in a recent issue to an article by W. H. Bagby, pastor of the Christian Church of that city, on "The Work of the Disciples in Upbuilding God's Kingdom." The article is a brief resume of the history and statement of the purpose of the Disciples.

The Missouri state convention will be held in the Union Avenue Church, St. Louis, June 18-23. The communion service at three o'clock Sunday afternoon will be led by L. J. Marshall, Independence. Convention sermon by W. F. Richardson. Other addresses are to be by A. McLean and T. P. Haley. The program is noticeably devoted to business interests of the convention.

Telegram

Knoxville, Tenn., May 16—Fifty added; twenty-five today. Our house too small. Moved to large Cumberland Presbyterian Church which is packed nightly. Knoxville earnestly hearing our plea for the first time. Sellers and St. John, magnificent evangelists, managing wisely this difficult field.—P. F. King, Minister.

Cincinnati, Ohio, May 15—Nearly half our offerings from new churches. More than half old churches made increased offerings. Big churches slow in reporting. Round up offering and remit. Has your church reported? —Ranshaw and Denton.

Evansville, Ind., May 16—Dr. Scoville arrived Friday. First invitation today. Eighty-eight accessions. Our three churches coöperating. Evans hall, seating twenty-two hundred, and hundreds turned away tonight. City aroused as never before in union meetings.—F. L. Drash.

Red Oak, Iowa.—Three meetings today have been among the greatest meetings at Red Oak. Morning meeting to G. A. R. Nothing like it ever held here. Afternoon meeting to secret societies. Packed opera house. And evening meeting was a perfect jam. The preaching is far above the average and there have been additions at every service for over a week, and many more are in sight. We expected a great preacher in Thompson, the evangelist, and we have not been disappointed. The singing under direction of Mr. Kirkpatrick is of the very best.—George H. Nicol.

The Home Offering

1. Of the offerings sent in since the first Sunday in May nearly one-half are from churches that made no contribution last year. This is probably the largest gain in new churches on record.
2. Of those that gave last year and having sent in offerings so far this year more than one-half have increased their offerings. The churches making the smaller offerings are reporting first this year.
3. Most of our big offerings, and our strong churches are yet to be heard from. This means that the brethren are taking time to finish the canvass.
4. As usual the society is borrowing money at this season of the year, and the sooner the churches hurry up their collections and remit to us, the sooner we will be able to quit paying interest.
5. Regardless of whether the offering is to be large or small, let every church in the brotherhood take an offering for home missions. If you have no supplies and made no preparations, preach a sermon on the matter next Sunday, and pass the baskets.
6. Let us make it unanimous this year.

B. H. Coonradt goes from Marcus, Iowa, to Rochester, Minn.

C. P. Craig has begun work with the First Church, Denison, Texas.

M. J. Grable, Dunham, has accepted a call to the church at Salem, Ohio.

The new South Side Christian Church, Hannibal, Mo., was dedicated May 9, by F. M. Rains.

On June 1 Charles E. Geis will close his work with the church at Willoughby, Ohio, where he has ministered for two years.

Lockhart and Lintt began a meeting at Lockhart, Texas, May 9. The offering for Home Missions in that church was $30. E. O. Sharpe is pastor.

Baxter Waters is preaching for a union church in northern Michigan, but it is hinted that he would feel more at home with a church of the Disciples.

The church at Meadville, Pa., which has been undergoing extensive repairs is to be reopened May 16. President Bates, Hiram College, will have charge of the dedicatory services.

The Columbia Avenue Church, Rochester, N. Y., has called to their service as pastor, Clayton C. Crawford, formerly of Elmyra, N. Y. Mr. Crawford was pastor at Elmyra thirteen years.

G. W. Morton is to become pastor at Salem, Ill.

The Carondelet Church, St. Louis, Mo., has begun the erection of its new building.

J. W. Underwood is doing an aggressive work with the church at Ashtabula, Ohio.

Oliver W. Stewart has been in the East promoting the cause of Prohibition, to which he has devoted so many years of his life.

Ohio state convention, Elyria, May 24-27.

F. M. Dowling who will close his work with the First Church, Pasadena, Cal., July 1, expects to purchase a ranch, and live upon it, thus availing himself of an opportunity to rest.

Prof. R. G. Sears, who has for two years held the chair of Semetic Language and O. T. Literature, in Texas Christian University, has resigned to accept the chair of history and literature in the East Normal School at Ada, Okla.

M. S. Peckham, son of Prof. Peckham, Hiram College, has closed his work with the church at Indiana Harbor, Ind., and accepted a call to the church at Sumter, S. C., where he works under the direction of the American Christian Missionary Society.

Charles E. Pierce has resigned as pastor of the church at Ashland, Ohio, having accepted the work at West Pullman, Ill., where he succeeds Guy Hoover, lately removed to Indiana. Mr. Pierce will pursue studies in the University of Chicago, while caring for the church at West Pullman.

A new church is to be erected in East Dallas, Texas, for which $25,000 was pledged Sunday, April 18. The church has been for five years in a little shell costing only $300. Only recently have they dared to hope for anything better in the near future. The church is therefore elated over what they have been able to accomplish under the leadership of Chepas Shelburne.

MEMORY MENDING.

What Food Alone Can Do For the Memory.

The influence of food upon the brain and memory is so little understood that people are inclined to marvel at it.

Take a person who has been living on improperly selected food and put him upon a scientific diet in which the food Grape-Nuts is largely used and the increase of mental power that follows is truly remarkable.

A Canadian who was sent to Colorado for his health illustratesthis point in a most convincing manner:

"One year ago I came from Canada a nervous wreck, so my physician said, and reduced in weight to almost a skeleton and my memory was so poor that conversations had to be repeated that had taken place only a few hours before. I was unable to rest day or night for my nervous system was shattered.

"The change of climate helped me a little but it was soon seen that this was not all that I needed. I required the proper selection of food although I did not realize it until a friend recommended Grape-Nuts to me and I gave this food a thorough trial. Then I knew what the right food could do and I began to change in my feelings and bodily condition.

"This kept up until now after 6 months' use of Grape-Nuts all my nervous trouble has entirely disappeared. I have gained in flesh all that I had lost and what is more wonderful to me than anything else my memory is as good as it ever was.

"Grape-Nuts has remade me all over, mind and body, when I never expected to be well and happy again." "There's a Reason."

Look for the famous little book. "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Centennial Bulletin

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

A meeting of the international Centennial committee was held in Pittsburgh, Monday, May 10. The request of the Brotherhood that it be allowed to hold a men's convention parallel with the C. W. B. M. sessions Tuesday, October 12, was heard. It was decided that in view of the exceptional character of the Centennial Convention and the enormous attendance anticipated, that the request be granted for the afternoon and evening of that day. Plans and programs for these two sessions will be duly announced by Brother Macfarlane.

To encourage the reunion element in the celebration and promote the interests of the colleges, it has decided that all banquets should be held Friday, October 15, that of Bethany College occurring between the afternoon and evening sessions, and the rest simultaneously at the close of the night session. To allow ample time for these banquets and prevent conflict with either the evening session of Friday or the morning session of Saturday, a readjustment is being made that will shorten the Friday evening session.

In the saddle of the ridge a quarter of a mile above the Farrar school house and between Brush Run and Hanen's Run (now called Turtle's Run) in the edge of the woods is a rectangle twenty-four by thirty feet, distinctly outlined by the remains of a limestone foundation. "What mean these stones?" "Where the Scriptures speak we speak, where the Scriptures are silent we are silent." "That nothing ought to be inculcated upon Christians as articles of faith; nor required of them as terms of communion; but what is extremely taught and enjoined upon them, in the Word of God. Nor ought anything be admitted, as of divine obligation, in their church institution and managements, but what is expressly enjoined by the authority of our Lord Jesus Christ and his apostles upon the New Testament church; either in expressed terms, or by approved precedent."

This was the meeting house of the first church organized by the Campbells. Here Alexander Campbell was licensed to preach in 1811. Two or three miles away and about a mile above the confluence of Brush Run with Buffalo Creek, in a bend of the Buffalo, Thomas Campbell, wife and daughter, Alexander Campbell and wife, James Hanen and wife were baptized June 12, 1812. Half a century and more ago the members all removed to Dutch Fork, Bethany, Wellsburg and elsewhere. The Washington and Bethany road was changed so that it no longer passed the spot. The house was removed two miles to West Middletown and rebuilt to make a blacksmith shop for George McFadden. A few years ago this was torn down but the hewn white oak timbers were too good to throw away and so were used in the erection of a stable across the main street of the village on the place which now belongs to John H. Kelly, a colored man.

Down Brush Run to Buffalo, down the Buffalo to the Ohio, down the Ohio to the Mississippi, and up all the tributaries of all these streams went the watchword of a hundred years ago, "Where the Scriptures speak we speak, where the Scriptures are silent we are silent." But there went not only the watchword but the earnest and self-sacrificing efforts of the men and women filled with the Holy Spirit and with power who taught the Word of God to all who would receive it, and organized churches after the ancient order wherever groups of believers were found.

With railroad development the extension of the Word was carried on both more widely and more rapidly. To economize both men and money the churches began to coöperate systematically. At last they reached the point where they were not satisfied to have the extension of apostolic Christianity limited by the metes and bounds of their own country, but under the authority of the great commission began to carry the Word into foreign lands also, and then it was found wise to let the children have a share in this world-wide extension of Christ's Kingdom.

Now in the year of one hundred years we are expecting that the Bible-schools alone will contribute $100,000 to the great Centennial foreign mission fund of $400,000. We are expecting that every class of every school will make an earnest and enthusiastic effort to have every scholar give at least $1.00 to this fund. Of course if all these efforts are successful, as they ought to be, the Children's Day offering will run far beyond the $100,000 mentioned. Let those who are charged with the responsibility of leadership realize that a worthy share in this Centennial celebration will be remembered with proud satisfaction by every child when he has grown to manhood, and the mementos of the year will be handed down as precious heirlooms to succeeding generations. As never before we are practically exalting the Word in our own churches. As never before we must practice its world-wide dissemination.

W. R. Warren,
Centennial Secretary.

Home Mission Hints

Interest in missions constitutes the difference between a dead and a living church.

Dr. R. S. Storrs said: "Every church not coming into this work of Missions becomes sluggish, inert, effete."

Get full of the subject of missions yourself and then you will have little trouble in filling the whole church with the same spirit.

He is not rich who lays up much, but he who lays out much.

When the churches at home become as willing to practice self-denial as they are to praise the missionaries for self-sacrifice, then there will be larger contributions for the work.

"Some give according to their means; others, according to their meanness."

The reason many people have no interest in missions is because they invest no principal.

The devil smiles when a man clinches his argument for apostolic Christianity one day, and then gives a pittance for missions the next.

A man who prays, "Thy kingdom come," and does not give some just proportion of his income to promote the kingdom, is a conscious or unconscious hypocrite.—Francis E. Clark.

Notes From the Foreign Society

Last week the Foreign Society received $2,314.67 from Lazarus Ehman on the Annuity Plan. He it was who made the first gift to the society on this plan November 27, 1897. He has made ten different gifts, aggregating $9,049.03. Besides this gift, a friend in Minnesota, who has a daughter on the foreign field, sends us $500 on the Annuity plan. This gift goes toward the Vigan Bible college.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first twelve days of May amounted to $12,879, or a gain of $2,106 over the corresponding twelve days of 1908. The total gains to date amount to $27,286.

The prospects for Children's Day are bright indeed. Great numbers of orders are being received for Children's Day supplies. It is hoped that every school will be in line. The Children's Day exercise, the Centennial Call, is a splendid document.

George E. Miller, Damoh, India, reports six confessions and baptisms. A number of recent baptisms are reported from Japan. Five of the number were at Osaka.

There is a Christian Union Orphanage at Sendai, Japan, with a board of trustees representing the different Protestant churches. Our own missionary, M. B. Madden, has twice been elected chairman of the board of trustees. The institution owns about six acres of land. There are 205 children in the home.

News Letter Number One

Out of 870 graduates of Teacher Training classes in Illinois for the first four months of 1909, 800 are credited to our own schools. Out of forty adult classes receiving certificates in Illinois, from March 25 to May 5, thirty-nine of our own schools have received the certificate of recognition. Illinois adds two schools to our list of Centennial Bible-schools. Havannah, Ill., enrolls "The whole church and as many more in the Bible-school," and also Cuba, Ill.

Myron C. Settle and his wife have just sent in two programs for their morning programs for the morning conference hours at the Pittsburg Centennial Convention. Mrs. Settle will instruct the Junior teachers or workers. Mr. Settle will instruct Intermediate department teachers or workers. In these two morning hours we will have the benefit of the special study of these two people in the Hartford School of Religious Pedagogy.

Robert M. Hopkins, state Bible-school superintendent for Kentucky, will have charge of the superintendents' conference every morning at the Pittsburg convention. He has sent in a fine program for these morning hours. Every superintendent in the United States should have the benefit of this instruction.

Dr. Homer J. Hall, president of our National Temperance Board, has prepared a fine course of temperance instruction. He will spend about twenty-five minutes each morning in a different room demonstrating methods of temperance instruction in our Bible-schools. This is a new feature of the Bible-school work and one that will be very much appreciated.

Howard R. Weir of Bowmanville, Ont., Can., has been selected upon the very warm recommendation of Prof. Charles T. Paul, of Hiram, Ohio, to demonstrate to the teachers of the different departments of the Bible-school how to teach missions in the Sunday-school. He will have twenty-five or thirty minutes each morning in the Pittsburg conferences for the different departments. It is hoped that some scheme of regular missionary instruction may grow out of this feature of the convention.

LIGHT BOOZE.
Do You Drink It?

A minister's wife had quite a tussle with coffee and her experience is interesting. She says:

"During the two years of my training as a nurse, while on night duty, I became addicted to coffee drinking. Between midnight and four in the morning, when the patients were asleep, there was little to do except make the rounds, and it was quite natural that I should want a good, hot cup of coffee about that time. It stimulated me and I could keep awake better.

"After three or four years of coffee drinking I became a nervous wreck and thought that I simply could not live without my coffee. All this time I was subject to frequent bilious attacks, sometimes so severe as to keep me in bed for several days.

"After being married, Husband begged me to leave off coffee for he feared that it had already hurt me almost beyond repair, so I resolved to make an effort to release myself from the hurtful habit.

"I began taking Postum and for a few days felt the languid, tired feeling from the lack of the stimulant, but I liked the taste of Postum, and that answered for the breakfast beverage all right.

"Finally I began to feel clearer headed and had steadier nerves. After a year's use of Postum I now feel like a new woman—have not had any bilious attacks since I left off coffee."

"There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Oklahoma Christian Ministerial Institute

This institute held its sixth annual session with the church in El Reno, May 3-5. The attendance was much larger than at previous meetings. Local arrangements were all that could be desired, and those who attended feel grateful to Pastor O. L. Smith and his people. The president, J. H. O. Smith, being absent, Vice President Randolph Cook presided.

Monday evening an address was given by George D. Conger, superintendent of the Anti-Saloon League in Oaklahoma..

Able, thoughtful, and scholarly papers and addresses were given by brethren as indicated in the following: "The Setting of the Bible," Prof. Rolla G. Sears; Review, W. G. Surber; "Teacher Training," Clay T. Runyan; "The Pastor and the Bible-school," Oscar Ingold; Review, H. S. Gilliam; then in place of the absent president's address Dr. T. L. Noblitt gave a helpful one on "The Place of the Minister in the Community"; "The Minister's Duty to Our Organized Work"; R. E. Rosenstein; Review, J. R. Middleton. In the evening D. A. Wickizer delivered an address on "Christian Science vs. Christianity"; "The Emmanuel Movement," Prof. O. L. Lyon; "Preparation for the Pulpit," F. L. VanVoorhis; Review, W. A. Curtis; "Christian Journalism," Randolph Cook; Review, L. A. Bethcher; "The Church, the Preacher, and the Social Reform," O. L. Smith; "The Men's Brotherhood of the Disciples of Christ," D. A. Wickizer; Review, Charles Musselman; "Union of Christian and Baptist Churches," E. T. Lane.

The spirit of the meeting could hardly be improved upon. To the writer it seems that but two things were lacking to make this all that such an institute should be—a thoroughly competent visiting lecturer and a larger attendance on the part of the Oklahoma ministers. At our next meeting the first of these will be supplied and its is hoped the preachers of the state will remedy the latter defect.

The officers for the ensuing year are: President, F. L. VanVoorhis, Shawnee; Vice President, D. A. Wickizer, Tulsa; Secretary-Treasurer, R. E. Rosenstein, Edmond; Executive Committee, E. A. Cluiddy, Alva; O. L. Smith, El Reno; E. O. Eirtley, Marlowe. Next May we are to meet with W. A. Curtis and the church in Hobart, where a hearty welcome is now being prepared for you, brother preacher.

Robert Edward Rosenstein.

Edmond. Okla.

May 16 was a great day for the Gibson City, Ill., church. The Bible school attendance was 337 with 210 in the Men's Bible Class. It was also the day upon which they raised a year's offerings for missions and benevolences. It was estimated that $600 would be secured, but after the call had been made it was found that cash and good pledges to the amount of $725 had been given. This will surely be increased to $750, which will be an actual increase in all the offerings of the church of 200 per cent. We need not add that the church is happy. Four have been added recently, who have not been reported. L. O. Lehman is the capable pastor.

The Test of a Successful Revival

How Can We Tell a Good Revival When We See One

It seems ungracious to analyze a Revival meeting. A Revival is full of human emotion. It has been planned by the loftiest motives. It burns with unselfish desires. In the Revival self is forgotten and the lost are sought out. Pastor and people and evangelist invest their prayers in it, agonizing prayers, often, which cost blood.

A Revival saves the drunkard, makes a new man of the respectable self-centered citizen by giving him a new conscience toward the community, establishes family altars, increases attendance at the Sunday-school, multiplies the sale of Bibles, makes possible the building of a church or raises the debt on one lately erected.

Would it not be better to let the Revival alone? Is it not evidently of God? What right has man to raise questions in the presence of God's work?

The task is very delicate indeed.

But it is not presumptuous to undertake it. It is a weakness quite too common for religious leaders to pass into a state of ecstasy in the presence of a revival, to lay aside the faculty of discrimination and criticism and allow themselves to be caught up by the surging tide of feeling which the Revival creates. It is hard for a student to maintain his questioning attitude when he beholds a mother leading her husband and three grown sons to the place where they confess Christ. Her lifelong prayers are being answered. Her heart is almost breaking for joy. It is a moment ineffable. The student, face to face with this work of God, ceases to be a student, the fountains of his tears are broken up and his voice joins in that mother's hallelujah.

To stand critical and unmoved in the presence of an experience such as that would betray a lean and hollow soul devoid of numan sympathy and natural enthusiasm. But the final judgement of the Revival is not to be made while the Revival is in action. Nor is its standard to be found inside itself.

There is need that some one should stand outside the Revival and report of its relation to and effect upon the interests of the Kingdom of God.

It is a fallacy all too common to judge the Revival by a standard inside itself. If it has big "crowds," if it secures many conversions, if it provides an emotional "blessing," it is pronounced good. The average person, preacher or layman, is disarmed of all criticism in the face of these results.

Now the important thing about the Revival is not the size of the crowds, but what is done with them; not the number of conversions but what they are converted to; not the excitement of intoxication or convulsion, but the enthusiasm of a clear vision of God and of self and of sin in the light of Christ's cross.

No more should we stand inside the revival and judge its worth than we should stand inside the church and judge of its success. The church must constantly bring its methods and results to the test of the Kingdom of God in its two-fold aspect of personal character and social welfare. The church is not end; it is means. The kingdom is end. The church's work must positively advance the kingdom or it possesses no worth.

To a student of Christ's own methods of work, such a statement is a truism. But it is a truism that needs to be reiterated today until men take it seriously in practice. It is assumed by many pastors and evangelists that the success of the church means the success of the kingdom of God. Of a piece with this assumption is this, that the success of the Revival means also the success of the kingdom of God.

But we cannot afford to proceed upon this stereotyped assumption. No more costly error has been made in the history of Christendom than that of making the church an end in itself. This is the essential fallacy of Rome. The church is identified with the kingdom. To glorify the church is to establish the kingdom. Every vice that flourishes in the Roman church has its roots in this conception.

Our Protestant scandal of a divided church is traceable to just this same departure from Jesus' conception of the kingdom as the important matter. Who supposes for a moment that if Christian men were conscious of the kingdom as end and the church as means there would obtain such super-sensitiveness to doctrinal beliefs, to polity, ritual and ordinances as has been the cause of sectarian subdivision in the body of Christ?

Thoughtful men who have learned this lesson of the distinction between church and kingdom are therefore not content to ask the question, Do such and such methods work? They want to know what such methods work toward. They are not convinced when certain methods get people into the church, because they well know that people may be gotten into the church in such a way as to leave them weaker in character than they were before they came in. Likewise they will understand that the community may experience an emotional shake-up about religion and be left weaker in the power of socal self-control. Thus the kingdom of God may be made to suffer by those very agencies which are designed to further it.

A church may be conspicuously prosperous as an institution and, conceivably, count for little in the kingdom of God. Another church may be small and struggling and weigh heavier in the scales of the kingdom than its more conspicuous neighbor.

Likewise in the Revival it is not in numbers nor success nor excitement that its values are registered, but in its abiding effects upon personal character and social righteousness.

We do not urge this criterion of evangelistic success because we imagine that the Revival will shrink from being measured by it. Our belief is that every true evangelist will gladly re-examine his work, not by the test of mere church success but by the test of its value for the kingdom which is, after all, the only ethical test.

Such a man of God would, we think, ask concerning his work certain questions with a view to making his work count to the utmost for the kingdom of God. These questions we will consider in our next article.

Ailments are never relieved by much talking. The person who is in trouble only deepens the trouble by continually discussing it. The temptation is strong upon us all to forget this; and it is refreshing to find one who resolutely declines to forget it. An indefatigable worker who has had to contend with a great deal of serious illness was under the necessity of writing about her illness as having hindered her in a certain work for which she was committed to others. At the conclusion of her letter she said: "You will excuse, I am sure, this reference to so personal a matter; I felt that I really ought to let you understand my frequent remissness. * * * One of my aims has been, and still is, to maintain some other character than that of a woman with an ailment. To do what work I can is my greatest happiness." There is cheery heroism for us. Silence over our troubles may not cure them, but it at least checks their growth.—Sunday School Times.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

THE BOOZE SKIRMISH

The battle with the bottle has been mostly on the skirmish line the past month. Time was when it would have been reckoned big fighting, but when there is such ominous firing all along the line by both night and day the campaign develops such proportions that one time battles become but skirmishes. The city of Lincoln, Neb., joins the dry column of larger places. It is significant that the capital of the state should lead in this matter. The capital of Illinois failed to land Lieut. Gov. Sherman as mayor by a few votes and that on only a law enforcement platform, but for even so diluted a program as simple law enforcement to come within a few votes of winning in Springfield is significant. It will serve as a campaign of education and encouragement for the future and not even this town of riot and rum is hopeless in these days. The governor of Arkansas has called the legislature into extra session for the purpose of submitting to a referendum a state-wide prohibition law. The legislature is already committed to the task and Arkansas will soon join the white row of southern states. In Tennessee, where Nashville and Memphis will be the largest dry cities in the world, one of the judges has served preliminary notice that the courts will administer severe penalties to every form of subterfuge. Both houses of the Missouri legislature have passed the necessary resolution for the submission of a prohibition constitutional amendment, and if agreement is effected on details the fight between the large cities and the country places will be on. The army of the home and morality has not won every place attacked, but they have not lost a place once occupied.

SOCIALIZING GOVERNMENT

Perhaps the most signal ground-movement of the age is that which is making government more a matter of social than of mere political concern. David Lloyd-George, the brilliant British Chancellor of the Exchequer, in presenting the British Budget to the House of Commons a few days ago, gave the world one of the most marked demonstrations of this fact. His budget of financial proposals embodied a plan of taxation to meet the governmental deficit and outlined the Liberal cabinet's proposal for the expenditure of the same on the lines of a distinctly social as opposed to the old-time distinctly political programs. It is original, comprehensive daring; yet to be enacted with such temperateness as to make it evolutionary rather than revolutionary. If it succeeds in passing the Lords it may mark the beginning of a new epoch; if it fails it may do the same by changing the face of present day political contentions in Britain and by helping to "end or mend" the House of Lords. The hope of this latter would lie in its effort to place the responsibility for helping the masses on the government by the frank declaration that social reform is its chief business.

The Chancellor declared that Britain should not loose her "greatest national asset," her immunity from invasion; that ample provision should be made for the navy but that there was no necessity for "building navies against nightmares" and that social problems could not await a fuller treasury for if the "social sores" were allowed to fester they could but add to the aggravation of all the ills of the nation. The Old Age Pensions Act is already in operation and is responsible for a large part of the annual deficit, but it will not be curtailed. It is proposed to create a department for insurance of the wage-workers against non-employment and to establish labor exchanges. A million dollars is proposed as a beginning of afforestation, waste land is to be reclaimed and the ownership of small farms encouraged. The Chancellor said "any man who has crossed and recrossed this land must have been perplexed at finding so much waste and wilderness possible in this crowded little island." He declared that England's farms "provided a living for fewer people than they did a thousand years ago." And it is here that he proposes the most revolutionary of his reforms.

This reform lies in the basis of taxation. He proposes to lay extra tax on unused land and thus strike a body blow at the luxuries of English landlordism which keeps great estates for hunting preserves, even dispossessing the tenantry for the sake of the pleasure of "my lords and ladies." Even more striking is the proposal to take one-fifth of the increase in land values that is due to the "unearned increment." This is the execution of Henry George's idea in a modified form. Whenever the land or lot increases in value by the general community rise of values the government will levy a tax equal to one-fifth of that rise. In other words when the community gives value to property it will take one-fifth of what it has given. Those who hold royalties to mineral lands will also have their royalties heavily taxed because they enjoy income from a capital nature provided and for which they are at no expense for operation. Unused farm or forest land will be submitted to an extra tax over that used, with such exemptions as will lay the tax only on that which could be put under cultivation. Thus landlordism is attacked in principle and an effort made to modify the existing land monopoly. Once the principle is established and the reform is begun the way is opened for its abolition in the course of time. If the Lords reject a measure containing so essentially these provisions affecting their plethoric purses it is thought the ministry will be greatly strengthened with the people in its fight for the "mending of the Lords."

But this is not all. The principle of taxation involved is carried further in the proposal to lay the increased burden upon wealth. Mr. Lloyd-George declares that the industrial classes are paying much more than their proportionate part of taxes. Then he levies upon the "unearned incomes" a larger tax than upon those earned and exempts all moderate incomes from the increase. The man of leisure will have to pay 6 per cent of his income to the national treasury. Death duties are to be graduated from 4 per cent for an estate of $25,000 to 15 per cent for one of $5,000,000 or more.

Luxuries are to bear their part of the increase. The tea and sugar of the poor are not to be touched, but whisky and tobacco duties are to be largely increased. Automobiles are to pay an increased license annually and the gasoline they burn is to further add to their contributions to the government.

CHURCH UNION WITH AN "IF"

The spirit of church union is moving everywhere on the face of the waters. In religious matters the movement of the spirit of things means everything. There is no mistaking the signs of the times. Let us beware of impatience and let us not be frightened by the dolorous doubts of some of those who are high in the ecclesiastical world. Those who are the beneficiaries of ecclesiastical privilege and power could not be expected to lead in any great forward movement that looked to the modification of things as they are.

The Episcopal communion has long been promulgating pleas and plans for union. But it is always union with an "if." No ecclesiastical body that regards itself as officially the "Church of God" could do otherwise except they first surrender their own official claims. The recent Boston congress of this great Christian communion considered a plan for church union that doubtless seemed to them very liberal. But it could become operative only if all will become Episcopalian. Each denomination would be allowed to "temporarily" maintain separate existence, but subject to the "bishop of the diocese" who would act as president of denominational conferences and "have sole right of ordination and confirmation." Each denomination would be free to use its own methods of worship except it must "use the sacramental form and repeat the creeds publicly." All ministers would be recognized but would have to "receive ordination to the priesthood" thus "making them priests of the 'Church of God.'" All the people would have to "receive confirmation and thus be admitted to communion." After all these matters of outward form had been complied with, ministers would be encouraged to "celebrate at each other's altar" and proselyting and rivalry would cease. The declaration is made that "exchange of pulpits means nothing, but exchange of altars means everything." This latter epitomizes well the whole situation from the standpoint of the plan submitted, viz, that form is everything and spirit must follow form. No plan of union that carries an "if" will ever be effective. Churches of like ecclesiastical construction will continue to unite on the basis of likeness in form but not until the spirit purges us of all sectarianism will form become a matter of expediency and union the divine consumation with which we answer the Master's prayer that we may all be one "that the world may believe that thou didst send me."

"There is tide of the soul as well as of the sea. He is wise who uses the flood-tide for good when it rises in the soul. As at sea the sailor seizes the flood-tide for accomplishing what he could not otherwise do, so the mariner on life's sea should use the highest aspirations and the noblest impulses, and not allow them to ebb until they have resulted in some real good. Too many of us allow the sea of the soul to swell and surge, ebb and flow; and nothing more results from it than the washing of the sands."—Christian Observer.

The Ministry of Silence

If it is true, as was pointed out last week, that silence is more eloquent than speech and that the greatest messages of history have been unspoken messages that found their expression in the souls of men rather than in uttered words, not less is this principle true in the field of knowledge. Science has evermore taught this lesson. There are times when men of scientific training and experience meet for conference and even for argument. But the messages which they bring to such public utterance are those that have arisen in the quiet hours of observation and research. It is the lonely watcher of the stars, the quiet worker in the laboratories, the absorbed observer of Nature who, after long silence, speaks at last in few and pondered words regarding the mysteries which have opened their hearts to him in these hours of vigil.

Copernicus, village priest, brooded long over the movements of the heavenly bodies before he ever ventured to tell his revolutionary secret to the world. Galileo watched many a pendulum swing beside that cathedral chandelier at Pisa before he came fully upon the great truth which has proved basic to an entire body of problems in physics. Newton and Kepler lived for years in the solitudes of the stars before the world knew what secrets were locked in their hearts. Harvey had performed many surgical operations, content with the definitions of his age, before he was ready to announce the truth regarding the circulation of the blood. And so with the inventors. Watt watching the uplifted kettle lid, Whitney working out slowly the mechanism of the cotton gin, Howe applying the example of his wife's swiftly moving fingers to mechanics in the discovery of the sewing machine, are all illustrations of the law of silence which comes at last to speech rather in action than in words. Dana and Agassiz, Darwin and Spencer, in spite of the volumes which they wrote and inspired, passed their years in silence rather than in speech.

Is not the same fact true of the saints who are to us the living embodiments of the facts of religion in the world? We speak much of Abraham, of David, of Hosea, and of Jeremiah. Yet so far as the records go they were largely men who dwelt in silence and retirement. Few words have been recorded of Abraham, the father of the faithful. Very little is set down as the actual speech of David, when one reserves the right of question regarding the psalms bearing his name. Hosea bore witness to the love of God in a life of tragedy and in certain sermons preached in Samaria, whose report has come to us in a most fragmentary manner in the book which bears his name. Yet how small was the volume of his speech as compared with the greatness of his silent message. Jeremiah breaks into passionate and vibrant protest over the sins of kings and people. But in those few chapters preserved for us in the Old Testament how small a record have we of the mighty influence exerted by that prophet through years of urgent and probably, for the most part, silent ministry.

Orators and priests, soldiers and prophets impressed themselves upon the world of ancient Israel not by what they said, but by what they were. Back of the message stood the man; and back of the man himself stood the wonder of God's life, with its quiet outreaches of power, its simple ritual of worship.

> "The tumult and the shouting dies;
> The captains and the kings depart;
> Still stands thine ancient sacrifice,
> A broken and a contrite heart."

Equally impressive is the silence of the New Testament and of early Christianity. We are tempted to think of that wonderful outbreak of religion and love in the world as chiefly expressing itself in words,—the words of the great forerunner of the Jordan, the words of our Saviour, and the words of the apostles who spoke and wrote as the divine Spirit urged them on. And to be sure, we must allow for the vastly larger volume of spoken messages concerning the new life than our New Testament has recorded. The words of Jesus could be reduced to the dimensions of a daily newspaper, but we know that these are only the headlands of great continents of truth which he disclosed to men in his discourses. Yet the New Testament is the record of silence rather than of speech. Jesus lived a solitary life though he was constantly with men. The new age came in not with cries of "Lo, here, and lo, there," not with trumpet tongues nor human eloquence. It came silently, as a thief in the night. The silence and restraint of the apostles is one of the most impressive facts of early Christianity.

The wonder of its rapid diffusion was the quietness with which it went everywhere. As Hausrath says: "The hidden spring sent its mighty stream of influence flowing through workshops and servants' room where workman whispered the message to workman, slave to slave." The Roman world looked on, skeptical and sneering at first, and later astonished, to see the transformation that Christianity wrought in human lives. It was an astonishment beyond all speech that fell upon imperial officials and highborn ladies when they witnessed the quietness and constancy of the followers of the Nazarene. "They see," said Justin Martyr, "men, formerly tyrannical, converted, or they notice how their neighbors endure everything cheerfully or how a cheating fellow traveler takes injustice meekly." This silent pervasion of human society with a new enthusiasm which asked not to be heard but only to live, was the wonder of the age. "It surprises them," said Tertullian, "that we love one another, for they hate one another; that we regard each other as brothers, for amongst them the love of brotherhood is but feigned."

Christianity's greatest power must lie in silence rather than in speech. The religion that talks easily is always superficial and shallow. It comes over-quickly and has no strength left for real struggle. Those who are called upon to be the spokesmen of the Christian faith, such as ministers and teachers, need ever more to keep this truth close to their hearts. The deepest experiences of life are not lightly spoken of. There are always dangers that frequent comment upon spiritual things may tend to make them commonplace and unreal to the man who thus comes easily to speech. Carlyle once spoke a great truth on this very theme. "If," says he, "you want a man not to practice what he believes, then encourage him to keep often speaking it in words. Every time he speaks it the tendency to do it will grow less." Surely this is overstatement. Yet there lies not faraway a warning which every sensitive interpreter of Christianity will wish to heed. Not in vain did Tauler spend his two years in silence. And not without significance was the statement made of von Moltke, "He can be silent in seven languages." Words are of little value merely as words. The dictionary belongs to every man. Only as speech comes freighted with gifts which silence has stored is it worth while.

The silence of the soul is its inner sanctuary, its place of power. The throne room of the soul is that inner chamber in which it sits in quietness and waits for God to speak. To know the values of this secret place, to discover the significance of silence as a source of power, to gather in the inner places of life the facts and forces which can be wrought into character, this is to discover the soul's true eloquence and value.

Saint Joan

After a long debate regarding the canonization of Joan of Arc, the Roman Catholic Church has decided, upon due and formal scrutiny of all the facts, to elevate her to the position of saint in the calendar of that church. Five centuries and more have passed since the remarkable events which made Domremy and Orleans memorable spots in the history of France. In the day when the nation was groaning under foreign oppression, when English garrisons were occupying half her strongholds, and king, court and people were in the depths of despair, a young woman of the peasant class, sustained by unquenchable faith in the saints whom she had chosen for her spiritual guidance, St. Michael, the warrior arch-angel, St. Margaret and St. Catherine, journeyed from her village where she believed she had heard celestial voices urging her to the task, and at the court offered herself as the deliverer of her country.

The wonderful result of this young girl's faith perhaps could have been realized in no later age. It was a time of superstition when miracle and common experience easily changed places and when signs and wonders might be expected, particularly in a period of deep national distress.

It would seem from all we know of Joan's early life that her love of home and her modesty would both have conspired to keep her in the quiet circles of the village where she was born. And yet allured by no hope of personal advantage and keeping to the last the simplicity of her unspoiled nature, she led the most remarkable crusade for national deliverance upon which the world has looked. She rallied her countrymen, led the attack upon city after city, regained most of the lost domain of France, and at last saw her king crowned as the veritable monarch of the land she loved.

The story of Joan of Arc will always be precious to the lover of heroic deeds and to the student of religious experiences. Her career is the proof of the fact that the mightiest emotions of the heart are stirred by the consciousness of a divine mission, and that a people may be roused to the accomplishment of any praiseworthy acts, when assurance is given that the sanction of heaven falls upon the enterprise. Those panels in the Pantheon at Paris, illustrating with the finished art of the painter the story of the Maid of Orleans, have been the inspiration of the children and youth of Paris for a generation. They are worthy to complete the circle begun by the story of St. Genevieve, the patron saint of the city's cradle hours.

The elevation of Joan of Arc to sainthood by the Roman Catholic Church can add nothing to the lustre of her achievements. The fact only proves that after the most diligent inquiry into the facts of her life, it has been proven clear that the petulant charges made against her by English prejudice, charges of witchcraft and unchastity, have fallen to the ground. But the true sainthood of this maid of France is that which can be conferred by no canonical pronouncement, but consists in the verdict of the world upon a pure, lofty, and consecrated career, reaching the zenith of military and patriotic success, but lifted to still higher levels of glory by the patient endurance of imprisonment, torture, and disgrace which ended at last in the flames at Rouen. There, like another prophet of earlier times, she went back to God in a chariot of fire.

Results of the Chuchow Revival

By Elliott I. Osgood, M. D.

In two former letters we have told of the growth of the revival in this district. The immediate district in which we have outstations reaches thirty-five miles north and northwest to Chiho, our newest outstation. Eight miles east of that place is a little circle of Christians who have been wont to meet in each other's homes. Coming back on the main road from Chiho we pass through Gwan-wei, seventeen miles from here, Evangelist Shi's headquarters. South of him eight miles and west of Chuchow fifteen miles is Shi-gia-dzi, a flourishing outstation opened by and watched over by Shi himself. West of that in the mountains, twenty-four miles from Chuchow, is Djo-gia-gan, also fostered by Shi. Twenty-one miles southeast of that and twenty miles directly south from Chuchow is Tswein-dziao, where Koh, the photographer, has been saving souls. Swinging still around to the east of Chuchow on the road to Nanking is Wu-i, twelve miles away. Connected with these points are other centers where are found bodies of Christians.

The entire district has now about 200 Christians, eight regular meeting places, three irregular meeting points, with eight evangelists, Mr. Dannenberg and myself to minister to them. Miss Clark is also doing a very effective work among the women.

Revival Begun by Pastor Chen.

The revival had begun in the Chuchow church in a series of addresses by Pastor Chen, in which Chen himself led in the confessions. The way opened and Mr. Dannenberg and Chen went in the power of the Holy Spirit to Gwan-wei. Then Shi joined them and they went to Tswein-dziao. Then they all gathered at Chuchow for three days, where the presence of the Holy Spirit was as marked as at the first. Then Mr. Dannenberg and Chen went to Wu-i, and Shi went with Evangelist Dju and Wu to Djan-ba-ling, sixteen miles north of Chuchow, at another outstation.

The meetings usually lasted three days, with three services each day. Some of the results were shown in money pledges and confessions by non-Christians. Besides the confessions of sin by a large majority of the Christians, seventy-three outsiders made confession of faith in Christ. The Christians sent in the names of almost 300 others for whom they individually pledged themselves to work and pray to win to Christ. The subscriptions for Christian work were much augmented and twelve became members of the Tenth Legion. This latter we are much indebted to A. A. Everts, the greater leader of American tithers, who lives in Dallas, Texas. We have been in correspondence with him since we met him during the rallies of '06-'07, and he has sent us many helpful aids in developing this line of work for the Lord.

Christianity Strengthened Among Outsiders.

The influence of Christianity was greatly strengthened among outsiders. One of the finest young men in this section of the country, an educational leader in a nearby city, said when told of the effects of the revival on the Christians, "I have never heard of anything like that among the Chinese. When any great Chinese confessed his sins, he usually did it to win approbation and gain influence, and we always feared him. But this is altogether a different thing."

Then he added, "Dr. Osgood, you do not know what a heavy burden I am carrying. I have come to believe in God and Christ and the power of the Holy Spirit. I know I ought to become a follower of Christ. I know I am a sinner. I have to confess with shame that I have not the courage to do so yet." He will some day.

Another place where the effects of the revival are being seen is the wonderful interest in the study of the Bible. The Sunday-school formerly numbered forty or fifty in attendance, and those attending were very irregular. Now every Sunday the chapel is crowded to the doors. The number has passed the 130 mark and a majority are regular in attendance. Instead of four classes we have eleven.

Sunday Problem in China.

The problem of observing Sunday as a rest and worship day has been always before us. A Christian might rest himself, but if he had a number of heathen workmen, how could he have them rest? To have them not work on that day meant much financial loss to him, and perhaps the workmen would but spend the day gambling.

One carpenter of whom we gave a sketch in "Breaking Down Chinese Walls," rose at the close of the revival here and said, "I have studied over the problem but always feared to try to stop Sunday work. I am going to make the experiment now. More than that, I am going to give one-tenth of my income to the Lord." The next day he began a contract for overhauling a building on which he had fifteen men at work. Moreover he searched among the poor Christians and enquirers and took a number of them on the job at good pay. "I am going to try to make my trade glorify God," he said.

There is another carpenter whom we are watching with interest. Before the revival he had grown cold. Both he and his wife had been members of the church for years. He had never seemed to try to increase his skill in his trade. Just before the local revival, his wife was overtaken with labor pains. The presence of the missionary doctor (and his work) saved the lives of both mother and child. The whole was known to the Christian community and the contrast between heathen and civilized methods was so apparent that it became the local talk for the time. Old Evangelist Shi said, "Could the Chinese people only know these scientific methods and practice them it would save the lives of thousands of women and children.

Conversion of a Carpenter.

The carpenter was so strongly moved by the saving of his wife and baby boy that both he and his wife have become new people. He is as enthusiastic a Christian worker today as he was cold and indifferent last fall. He, too, is among the tithers. The other day when the Christian Endeavorers were short of money for a good work, he said, "Go ahead. I will pay the rest of the bill," and he did. Oh, Mr. Everts, your influence is far-reaching.

There is another old man who has often tried the patience of the missionaries. Long ago Brother Hearnden led him to Christ, a poor illiterate farmer. He went to Nanking to have his children educated, and Mr. Meigs took him on as cook. The man's temper made hard places for Mr. Meigs. Then he was shifted to Dr. Macklin's city dispensary to act as gate-keeper, and later his son went into Dr. Macklin's hospital to study medicine. The old man did not see why the missionaries should not help people out of their legal troubles, and did many little things on the sly in the name of the foreigners. Then one day Dr. Macklin found him using the doctor's card to smuggle firearms across the river for a friend. The doctor also strongly suspected that the son was misappropriating the clinic funds, and so he dismissed both father and son.

Again Trusted as Keeper.

They came across the river, seemed to show fruits of repentance. Mr. Arnold opened Tswein-dziao as an outstation and put the old man in as keeper. Later the son became my medical assistant. Of the latter we had no fault to find save that in religious matters he had lost his enthusiasm. The old man was later given the place of local preacher, but soon we found him again in his old business of helping people in legal cases, and we had to ask for his resignation. Since then while their memberships have been with the church, the old man has done many things to hinder the work of the gospel. We have been patient and waited.

The answer came during these meetings. The old man sat long while others confessed. Finally he arose and told the story of how all through the years he had been unwilling to listen, and bound to have his own way. He told of the times he had wronged the missionaries and Christians. "Now," he said, "God helping me, I am no longer going to hinder but help." He, too, became a tither and his son is going into the ministry. God bless them all.

President Dickie's Prohibition Argument

Sixteen Items in the Prohibition Advocate's Indictment of the Liquor Traffic, Which Neither the Evasion, Extenuation, or Rebuttal of His Antagonist Could Shatter or Discredit

In the two debates already held between Mayor Rose and President Dickie, the latter, championing the Prohibition side, presented two completely distinct arguments for the abolition of the drink traffic which are equally effective but afford in their diverse data and reasoning a striking illustration of the breadth and scope of the Prohibition argument.

President Dickie's first address at Milwaukee detailed the basic reasons why the liquor traffic was economically wasteful and dangerous. In his opening address in the Chicago debate, Dr. Dickie emphasized the social and scientific side of the Prohibition issue and announced that "in the third debate of the series, I am hoping to put before Mayor Rose the most comprehensive and the most conclusive array of statistics ever gathered in connection with a discussion of this important question."

Four Leading Points of His Milwaukee Argument.

A consecutive study, therefore, of President Dickie's argument at Milwaukee and Chicago reveals some fifteen items of indictment of the liquor trade as a legalized traffic, not one of which have so far been shaken or answered by his distinguished opponent. The argument of his Milwaukee address is summarized in these four paragraphs at the beginning of Mr. Dickie's Chicago oration:

"In the first debate of the series, I undertook to lay down and to establish by statistical proof, court decisions and documentary evidence, the following propositions:

"1. That the liquor traffic on economic grounds is entirely defenseless, that the business creates no value, meets no legitimate want of society, absorbs vast values; that it is the enemy of prosperity and the foe of labor, that in proportion to the capital invested it employs the smallest number of workmen and pays the least amount in wages.

"2. That the liquor traffic debauches and degrades all who come in contact with it and is the most prolific source from which come recruits to our criminal classes.

"3. That the traffic itself is a huge organized criminal, the large majority of the men engaged in the business being flagrant and frequent violators of law, and

"4. That Prohibition though imperfectly enforced and by no means ideal, has nevertheless proved itself to be the most effectual means of restraint."

The line of argument adopted in the debate by President Dickie's Chicago address discloses the following conspicuous points which the Prohibition advocate developed in succession and none of which drew any effective rebuttal from their license antagonist:

The Chicago Argument.

"The commodity in which the saloon deals is a commodity unlike the ordinary commodities that are sold over the counter in other retail establishments.

"Any commodity whose free and general use promotes the health, wealth and advancement of mankind cannot be excluded from the open market in a country like this except by the most unwarranted and tyrannical exercise of power on the part of a triumphant and despotic majority.

"Liquor is a commodity of such peculiar properties that the state may well apply to it restraints and safeguards not necessary in the case of ordinary articles of merchandise."

Effect on the Patron.

"If I were to ask you to consider the effect of the hardware store or the grocery upon its patron, you would deem me daft and smile your incredulity at all I might affirm. You will, however, give a most respectful hearing if I consume ten minutes of my time calling your attention to the manifest and uniformly hurtful effect which the saloon has upon its patron. I cannot even enumerate all the harmful consequences.

"Let five of the number suffice for our present purpose and I ask you to note what is the effect of the saloon upon its patron as to his reputation, as to his health and length of life, as to his occupation, as to his efficiency, and as to his character.

"First then, what does the saloon do for the reputation of its patron? The saloon blasts and blights and ruins the good name of any man who will spend his money at the bar.

Second, what does the liquor business do for the health and long life of its patron? Few among us but have seen health ruined and lives shortened by the use of alcholic liquors."

Here Mr. Dickie presented an overwhelming array of scientific and medical testimony which united in declaring the danger in even the moderate indulgence in alcholic liquors, and which were for the most part comprehended in a remarkable pronouncement signed by 664 doctors at the instance of the British Medical Temperance Association:

"1. That experiments show that small quantities of alcohol are injurious, and that it is not a food.

"2. That it increases liability to disease and shortens life.

"3. That abstainers do more work, live longer, have less sickness and quicker recovery.

"4. That the bodily functions are best performed without alcohol, in spite of delusions to the contrary.

"5. That alcohol injures the offspring and leads to the deterioration of the race."

"Third, what does the saloon do for its patron in opening or closing doors of opportunity?

"The United States Department of Labor, using percentages based upon several thousand reports, found that ninety per cent of railways, seventy-nine per cent of manufactories, eighty-eight per cent of trades and seventy-two per cent of agriculturists discriminate against employees addicted to the use of intoxicants as a beverage.

"The patron of a saloon may drive a garbage wagon or get a steady job as a doorkeeper of a dance hall, but he cannot drive a locomotive or secure employment as a paying teller in a bank. He may clean cuspidors in a barroom and sweep up refuse on the street, but he cannot be trusted to run a stationary engine, drive a passenger omnibus, fire a boiler, amputate a leg, administer medicine, fill a prescription, keep a set of books, try an important case, manage a business corporation or do any other work demanding a clear head and a steady hand.

"The saloon which takes its patron's money, double crosses him for disappointment and failure in the race of life."

"Fourth, what does the saloon do for its patron in the way of promoting or decreasing his efficiency as a workman with either hand or head? The answer is so obvious and the time so short I leave the inquiry without discussion, confident that every auditor has long since lost the count as to the number of his friends and acquaintances whom he has seen steadily dropping from one grade of employment to another of lower rank because his too faithful patronage of the saloon has impaired his nerves, taken the steadiness from his hand and robbed him of that clearness of mind and accuracy of judgment essential to the more lucrative employments."

"Fifth, what does the saloon do for the character of its patron? Does it ever elevate, ennoble and improve human character? Does it ever inspire to lofty thought, self-sacrificing devotion and exalted endeavor? Does the influence of the saloon ever change a shiftless loafer into an industrious workman or convert a worthless vagabond into an honorable citizen? Who can testify that saloons turn brutal husbands and inhuman fathers into loving, conjugal companions and affectionate parental guides? Who, Mr. Mayor, who dares to say that the saloon does aught but degrade and bestialize and curse and corrupt and damn forever all who yield themselves to its pernicious power?

Standing of the Dealers.

"In all other vocations we are accustomed to admit that men are 'good, bad and indifferent,' and are not likely to jump to conclusion as to the manner of man one is simply because we know the business he follows.

"The liquor traffic, however, is an exception to the rule and seems to set the brand of Cain upon all who engage in it. By the common consent of all mankind it is an accepted proposition that the saloonkeeper and the bartender are bad men, the net result of whose life and labor is to lower the moral tone of the community and mark the dealers as base and deliberate destroyers of all that is best in human life.

"There is a black mark on the liquor dealer. Most churches will not have him. The fraternal societies exclude him save only two or three created by himself, and very largely he finds the doors of the best homes are to him forbidden portals. He is the foul bird of our social fabric and must flock by himself or live the solitary life.

"Of the great fraternal orders, the following bar saloonkeepers and bartenders from membership: Gleaners, Tribe of Ben Hur, American Yeomen, Catholic Mutual Benefit Association, Catholic Order of Foresters, Fraternal Brotherhood, Fraternal Union of America, Red Man Foresters, Odd Fellows, Junior Order of United American Mechanics, Knights of Columbus, Knights of Honor, Maccabees, Knights of Pythias, Modern Woodmen, Mystic Workers, National Union, Protected Home Circle, Royal League, Woodmen of the World."

The Saloon Man's Mode of Defense.

"The fourth peculiarity of this very peculiar traffic is its method of defense. It must be admitted by friend and foe alike that the liquor traffic is now on the defensive. It is on trial before the court of all the people and is endeavoring to show cause why it should not be sent at once to the electrical chair.

"The defense of the saloon is largely made up of falsehood, forgery, boycotting, bulldozing, assaults, dynamiting, arson and murder. I have here the documents to prove every one of these statements in each specific case. If every American citizen cou'd know the saloon exactly as it is, the horrible institution could not endure the storm of indignation for one short period of six months.

Who are its Defenders?

"Wipe out the saloon and the social evil becomes an easier problem with which to deal. The wine room is the vestibule of the house of shame, while liquor inflames and arouses the evil propensities of those who are the patrons of the horrid trade.

"Speaking broadly and admitting an occasional exception, you will find on the side of Prohibition the ministers, the White Ribbon Women, the Y. M. C. A. workers, the Sunday-school teachers, the college professors, the church members, the best of our business and professional men, and in general, the education, culture and refinement of our citizenship.

"On the saloon side, besprinkled all too freely with gentlemen of eminent respectability, you will find a group controlled and dominated by distillers and brewers and saloonkeepers and bartenders, and to which thieves and thugs and gamblers and harlots give their loyal support.

"If we knew nothing else about the liquor traffic, the character of its friends and defenders ought to damn it forever."

The Saloon in Politics.

"One of the most dangerous influences exerted by the liquor traffic grows out of its disposition and ability to meddle with politics. On November 12, 1862, the United States Brewers' Association held its first congress in the city of New York. The introduction to the constitution adopted at that time has this to say: 'The owners of breweries, separately, are unable to exercise a proper influence in the interest of the craft in the legislature and public administration.' 'That it appears especially necessary for the brewing trade that its interests be vigorously prosecuted before the legislative and executive departments, as this branch of business is of considerable political and financial importance.'

"We have great corporations that are sometimes brazen enough in their efforts to effect desired legislation, but we have never had in the United States any more wicked, selfish and unpatriotic exhibition of corrupt combination for selfish ends than is to be found in the solidarity of the liquor forces. With them it is liquor first and the country afterwards, but liquor all the time.

"Henry Watterson, editor Louisville Courier Journal says: 'Every office, from the president's down is handed out over the saloon counter.' Theodore Roosevelt, when police commissioner of the city of New York, said: 'The most powerful saloonkeeper controlled the politicians and the police, while the latter in turn terrorized and blackmailed all other saloonkeepers. If the American people do not control it, it will control them.'

"Hear the Indianapolis News again: 'The saloon is a running sore on the body politic. It is a vicious, contagious, dangerous plague spot. There is not room for it and liberty both to live, one or the other must go.'

"Civil liberty and the liquor traffic are engaged today, as never before, in a death struggle. It is the last great desperate battle. I am not here to tell you that one or the other must go down. I am here with my feet on the solid rock of the constitution, with my front to the foe and my eyes on the stars to tell you that civil liberty will live and the saloon will die."

Goliath Rum on the Run

By William Oeschger

For the truth of the title of this article we thank God and take courage. The victory for which some of us have prayed and labored long is now coming to us, or will speedily reach us. From every party of our country comes cheering news. It is a doleful tale that the enemy has to tell. Everywhere they tell of diminished business as a result of the rising tide of prohibition. But their losses are our gains. The saloon is going. It may not be going as rapidly as it should, or as rapidly as we would like to see it go, but, thank God, its days are numbered. The social program of Jesus will not admit of its existence in society. This is the age of man. It is he that is the end and aim of Christian civilization, and not money. The quickened sense of brotherhood among men will not countenance the continuance of this terrible man-destroying institution, the licensed saloon.

The Disciples and Temperance

But while this is all going on, we pause to ask the question, What part are the Disciples of Christ taking in this titanic conflict? What are we doing while this fearful struggle is going on? The battle rages fiercely. The battle is gigantic in its magnitude, and far reaching in its results. Every inch of the ground is being stubbornly contested. The enemy that is opposed to us holds on with great doggedness. He only yields a point when actually driven to it by main force. We ask again, in this struggle, what are we doing? The struggle has been open to us always. Have we shouldered our share of the work? We answer, we have not done all that we should have done, but we have a record of which we may feel justly proud. The Churches of Christ, and the ministers among the Disciples, can be counted upon in almost any community, to do their part, when it comes to driving the saloon our of existence. In such a struggle you will find our people standing shoulder to shoulder with our good Methodist brethren in fighting the rum traffic. We can face our record as a whole with pride, when compared with that of other evangelical church bodies in our country.

Yet, while we have done well in the past, we must do better in the future. We must quicken our pace and double our zeal. The deadliest part of the conflict is still in the future. The call to action was never more urgent than just now.

At the National Convention held in Norfolk, Va., in October, 1907, the temperance leaders in our brotherhood organized the American Temperance Board of the Church of Christ. It selected six well-known ministers and the same number of prominent laymen as members of the Board. The REV. WILLIAM OESCHGER.

Board at the present time is composed of the following brethren: President, Judge S. R. Artman; vice-president, Harry G. Hill; secretary, Dr. H. J. Hall; treasurer, A. L. Orcutt; W. H. Book, Austin Hunter, E. L. Frazier, Robert Sellers, Prof. Jabez Hall, Judge H. C. Barnett, A. B. Kirkpatrick, and O. O. Frazier.

The object of the board is officially stated as follows:

1. To do Educational Temperance Work in and through the church by use of literature, the pulpit, the platform and the press, and give the temperance cause its proper place and emphasis in the church.

2. To co-operate with the Inter-Church Temperance Council, and other temperance organizations and agencies for the prevention of the liquor habit and the destruction of the liquor traffic.

Official Equality with Other Interests

The men that are behind this board believe that the work of temperance should be given official equality with all the other departments of the church. It is the purpose to make temperance an organic work of the church. The board has well matured plans for carrying on its work. It aims to organize and to bring into perfect working order all of the various temperance forces in our brotherhood. It purposes to lead our people unreservedly into the conflict which under God is destined to result in the overthrow of the greatest enemy that the church of God has to contend with today, the saloon.

At the New Orleans Convention, the secretary of the board, Dr. H. J. Hall, made a most excellent report of the first year's work of the board. The Convention also listened to two speakers on the temperance question. No sessions of the Convention were more enthusiastic than was the temperance session. The resolutions presented by the board and unanimously passed by the Convention took possibly the highest ground that was ever taken by a great religious body in America. One of them was: "That we adopt as the principles of the Church of Christ on the temperance question: 1. Total abstinence for the individual. 2nd. Prohibition for the state and nation. 3rd. A political party in power committed to this policy of state and national prohibition and the enforcement of all laws." This is indeed high ground. But is no higher than it should be.

The board has excellent literature to send to those who desire it. Any one desiring such literature should write Dr. H. J. Hall, of Franklin, Indiana. The board solicits an offering from churches, Sunday-schools, and Young People's Societies, once a year. The writer will ask the Sunday-school in the

Influential Layman Gone

Ex-Governor Poynter of Nebraska, a Strong Man in Church and Society, Passes Away. A Model Elder in the Lincoln Church

By H. H. Harmon

The church family of the First Christian Church of this city are in deep sorrow because of the loss of one of its elders, ex-Governor W. A. Poynter. On Lord's Day preceding his death he was in attendance at both morning evening services of the church and at Bible-school. He presided at the communion service in the morning and addressed to the congregation what proved to be his last words to them in connection with that service. At Bible-school he taught his class consisting of sixty young married people. There was nothing about his appearance or conduct to give the slightest intimation to friends of the impending end.

On Monday morning, April 5, he went with a delegation of several hundred temperance workers to the State House to call upon Governor Shallenberger to urge upon him the signing of the bill passed by the legislature in its last days, known as the "Daylight Saloon Bill," compelling saloons to close throughout the state at 8 p. m. Mr. Poynter was the first spokesman of the delegation. He delivered a brief speech which, while entirely impromptu, was notable for its fluency, ease and the earnestness with which he spoke and the personal touch which made it very impressive upon the assemblage in the governor's office, even before the tragic end.

He urged the signing of the bill on moral grounds, on business grounds, and on political grounds, urging that the liquor interests have become arrogant and have tried to control the policies of the state and that their political influence should be lessened.

"I am opposed to any special interest dictating our politics," he said. "I believe that from any standpoint—moral, political or business—it will be for the best interests of Nebraska to have this bill become a law, and I believe if left to the vote of the people it would prevail by a large majority."

Two or three minutes after ending his speech and taking up a position back in the crowd, he was stricken and would have fallen to the floor except for being caught in the arms of men near him who bore him to the office of the adjutant general across the hall. It is the verdict of physicians who happened to be present that death was practically instantaneous. The statement was made by the physician that Mr. Poynter had an old endocardial trouble and in all probability his death was the result of an embolus, they adding that it is likely that the effort put forth in making the speech caused one of the roughened vegetations from the heart to be thrown off into the circulation, carried to the brain and lodged there.

Mr. Harmon, his pastor, was near by when he was stricken and carried the word to the members of the family.

Owing to the incomplete state of the new First Christian Church building, the funeral service was held April 6 at 2:30 p. m., at St. Paul M. E. Church with a great throng in attendance, including Governor Shallenberger and other state officers and many other men and women of prominence. Dean A. M. Haggard, of Drake University, and many Christian ministers from over Nebraska were present and the ministerial association of Cotner and the Berean Brotherhood of the First Church attended in a body.

Chancellor Aylesworth read the Scripture lesson and ex-Lieutenant Governor J. E. Harris, a life-long minister of the Christian Church, offered prayer. The sermon was by his pastor, H. H. Harmon, being a tribute to the noble life of the deceased, rounded out in the full tide of its influence for good. A quartette consisting of Messrs. Spangler, Plumb, Selby and Walt sang the hymns, "Rock of Ages," "Jesus, Lead Me Lest I Stray," and "Lead, Kindly Light." The pulpit was covered with a great profusion of floral offerings from his Bible class, the official board, the Berean Brotherhood and other organizations of the church, from state officers and institutions and other friends.

A detachment of the State Farm Cadets led the funeral procession. The burial was at Wyuka cemetery in this city.

William A. Poynter was born near Eureka, Illinois, in 1848. His father was a minister of the Christian church. The son graduated at Eureka college at nineteen, and then taught school a few years and engaged in mercantile pursuits. In 1869 he married Miss Mariah McCorkle, who, together with her son, Dr. C. W. M. Poynter, and daughter, Mrs. Josephine Bickford, both of Lincoln, survive him. Mrs. Poynter is herself the daughter of a minister.

In 1879 Mr. and Mrs. Poynter removed to Boone County, Nebraska, and settled on a farm near Albion, which remained their home for twenty years. A part of their one-story frame house they had framed in Illinois and brought with them, all their neighbors, few and far between, living in sod houses. Mr. Poynter engaged in general farming but made a specialty of a dairy herd with which he was highly successful. He was president of the Boone County Fair Association for six years. His brother, D. J. Poynter, still resides in Boone County, being editor of the Albion Argus.

W. A. Poynter was a member of the lower house of the state legislature in 1885, and was a member of and president of the state senate in 1891. He early became a leader in the Farmers' Alliance movement and later in the populist party and was its candidate for congress in 1892. In 1898 he was elected governor of Nebraska, defeating Judge M. L. Hayward of Nebraska City. He served as governor two years, being defeated for re-election in 1900 by Charles H. Dietrich through the opposition of the liquor interests.

Mr. and Mrs. Poynter have continued to reside in Lincoln since his term as governor ended. Of late years he was engaged in fraternal insurance work for some time and later became the president of the Security Savings & Loan Association of Lincoln upon its organization, and held that position until his death. He has also given considerable of his time and strength the last few years to the farmers' institute work of the State University throughout the state, for which his practical experience well fitted him. He has at all times lent his influence and efforts to every good cause and especially to the church of which he was a life-long member.

We have lost a model church officer. He knew what it meant to be an elder in the church of God. He possessed the qualifications for this office as few men to be found anywhere. He was "apt to teach" for he knew the Word. He was a born leader for he possessed a great Christian personality of force. His judgment seemed to be born of instinct, and a lover of the flock, he was therefore an "overseer," as scripturally implied.

His greatest place in the church was as teacher of the Word and his marked ability in this capacity had its master hold on the large adult class that was so devotedly fond of their leader. In the Berean Brotherhood he was one of its charter members and best leaders; his papers and discussions were always of the highest type and most helpful. He was the first president of the Joint Board of the Churches of Christ of Lincoln and vicinity and his last plea in meeting with his brother elders was for the recognition of the claims of the many fields yet untouched by our cause in this city.

At our social gatherings he was a tower of strength, his life and heart pervading the entire atmosphere. He had sympathy for every movement that he believed good and worthy. The New Testament Church in its simplicity without sham or makeshift was a living principle of his life. He believed the church was divinely led and that the Lord always blessed his own plans and methods.

The Conquerer of death, the Dispenser of life will overrule this apparent calamity: His spirit shall fill; His hand shall guide and in his going the Father will bestow blessings upon us all, and, somehow, not yet understood, it shall prove the best. Nothing could have blended our hearts so much as one, making us conscious that we are a family in Christ Jesus, that his call to every one is to the church and for the extension of the Kingdom. How sweet the end. How triumphant. God will abundantly bless the believing hearts of the bereaved ones and the church shall become stronger as it shall seek to become truer to the ideals of our brother's heart and life.

—Miss Garibaldi, granddaughter of the liberator of Italy, and a former student of the Woman's college, Baltimore (Methodist Episcopal), has charge of the Girls' Home school in Via Garibaldi, Rome, under the auspices of the Woman's Foreign Missionary society of that church.

Shall the Disciples Grapple With the Big Task of Evangelizing the Foreign Population of Our Great Cities?

By Orvis F. Jordan

Just now the Disciples everywhere are discussing the advisability of taking a more serious part in the evangelization of the foreign speaking portions of the great cities. This sort of talk is heard in Chicago and in all of our cities where there are great foreign populations.

The facts are all on the side of those who take this position. The character of our country is rapidly changing. A writer in the Outlook recently raised the question whether it would not be well to frankly admit the fact that we now live in a Catholic country, since the majority of religious people of the country are Catholic or of Catholic extraction. In New York city there are more Jews than Protestants. In Chicago the great Catholic structures overshadow the greatest of the Protestant buildings. Their parish schools, hospitals and other public institutions are on every hand to testify to the virility of the old mother church. A far more significant fact, however, is the number of adherents to these ancient faiths who have lost their moorings and who are now unchurched when they are not actually irreligious. It is to be doubted if a third of the Catholics who come to this country remain in fellowship with their church. Rabbi Hirsch uttered a plaintive note recently in his great house of worship when he said the Jews were not a religious people as was supposed, and pointed to his empty pews for proof.

Hostility to All Religion.

Not only are people drifting away from religious ideas, but the contrary ideas are taking root. The materialism and sensualism of the city is alarming. Some foreign peoples like the Bohemians even have in their midst an anti-religious catechism which replaces Christian ideas with blasphemous references to the Christian religion. The number of divorces, the crimes of violence, the breaches of trust, are all evidences that there is not the support to moral and social ideas that is needed. Our civilization with all of its pride of achievement will go the way of the older civilizations if we do not introduce the saving salt of the religion of Jesus Christ. The city must be evangelized. When we ask how, however, we are confronted with a set of difficulties that give us pause. Since they that go to war ought first to count up the cost, it will be a most profitable enterprise to enumerate the difficulties to the evangelization of the foreign-speaking elements in our city populations.

Making a Beginning.

How shall we start a mission among the foreign-speaking peoples in Chicago or in New York City? Some suggest that we just rent a hall and start. Were we to start among the Greeks, we would find them with a daily paper in their own language and find that the greater part of them do not speak the English language at all. It is obviously necessary to evangelize them in their own tongue. But where is there a Disciple that speaks modern Greek? Was there ever a modern Greek that joined one of our churches? If there was and we had sent him away to one of our schools, he might at the end of his educational course tell us that he preferred to preach to Americans rather than to his own people. This difficulty is multiplied when we realize that forty-seven different languages are spoken in Chicago and for the most part by people who have too little English to do more than the simplest business transactions. We may have among us some Scandinavian preachers or some German preachers. There is work to be done among the people speaking these languages. In fact, these are the predominant foreign tongues of Chicago. But these people have come from the Lutheran countries and for the most part have the least need of any of our city population. Our city pastors all over the country will need to lay hands on every young man convert whose mother tongue is a foreign one and try to get him to enter the ministry if we are to have the competent helpers that are needed. One denomination in Chicago sent to Bohemia for a preacher of that denomination educated for the ministry in the native land. He had but meager results in Chicago and finally took his converts and went back into the Catholic church. It is obvious that the Disciples could not send back to Europe to get men to evangelize many of our foreign populations.

How Shall It Be Done?

If the question of men is a serious one, the question of methods is also serious. It will cost as much to evangelize Chinamen in Chicago as in Shanghai. Buildings must be erected. Methods must be devised that will be adapted to winning Chinamen and these will have to be financed. Our foreign societies have frankly admitted that their missionaries must do more than preach. Dr. Dye commends his gospel with surgical operations. Jacob Kenoly in Liberia commends his gospel with industrial education. Some of our missions maintain colleges. Some have hospitals. Others care for orphans. In the foreign work it is frankly recognized that as the miracles of Christ were expressions of sympathy so the preacher of today must show his sympathy and his good purpose by deeds.

A Chance for Experiment.

In our home mission work, it will not do to assume that the newly arrived foreigner is to be gained by imposing the details of our religious institutions upon him. Some of us like prayer meetings. It does not follow that a Greek will. Some of us enjoy Christian Endeavor societies. It does not follow that the Hungarians will express their religious life in this way. We have informal worship. A man reared in a Catholic church might reject Roman dogma and still hunger for the more formal ways of worshipping God. When we approach the task of evangelizing the foreign sections of Chicago we must not be unmindful of the work of Hull House and Chicago Commons. We could wish that these two institutions had somewhere in their program more of an evangelistic zeal. But we cannot forget that while the denominations still have only relatively small and unimportant missions, Hull House dominates the lives of the Greeks in its section and that Graham Taylor's institution has a wider sweep of influence than any mission run on the old lines. The ideal method for evangelizing the city has yet to be worked out. Perhaps it is the task of the Disciples to lead the way. But certain it is that all of our indications at present point in the direction of combining the methods of Hull House with the spirit of Gipsy Smith. When we talk of city missions among foreigners, we must be perfectly willing to make our mission a laboratory of methods until we shall find the way of approach to the problem.

Handicapped by Inadequate Buildings.

Another difficulty in the task of city missions among foreigners is the task of providing proper buildings. Even our own people who move here from the country and who have never worshipped in stately buildings, find our equipment in Chicago a rock of offense. They see the great ecclesiastical structures on every hand and feel ashamed of their own people. If this be so, we cannot expect the foreigner who has once been a worshipper in a cathedral to get fervidly religious in a grocery store meeting. Many of the denominations have recognized this and have built buildings for their work among foreigners at an expense of from ten to twenty thousand dollars in each plant. Even these buildings are overshadowed by great Catholic structures which cost a hundred thousand dollars. On the foreign field we have had to build in territory where the great works of architecture are not known. Our foreign societies are spending great sums of money for this purpose and wisely. We will have to make up our minds to do the same in the home fields if we are to have results commensurate with our labors.

A Big Task But We Can Do It.

These are but a few of the difficulties. Let it not be thought that we are doing the evil work of the ten spies who brought back the adverse report. Rather we report that the land to be possessed is desirable and "we are well able to possess it." We are a rich church. If we lag behind in giving, it is that we have not taught this Christian grace as we should. While we have been proving our point on baptism, the Methodist brother has proved his point on giving. We would not give up the glory of our achievement, but we should develop the tremendous power of the unused wealth among us for the glory of the Master. We have the money if we will give it. We will find the men if we hunt for them. We have the men of constructive genius to formulate the plans. We can be a mighty power for God in the city. We must have careful plans and an honest accounting of the difficulties. Those with faith in our message and in our Leader will achieve success.

CHICAGO CHURCH NOTES.

The Austin Church is planning to build this summer. They have one of the finest lots in their suburb and purpose to erect a building that can be paid for in full and which may eventually be used for the Sunday-school and certain institutional activities. The pastor, George A. Campbell, is out on a trip to Wisconsin.

O. F. Jordan is representing the interests of the Chicago work at the district conventions this month.

Geo. W. Muckley, Secretary of the Church Extension Board, P. C. Macfarlane, secretary of the Men's Brotherhood and A. W. Fortune of the Walnut Hills Church, Cincinnati, were among our out-of-town visitors last week. F. M. Rains was also here recently.

The district convention last week was a source of help to us. The addresses were of real significance to the church life of the district.

C. C. Morrison has been giving a series of Wednesday evening talks at the Monroe St. Church, on Centennial topics. He has spoken on Thomas Campbell, Alexander Campbell, Walter Scott and Barton W. Stone. Further topics will be: "The Organization of our Missionary Societies," and "Present Day Tendencies among the Disciples." The attendance has been most gratifying.

At a recent dinner at the Hyde Park Church, two members of the congregation spoke on current problems. John Cummings, Professor of Political Economy in the University of Chicago, spoke on the advances in that science the past ten years. Charles T. Hallinan, an editorial writer on the Chicago Evening Post, spoke on Social Settlements. He said the settlements were suffering from two causes. First, moneyed men were withdrawing support because of the sympathy of the settlement with the laboring man. Again, the indifference of the churches was a powerful factor.

Mrs. Willett, the mother of Dr. H. L. Willett continues very seriously ill.

The building committee at Evanston is hard at work upon the plans and hopes to turn ground early in June.

The sixth annual May breakfast of the Monroe Street Church was held the morning of Saturday, May 15, in the dining room of the church. The attendance was unusually good this year, being attended by about 175 persons. This custom was inaugurated during Prof. Ott's pastorate and is growing more popular every year.

The special service for young people at Monroe Street Church, last Sunday evening, was well attended. The music was especially attractive. The pastor spoke on, "The Peril of Character," from the text, "He knew not that the Lord had departed from him."

At the next church dinner at Evanston, the pastor will show some stereopticon slides made by the Lumiere Color Photography. The colors are reproduced by chemical processes. He will explain briefly the method of producing the pictures.

A number of our ministers are getting ready to spend vacations at Campbell Park, Pentwater, Michigan. Pentwater is getting to be a great rendezvous of the Disciples with the St. Louis colony on one side of the channel and the Chicago colony on the other.

George A. Campbell has been elected president of the permanent organization that is to erect a Protestant hospital in Austin. This recognition will be pleasing to all of our city churches. An agent has been employed to solicit funds and when fifty thousand dollars has been raised, the hospital will be erected.

The Gates of the West

By Burris A. Jenkins

"All hope abandon, ye who enter here." That is the inscription, not over the gates of the West, but over those of Dante's Inferno, which I have been sort of half-preaching, half-lecturing about to my people for the past three Sunday nights. Fancy the temerity—the Divine comedy in three evenings! But fools will ever rush in where angels mind the guide-boards.

Dante Versus Dooley.

Dante doesn't seem to be read quite as much as Mr. Dooley, et al, these days. Perhaps because it takes a little longer to read him, and this age and country seems to have learned well the oft-recurring lesson of Virgil to the visitor in Hell that time is very, very brief. Only, to put it in our vernacular, it would be "Time is our most valuable asset." We have to have time to build up towns and farm machinery, street railways and sewer systems. But Dante has evidently been heard of, and Gustav Dore seems to have told folk, in a general way, what is in Dante. At any rate, the Sunday night audiences were increased—even in the early automobile season—fully twenty-five per cent, and that, too, without uncomfortable crowding, or the need for hiring extra chairs.

Fertile in Applications.

On the whole, the Divina Comedia makes a pretty good series of topics for variety. It has scripture enough in it to make it palatable to the Disciples. With the Inferno you can scare, at least a little, the timid souls, who can be scared into trying to be good. With the Purgatory you can encourage the heavily laden who are struggling up the rocky steeps of this weary world. With the Paradise you can inspire the imaginations of those who love to look forward to a heaven in the Empyrean in a day that is yet to be. And after all, it's a rather poor situation if all the heaven we shall ever get is what comes to us in the day that now is. On the whole, the greatest benefit of the series will be to you who have the industry to plow clean through that great field of verse once more. Ah me! What wonderful sights and sounds in that variegated field!

Plowing Sometimes Monotonous.

After the Hell and the Purgatory, to be sure, the plowing grows at times very monotonous. You must go weary stretches, through theological discussions, outgrown scientific theories, and animadversions on the decadent orders of the Roman church; but the recurrent blazes of light on these plains of God more than compensate. No doubt Dante was temperamentally melancholy—one might say even morbid—and therefore far happier in descriptions of unhappy scenes. Certain it is, at least, that the charnel-houses of hell, the dissecting-room technique of the Inferno the wild and distorted imaginations of the regions of the damned are much more vivid and fascinating than the more conventionalized glories of the heavenly circles. It is rather an interesting question, too, whether the best company is not often found there. Was it Mark Twain who said, "Heaven for climate; hell for company?" The upward struggle through Purgatory, the repentance and the hope in the twilight world of that rugged mountain side is also more congenial to the exiled poet than is the beatific air of the blest.

Highest Reach of Eloquence.

Nevertheless the one highest reach of eloquence in the entire Divine Comedy, I think, is in the closing Cantos of the Paradise—the River of Light between its banks of verdure; the lake of glory with its overhanging cliffs gazing at themselves in its surface as if in admiration; the vast white rose formed by the expanding circles of spirits with Mary at the centre, Beatrice in the third row, and God in the ineffable, unbearable light. There is nothing like it for grandeur in all literature.

But for real human interest stories, as the newspaper men say, give me the Inferno and the Purgatory. Here are real living people who have fought the same fights we are in the thick of now. Here is the pathos and the tragedy we see all about us. There is nothing in the great epics or dramas that surpasses the touching pictures of Francesca da Rimini and Ugolino in the Tower of Hunger. Read them twenty times and they tug at your heart-strings all the more. And the meeting with Beatrice in the Purgatory, near the close, the loss of his beloved guide, Virgil, at the same time, these reach us.

Epigrammatic Skill of Dante.

What can be said of the thrills of joy that one gets at little single line or single word pictures dashed off with a skill—no, a genius—surpassing that of almost any artist in words the world has ever known—like the pearl hung on a white forehead, the half blind old tailor threading his needle, the notched arrow leaving the string! What is there to compare with the elaborated similes—not like those of Milton, Homer and the rest, so elaborated and so detached that they could be left out without injury to the sense or story; glorious to look at, but like art-glass windows, not essential to the light—but similes and metaphors that could not be sacrificed without actual loss to clearness and vividness, real windows of translucent glass letting in the light.

Longfellow and Dante.

Longfellow's comparison of the Divine Comedy to a vast Cathedral, bewildering and inspiring in its gorgeous mass and ornamentation is about the best brief thing that has been said of it:

"Oft have I seen at some Cathedral door.
A laborer, pausing in the dust and heat,
Lay down his burden, and with reverent feet,
Enter and cross himself, and, on the floor,
Kneel to repeat his paternoster o'er.
Far off the noises of the world retreat,
The loud vociferations of the street,
Become an undistinguishable roar.
So, as I enter here, from day to day,
And lay my burden at this minster gate,
Kneeling in prayer, and not ashamed to pray,
The tumult of the time disconsolate
To inarticulate murmurs dies away,
While the eternal ages watch and wait.
"How strange the sculptures that adorn these towns,
This crowd of statues, in whose folded sleeves
Birds build their nests, while, canopied with leaves,
Parvis and Portal bloom like trellised bowers.
And the vast minster seems a cross of flowers.
But fiends and dragons on the gargoyled eaves
Watch the dead Christ between the living thieves,
And underneath the traitor Judas lowers.
Ah, from what agonies of heart and brain,
What exultations trampling on despair,
What tenderness, what tears, what life of wrong,
What passionate outcry of a soul in pain,
Up rose this poem of the earth and air,
This medieval miracle of song."

A Startling Question

An eight-year-old youngster recently came to her father after church service one Sunday and astonished him by asking:

"Daddy, have I any children?"

The old man dropped his newspaper and regarded her in amazement.

"What?" he demanded.

"Have I any children?" doggedly repeated the child.

"Well, I should hope not," replied the father. "May I ask the reason of this startling question?"

"Why, in church this morning," explained the youngster, "the minister preached about children's children and I wondered if I had any."—Lippincott's.

What Julie Taught the Teacher

By Frances J. Delano.

If any one had told Julie that the new teacher was going to learn more of her than Julie was of the new teacher wouldn't she have opened her eyes! It was true all the same, and this is the way it happened.

When Miss Field tied on her veil, just before starting for school that first morning, she said to herself:

"What's the use of trying to be anybody? My hair is thin and my face is sallow and these glasses are so unbecoming. This world has no use for plain people like me."

Poor Miss Field was discouraged that morning, and if it hadn't been for Julie she might have kept on being discouraged, and then what would have become of her I wonder!

Now Julie was a very plain little girl. Her hair was thin like Miss Field's, and she wore glasses, too, and although her face wasn't sallow, it was dreadfully freckled. When she came tripping into the schoolhouse after the gong struck, Miss Field thought she was as homely a child as she had ever seen.

Of course neither Julie nor Miss Field knew that Julie was to teach a very important lesson that day; nevertheless Julie started right in on the lesson just as if she knew she was to do it, and Miss Field began at once to learn it.

First, when Julie came in the room, she began to show a great interest in everything around her. Her jolly, little, round eyes behind the glasses darted hither and thither, taking in the new teacher, the new globe on the platform, Mary McPhearson's new dress which was piped with red, the new scholar—a pretty little girl whose looks seemed to delight Julie very much. Many other things interested her, and every once in a while Miss Field's eyes would rove round to where Julie sat, and she couldn't help smiling at her. "That child isn't troubling herself about her plain face," said Miss Field to herself. You see the new teacher had already begun on the lesson Julie had set her.

By and by Miss Field began to examine her pupils on their last term's work. Julie took the liveliest interest in the recitations. She watched the children's faces while they were reciting and listened to every word they said, just as if their success or failure was a matter of vital importance to her. Her eyes lighted with satisfaction when the answers were correct, and when they were wrong her disappointment was quite decided.

"Well, well," said Miss Field to herself, "that child is as interested in each recitation as if it were her own. What an unselfish little creature she must be!"

After this speech you may be sure that Julie's success as a teacher was assured.

At recess time Miss Field went down in the yard to watch the children play, and there everybody was inquiring for Julie.

"Come play with me, Julie."

"Julie, isn't this the way to play Flumpy?"

"Julie, I want to tell you a secret."

"Julie, want a piece of my apple?"

Miss Field heard remarks like these on every side, and Julie was here, there and everywhere.

"Dear me," said Miss Field to herself, "how the children do like Julie! Seems to me looks don't count in her case." You see the new teacher was progressing.

At noon, when Miss Field was putting on her things to go home, she saw there was trouble on the playground. The children were gathered round the pretty, new girl, who was talking very fast.

"I don't want to play with Julie," Miss Field heard her say, "I don't like her; she wears glasses and has lots of freckles."

"There!" said Miss Field to herself, "now, here's trouble for Julie; she's got to reckon with her freckles. It's just as I said this morning—the world has no use for plain people."

"I don't think we know how to play the game without Julie," said Mary McPhearson.

"I don't care! I wouldn't be seen playing with her," declared the pretty, new girl.

"She is homely," acknowledged Jane Butler.

"I never saw such freckles," said Bessie Conant.

"Nor I," agreed Nellie Davis.

"Nor I."

"Nor I."

It seemed now as if everybody was turning against Julie. Miss Field was just going to take her part when she saw her bounding across the yard. "Come," cried Julie, "we'll play the new game. It's lots of fun."

The children made no move to begin. Julie stopped short.

"What's the matter?" she asked eagerly.

The children looked at the pretty, new girl. "She doesn't want to play with you," spoke up Jane Butler.

"Why not?" inquired Julie.

Before Miss Field could speak, some child blurted out the truth. "For shame!" cried Miss Field, starting towards the group of girls; but she stopped before she had taken two steps, for she saw that Julie was equal

RICHARD W. GENTRY, PREACHER

THE DICKEY DIALOGUES.

We're going to the woods. Say, won't we have a good time though? Now, you let me carry it awhile, won't you? There he goes; isn't he a pretty red, though? There he is now on that limb. Don't the leaves sink down squshy-like though? Oh look what I've found; here's some more! We'll take them home to mother. Say, I am getting awfully thirsty. Wonder where we can get a drink. Oh come here quick! No don't try to drink out of it that way. Let's build a wall around it. I will pile the mud up and you put in the rocks. Wasn't that good though? My, this is hard climbing! Well, here we are at last. Let's eat our lunch right here. Say, I was hungry, weren't you? Did you see that rabbit? Didn't he run though? Say, aren't there lots of creatures in the woods? Who do you suppose takes care of them?

Yes, that's what mother says, that God cares for even the tiniest bird.

I guess if He's got time for all of them he must have lots of time to think about us, don't you? Do you suppose God is thinking about us? Say, I'm glad we came to the woods, aren't you?

I guess we ought to go home; mother said that when the shadows began to get long we were to start. Say, it takes lots longer to get home, doesn't it? Say, I'm tired, aren't you? Did you hear that screech owl? Sounded fun-ny, didn't it?

Now, it is my time tonight; you slept in front last night. I'm going to write a poem on spring tomorrow. Why, Tommy's asleep!! There goes that owl again. Doesn't he sound fu-n-n-y though? Say, Tommy, wake up and TAWK to me!!

The Poem.*

"Springtime is here
Birds are near.
The buds are green,
Now the bluebird is seen,
And springtime is here again.

The flicker to the tree does tap,
And out of the tree does come the sap.
March winds, April showers,
Do bring forth May and June flowers.
And the springtime is here again."

to the occasion.

"Dear me!" cried Julie, "I thought something awful had happened. Why!" she exclaimed, turning to the pretty, new girl, "what do you care for freckles and things, long's I know how to play the game? Come on."

Julie laughed and danced away, and the children followed, every one of them, even the pretty, new girl!

Miss Field stood a moment and watched the children. A big tear had gathered in each one of her eyes, yet her face was beaming. "Dear little teacher!" said she softly, "she knows how to play the game and so her books don't count. Now I'm going to try Julie's way, indeed I will."

When the new teacher got back to her boarding place she began to "play the game." She greeted all the guests with the pleasantest smile. She took an interest in everything they said and did, and she told them about Julie, although, of course, she didn't mention any names. Happy tears came into her eyes as she talked, and after she had gone back to school the boarders got together and decided that the new teacher was "lovely." Wasn't Julie a nice little teacher?

She had just explained to her best young man one eve as they strolled down the drive that she was going in for plainer and more conservative styles in dress to prove to skeptical men that not all of the opposite sex were slaves to the insane styles so much in vogue. On turning a corner they saw bearing down upon them two of her dearest enemies arrayed in the most extreme. Quick as a flash the changed one dragged the young man into the shade of a clump of lilac bushes until the other women had passed. She explained as she peered over her right shoulder that she wouldn't be seen at that time of eve in a morning gown for anything. Just then the fat man in the moon got behind a cloud and laughed.

How to Save Time

BY MARY A. WOOD.

"Where's my cap? Do help me find it!"

"Where did you leave it, Jack?"

"I forget, mother. Somebody must have hidden it, just to bother me!"

"I guess not," said his sister Kate. "I saw it hanging on a chair last night."

"I shall surely be late. He told me to be there at nine o'clock sharp."

"Have you looked in the closet?"

"Yes, it isn't there."

"Could it by any possibility be on the hat-rack in the hall?"

Out rushed Jack to look.

"Here it is!" called Kate, pulling it from under a sofa pillow on the couch.

"Have you your overshoes?" called his mother.

"Don't want them; the ground is frozen hard."

"But there will be mud at noon."

Back he came. "Somebody has stolen them! I know I left them here last night."

"I've found them!" called Kate.

"I forgot; I came in the back door, didn't I?"

At last he was off. It was Saturday; there was no school, so he could work all day for Mr. Leavett. He had missed the car, and he started off on a brisk trot, wishing he had his gloves, for the air was keen. "I left them with my cap, I think. I must be a pretty careless boy, no mistake. Mother and Kate are always telling me so; but it's hard for a fellow to put his things where they belong. It would surely save time, though I hope Mr. Leavett won't mind very much if I am a little late this morning."

Jack came home at noon. "I'm hungry as a bear!" he said as he sat down to dinner.

"Were you busy all the morning?" asked his mother.

"No mother, and I suppose it was my own fault. I was so late—I missed the car, you know—that Mr. Leavett thought I was not coming and he gave two errands to Alec. Hunter, and I have made only twenty cents."

"Why were you late?" asked his father.

Jack's face flushed at the question, but he gave a truthful account of the matter, not sparing himself, and concluded by saying: "I wanted my gloves the worst way, but I've no idea where I left them. Have you seen them lying around anywhere, Kate? You always seem to know where everything is."

"I know where your gloves are, and for once you put them in their proper place and forgot to look there."

"Can't you tell a fellow? You don't mean" —— For Kate had picked up the coat he threw down on a chair as he came in, and pointed to one of the pockets.

"Well, I am a goose! They were in my pocket all the time! I'm going to turn over a new leaf. You needn't laugh, Miss Kate. I mean it, and the next time I can't find my belongings you may let me hunt till I do find them."—"The Sunbeam."

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

It was a week or two before Winston was on his feet again, and Maud Barrington was one of the first to greet him when he walked feebly into the hall. She had, however, decided on the line of conduct that would be most fitting, and there was no hint of more than neighborly kindness in her tone. They had spoken about various trifles when Winston turned to her.

"You and Miss Barrington have taken such good care of me that if I consulted my inclinations I would linger in convalescence a long while," he said. "Still, I must make an effort to get away tomorrow."

"We cannot take the responsibility of letting you go under a week yet," said Maud Barrington. "Have you anything especially important to do?"

"Yes," said Winston, and the girl understood the grimness of his face. "I have."

"It concerns the fire?"

Winston looked at her curiously. "I would sooner you did not ask me that question, Miss Barrington."

"I scarcely fancy it is necessary," said the girl, with a little smile. "Still, I have something to tell you, and a favor to ask. Ferris has left Silverdale, and you must never make any attempt to discover what caused the fire."

"You know?"

"Yes," said Maud Barrington. "Dane, Macdonald, and Hassal know, too, but you will not ask them, and if you did they would not tell you."

"I can refuse you nothing," said Winston with a laugh, though his voice betrayed him. "Still, I want a quid pro quo. Wait until Ferris's farm is in the sale list and then take it with the growing crop."

"I could not. There are reasons," said the girl.

Winston gazed at her steadily, and a little color crept to his forehead, but he answered unconcernedly, "They can be over-ridden. It may be the last favor I shall ever ask of you."

"No," said Maud Barrington. "Anything else you wish, but not that. You must believe, without wondering why, that it is out of the question!"

Winston yielded with a curious little smile. "Well," he said, "we will let it drop. I ask no questions. You have accepted so much already without understanding it."

CHAPTER XVII.

With the Stream.

It was Winston's last afternoon at the Grange, and almost unpleasantly hot, while the man whose vigor had not as yet returned to him was content to lounge in the big window-seat listlessly watching his companion. He had borne the strain of effort long, and the time of his convalescence amid the tranquility of Silverdale Grange had with the gracious kindliness of Miss Barrington and her niece been a revelation to him. There were moments when it brought him bitterness and self-reproach, but these were usually brief, and he made the most of what he knew might never be his again, telling himself that it would at least be something to look back upon.

Maud Barrington sat close by, glancing through the letters a mounted man had brought in, and the fact that his presence put no restraint on her curiously pleased the man. At last, however, she opened a paper and passed it across to him.

"You have been very patient, but no doubt you will find something that will atone for my silence there," she said.

Winston turned over the journal, and then smiled at her. "Is there anything of moment in your letters?"

"No," said the girl, with a little laugh. "I scarcely think there is—a garden party, a big reception, the visit of a high official, and a description of the latest hat. Still, you know, that is supposed to be enough for us."

"Then I wonder whether you will find this more interesting: 'The bears made a determined rally yesterday, and wheat moved back again. There was later in the day a rush to sell, and prices now stand at almost two cents below their lowest level.'"

"Yes," said Maud Barrington, noticing the sudden inertness of his pallid face. "I do. It is serious news for you?"

"And for you! You see where I have led you. Ill or well, I must start for Winnipeg tomorrow."

Maud Barrington smiled curiously. "You and I and a handful of others stand alone, but I told you I would not blame you whether we won or lost. Do you know that I am grateful for the glimpses of the realities of life that you have given me?"

Winston felt his pulses throb faster, for the girl's unabated confidence stirred him, but he looked at her gravely. "I wonder if you realize what you have given me in return? Life as I had seen it was very grim and bare—and now I know what, with a little help, it is possible to make of it."

"With a little help?" said Maud Barrington.

Winston nodded, and his face, which had grown almost wistful, hardened. "Those who strive in the pit are apt to grow blind to the best—the sweetness and order, and all the little graces that mean so much. Even if their eyes are opened, it is usually too late. You see, they lose touch with all that lies beyond the struggle, and without some one to lead them they cannot get back to it. Still, if I talk in this fashion you will laugh at me, but every one has his weakness now and then—and no doubt I shall make up for it at Winnipeg tomorrow. One can not afford to be fanciful when wheat is two cents down."

Maud Barrington was not astonished. Tireless in his activities and, more curious still, almost ascetic in his mode of life, the man had already given her glimpses of his inner self and the vague longings that came upon him. He never asked her pity, but she found something pathetic in his attitude, for it seemed he knew that the stress and the turmoil alone could be his. Why this was so she did not know, but it was with a confidence that could not be shaken now she felt it was through no fault of his. His last words, however, showed her that the mask was on again.

"I scarcely fancy you are well enough, but if you must go, I wonder whether you would do a good turn to Alfreton?" she said. "The lad has been speculating—and he seems anxious lately."

"It is natural that they should all bring their troubles to you."

Maud Barrington laughed. "I, however, generally pass them on to you."

A trace of color crept into the man's face, and his voice was a trifle hoarse as he said, "Do you know that I would ask nothing better than to take every care you had, and bear it for you?"

"Still," said the girl, with a little smile, "that is very evidently out of the question."

Winston rose, and she saw that one hand was closed as he looked down upon her. Then he turned and stared out at the prairie, but there was something very significant in the rigidity of his attitude, and his face seemed to have grown suddenly careworn when he glanced back at her.

"Of course," he said quietly. "You see, I have been ill, and a little off my balance lately. That accounts for erratic speeches, though I meant it all. Colonel Barrington is still in Winnipeg?"

"Yes," said the girl, who was not convinced by the explanation, very quietly. "I am a little anxious about him, too. He sold wheat forward, and I gather from his last letter has not bought it yet. Now, as Alfreton is driving in tomorrow, he could take you."

Winston was grateful to her, and still more to Miss Barrington, who came in just then, while he did not see the girl again before he departed with Alfreton on the morrow. When they had left Silverdale a league behind, the trail dipped steeply amid straggling birches to a bridge which spanned the creek in a hollow, and Winston glanced up at the winding ascent thoughtfully.

"It has struck me that going round by this place puts another six miles on to your journey to the railroad, and a double team could not pull a big load up," he said.

The lad nodded. "The creek is a condemned nuisance. We have either to load light when we are hauling grain in, and then pitch half the bags off at the bottom and come back for them—while you know one man can't put up many four-bushel bags—or keep a man and horses at the ravine until we're through."

Winston laughed. "Now, I wonder whether you ever figured how much those little things put up the price of your wheat."

"This is the only practical way down," said the lad. "You could scarcely climb up one side where the ravine's narrow abreast of Silverdale."

"Drive round. I want to see it," said Winston. "Call at Rushforth's for a spool of binder twine."

Half an hour later Alfreton pulled the wagon up amid the birches on the edge of the ravine, which just there sloped steep as a railway cutting, and not very much broader, to the creek. Winston gazed at it, and then handed the twine to the hired man.

"Take that with you, Charley, and get down," he said. "If you strip off your boots you can wade through the creek."

"I don't know that I want to," said the man.

"Well," said Winston, "it would please me if you did, as well as cool your feet. Then you could climb up, and hold that twine down on the other side."

The man grinned, and, though Alfreton remembered that he was not usually so tractable with him, proceeded to do Winston's bidding. When he came back there was a twinkle of comprehension in his eyes, and

(Copyright, 1907, by F A. Stokes Co.)

Winston, who cut off the length of twine, smiled at Alfreton.

"It is," he said dryly, "only a little idea of mine."

They drove on, and reaching Winnipeg next day, went straight to Graham the wheat-broker's offices. He kept them waiting some time, and in the meanwhile men with intent faces passed hastily in and out through the outer office. Some of them had telegrams or bundles of papers in their hands, and the eyes of all were eager. The corridor rang with

"You're feeling sick?" he said. "Still, I don't fancy you need worry."

Then Graham appeared and claimed him, and it was next morning when he saw Alfreton again. He was breakfasting with Colonel Barrington and Dane, and Winston noticed that the older man did not appear to have much appetite. When the meal was finished he drew him aside.

"You have covered your sales?" he asked.

"No, sir," said Barrington. "I have not."

"Then I wonder whether it would be presumption if I asked you a question?"

Barrington looked at him steadily. "To be frank, I fancy it would be better if you did not. I have, of course, only my own folly to blame for believing I could equal your natural aptitude for this risky amusement which I had, and still have, objections to. I was, however, in need of money, and seeing your success, yielded to the temptation. I am not laying any of the responsibility on you, but am not inclined to listen to more of your suggestions."

Winston met his gaze without embarrassment. "I am sorry you have been unfortunate, sir."

Just then Dane joined them. "I sat up late last night in the hope of seeing you," he said. "Now, I don't know what to make of the market, but there were one or two fellows who would have bought my estimated crop from me at a figure which would have about covered working expenses. Some of the others who did not know you were coming in, put their affairs in my hands too."

"Sell nothing," said Winston quietly.

It was an hour later when a messenger from Graham found them in the smoking-room, and Colonel Barrington smiled dryly as he tore up the envelope handed him.

"'Market opened with sellers prevailing. Chicago flat!'" he read.

Dane glanced at Winston somewhat ruefully, but the latter's eyes were fixed on Colonel Barrinton.

"If I had anything to cever I should still wait," he said.

"That," said Dane, "is not exactly good news to me."

"Our turn will come," said Winston gravely.

That day, and during several which followed it, wheat moved down, and Dane said nothing to Winston about what he felt, though his face grew grimmer as the time went on. Barrington was quietly impassive when they met him, while Alfreton, who saw a way out of his difficulties, was hard to restrain. Winston long afterwards remembered that horrible suspense, but he showed no sign of what he was enduring then, and was only a trifle quieter than usual when he and Alfreton entered Graham's office one morning. It was busier than ever, while the men who hastened in and out seemed to reveal by attitude and voice that they felt something was going to happen.

"In sellers' favor!" said the broker. "Everybody with a few dollars is hammering prices one way or the other. Nothing but wheat to be heard of in this city. Well, we'll simmer down when the turn comes, and though I'm piling up money, I'll be thankful. Hallo, Thomson, anything going on now?"

"Chicago buying," said the clerk. "Now it's Liverpool! Sellers holding off. Wanting a two-eighths more the cental."

The telephone bell tinkled again, and there was a trace of excitement in the face of the man who answered it. "Walthew has got news ahead of us," he said. "Chicago bears caved in. Buying orders from Liverpool broke them. Got it there strong."

Winston tapped Alfreton's shoulder. "Now is the time. Tell him to buy," he said. "We'll wait outside until you've put this deal through, Graham."

It was twenty minutes before Graham came out to them. "I'll let you have your contracts, Mr. Alfreton, and my man on the market just fixed them in time," he said. "They're up a penny on the cental in Liverpool now, and nobody will sell, while here in Winnepeg they're falling over each other to buy. Never had such a circus since the trade began."

Alfreton, who seemed to quiver, turned to his companion, and then forgot what he had to tell him. Winston had straightened himself, and his eyes were shining, while the lad was puzzled by his face. Still, save for the little tremor in it his voice was very quiet.

"It has come at last," he said. "Two farms would not have covered your losses, Alfreton, if you had waited until tomorrow. Have supper with us Graham."

"I'll come," said Graham, with a curious smile.

Then Winston turned suddenly, and running down the stairway shook the man awaiting him by the arm.

"The flood's with us now," he said. "Find Colonel Barrington, and make him cover everything before he's ruined. Dane, you and I, and a few others, will see the dollars rolling into Silverdale."

Dane found Barrington, who listened with a grim smile to what he had to tell him.

"The words are yours, Dane, but that is all," he said. "Wheat will go down again, and I do not know that I am grateful to Courthorne."

Dane dare urge nothing further, and spent the rest of that day wandering up and down the city, in a state of blissful content, with Alfreton and Winston. One of them turned his losses into small profit, and the other two, who had, hoping almost against hope, sown when others had feared to plow, saw that the harvest would repay them beyond their wildest expectations. They heard nothing but predictions of higher prices everywhere, and the busy city seemed to throb with exultation. The turn had come, and there was hope for the vast wheat lands it throve upon.

Graham had much to tell them when they sat down to the somewhat elaborate meal Winston termed supper that night.

"I'm not fond of speeches, Courthorne," said Dane, "and I fancy our tastes are the same," he said. "Still, I can't let this great night pass without greeting you as the man who has saved not a few of us at Silverdale. We were in a very tight place before you came, and we are with you when you want us from this time, soul and body, and all our possessions."

Alfreton's eyes glistened, and his hand shook a little.

"There are folks in the old country who will bless you when they know," he said. "You'll forget it, though I can't, that I was once against you."

Winston nodded to them gravely and shook hands with the three.

"We have put up a good fight, and I think we shall win, but, while you will understand me better by and by, what you have offered me almost hurts," he said.

"What we have given is yours. We don't take it back," said Dane.

Winston smiled, though there was a wistfulness in his eyes as he saw the faint bewilderment in his companions' faces.

"Well," he said slowly, "you can do a little for me now. Colonel Barrington was right when he set his face against speculation, and it was only because I saw money was badly needed at Silverdale, and the one means of getting them, I made my deal. Still, if we are to succeed as farmers we must market our wheat as cheaply as our rivals, and we want a new bridge on the level. Now, I got a drawing of one, and estimates for British Columbia stringers. yesterday, while the birches in the ravine will give us what else we want. I'll build the bridge myself, but it will cheapen the wheat-hauling to everybody, and you might like to help me."

Dane glanced at the drawing laid before him, but Alfreton spoke first. "One hundred dollars. I'm only a small man, but I wish it was five," he said.

"I'll make it that much, and see the others do their share," said Dane, and then glanced at the broker with a curious smile.

"How does he do it—this and other things? He was never a business man!"

Graham nodded. "He can't help it. It was born in him. You and I can't figure the plan, but Courthorne is different—the right thing comes to him. I knew the first night I saw him, you had got the man you wanted at Silverdale."

Then Winston stood up. "I am obliged to you, but I fancy this has gone far enough," he said. "There is one man who has done more for you than I could ever do. Prosperity is a good thing, but you, at least, know what he has aimed at stands high above that. May you have the Head of the Silverdale community long with you!"

church of which he is pastor to make a good liberal offering every year. Let others do the same. The saloon is the avowed enemy of the church. It attempts to destroy what the church and Sunday-school builds up. Jesus, we are told, was manifested to destroy the works of the devil; and, as the Father had sent Jesus, so he sends us. We too, are to destroy the work of the devil. If the saloon business is not the work of the devil, then sin can no longer be classed as the work of the devil. But it will be found out that when all sin in the world is overcome that there will be no saloon left.

The board has been given a place on the National Convention Program at Pittsburg this fall. Hon. Oliver W. Stewart has been secured to deliver the address on that occasion. It will be worth one's time and money to cross the continent to hear Mr. Stewart. He will deliver a great address. He has no superior on the American platform when it comes to the subject of temperance.

Let every member of the Church of Christ buckle on the temperance armor and enter the great fight for God, Home, and Native Land. Let every man help to drive the demon of rum from the land. Help banish the saloon, and by so doing you will drive from our shores the worst enemy that ever cursed our fair domain. We may all help materially by giving the American Temperance Board our hearty co-operation. Send for its literature. Help carry out the plans it seeks to give to our people. Send it a liberal offering for its work. Pray for it that under God it may be instrumental in giving to Goliath Rum his death blow. Now is the accepted time, today is the day of salvation from the awful curse of rum.

The Power and Peril of Speech

The character of the book of James was explained somewhat fully in our last study. It is seen to be a collection of practical observations upon Christian conduct, put into the form of brief, proverb-like sentences or of short discourses, after the manner of the wisdom writers of the Old Testament. The line of thought is rarely consecutive for more than a verse or paragraph. The writer is interested rather in a variety of matters upon which the good name and influence of the church must depend. Doctrine has little charm for him. He is not concerned with the teachings of the gospel, but he is deeply interested in the practical efficiency of Christian life and is therefore, at pains to warn his readers against those sins which mar and impair character and usefulness.

The Book of James.

Among the matters mentioned in this little book, which is scarcely more than a tract, are the means of getting wisdom, the divine gifts to the Christian, the character of real religion as consisting of benevolence and purity, the danger of belief that does not work itself out in character, the sin of pride and ostentation, and the perils of unrestrained speech. With the last of these our present lesson is occupied.

Human language is one of the greatest of achievements of the race. It grows out of very simple beginnings. The earliest races had almost no language, and for many generations there was no effort at written speech. Language developed according to the needs of tribes and clans, becoming more complex, more diverse, more abundant as thought developed, until it reached its zenith of power in the Greek tongue, which has perhaps never been approached in the splendor of its flexibility and beauty as an instrument for the conveyance of ideas. If language in its complexity, perfection, and artistic beauty is an index of intellectual power, certainly the Greek of the classic period occupied the highest place which mankind has ever reached. If it shames us somewhat to think that we have to go to the past for such perfection, and if we are humiliated by the miscellaneous, discordant and lowered character of our present speech systems, we are perhaps comforted by the thought that the world is no longer chiefly concerned in intellectual dexterity and precision, but that it has the higher interests of social ethics and spiritual character on which to expend its chief energies.

Speech and Character.

Language is the index of character. And yet it is more than this, for it produces character, and this is the very point of warning which James has given us in our study. It would be indeed a matter of concern in language were only the revelation of disposition. A man speaks the things that are in his heart. "Out of the abundance of the heart the mouth speaks." An evil disposition utters itself in evil words; a cross, discontented nature will speak in language of that sort; a foul imagination will betray itself by foul words; a vulgar mind will disclose itself in profanity and obscenity.

And yet this is not the most difficult side of the problem. Character is formed by speech as well. It is in argument that a man develops his acuteness of intellect. It is in angry words that he fires his nature with increasing anger, and, as we say "works himself up" to a high intensity of wrath. If the principle of restraining speech until nature judgment has been reached could be applied, there would be few angry outbreaks and fewer demoralized characters.

The Sins of the Tongue.

The custom of gossip, of trading in other people's reputations, of speaking whispered insinuations which are only half founded or baseless, is one of those poisonous activities to which people permit themselves to descend upon the plea of regard for the truth or concern for public morality. Half the reputations that have been ruined have suffered first of all from malicious and unfounded gossip. It is the tongue which has been the offender. Less evil has been wrought by the mailed fist and the hand clasping the sword than by the tongue, sharpened with malice and laden with venom.

He who carefully restrains his speech, who is jealous of other reputations as well as of his own, who will not multiply words in angry debate, who shuns the kind of babbling which requires no effort of the intellect, is the one who keeps his powers for highest use.

Three Levels of Intelligence.

In general it may be said that people fall into three groups so far as intelligence is to be classified. The first are those who have only capacity for conversation about people; other people or themselves. In listening to the talk of such, one is always interested to see how almost exclusively it concerns itself with people. There is another and higher grade of intelligence which is interested in things or activities, in objects, or achievement or even the common arts and trades of life. This type of speech is certainly of much higher character and much more fruitful in its reaction upon the speaker himself.

The Love of Higher Things.

Then there is a still higher order of intelligence that is little concerned to talk about people, and is not chiefly interested in objects, in plans, in enterprises, or activities. But it is rather at home in the realm of ideas, of principles of motives, and the entire range of the higher life toward which the soul of man should be led by all the processes of education and service. With such people sins of the tongue are likely to be rare. The mere gossip of the social circle or the market place has little significance to them, while the higher elements of character—affection, rightmindedness, benevolence, beauty and power—are always given their true value. To such the sins of the tongue of which James speaks so pointedly and pertinently will be largely unknown.

PRAYER MEETING

By Silas Jones

WALKING IN THE SPIRIT.

Topic, June 2, Eph. 4:17-24; 5:15-21.

The spiritual man thinks right. He is mindful of the relations in which he stands to other men and he considers carefully those relations in order that he may know what his duty is. He values feeling highly but he has no word of praise for the peace of mind that arises from ignorance of the world's need. He takes hold of the rough work of the world. The recluse is not spiritually minded; he is a coward who runs away from duty. Solitude is a teacher to those who live in society. They need to go apart from the crowd for seasons of meditation that they may be the better able to see what is worth while. Thinking is often a painful process and living in the presence of sin and fighting against it is painful but the spiritual man thinks through his problems and faces the anxieties and disappointments incident to the life of service. His thinking therefore has for its end the direction of conduct.

Subconscious Mind.

For those who are asking the meaning of the movement to reform the world through the action of subconscious mind the following words of warning from Professor Witmer are of interest: The systems of belief which represent the antithesis of the intellectual and moral ideals of our European civilization, namely, oriental mysticism and theosophy, cultivate a laxity of spirit characteristic of this dream state, and consign the will and character to the automatic, i. e., subconscious, currents of imagination and emotion. There is something repugnant in Worcester's theory that the subconscious mind, which is most active in suggestion, is purer and freer from evil than our waking consciousness. A woman recently asked help of the Psychological Clinic of the University of Pennsylvania in controlling the actions of her son, a youth of eighteen or nineteen years. She claimed he showed no respect for her opinions, no regard for her feelings, declined to work at any profitable employment, refused to do small chores about the house, and appropriated to his own use any sum of money she might not have under her constant guard. And yet her view—and this was the view upon which she had trained the boy was that he was subconsciously refined and noble. It was only his actions, she said, that were abnormal and wrong, and she wanted to see whether we could not, by absent treatment (as she could not get the boy to come to the labratory), cause his subconscious self to gain control over his conscious activities. She had apparently tried to dream the boy into paths of rectitude instead of compelling him thereto by the force of stern moral discipline. The hypnotic consciousness, the dream consciousness, the relaxed moments of revery, the alcoholic and drug consciousness, the co-called subconsciousness—these are closely allied."

A New Life Not a Dream State.

Christ calls men to a new moral life, not to a dream state. The trouble with some of the "sinless" men whom one occasionally meets is that they have not so much as the rudiments of a Christian conscience. When they say they have ceased to sin, they mean that they have reached a state of spirituality where the distinction between right and wrong does not exist. They live in a fool's paradise. To cheat in a horse trade is sin if the cheating is done by an imperfect man, it is entirely harmless when it is the act of a sinless man. Now it would be unprofitable to refer to the folly of the freaks who imagine they are perfect if we should feal to notice that they illustrate and error to which we are all friendly. We minimize the wickedness of an act because of a private construction which we put upon it. A student steals and disturbs the peace but he is a respectable young man and resents the charge that he is a criminal. His deeds are not at all like those of the burglar and the saloon loafer. Physicians, lawyers, manufacturers, merchants, workingmen, preachers, men and women have mental reservations when they subscribe to the moral code. Their state of mind takes away the sinfulness of certain forms of wickedness. Thus the moral insanity exhibited in a marked degree by the fanatic shows itself in people thought to be normal. The cure for it is renewal in Christ. The new man in Christ is able to form independent judgments. The formalities of bargaining do not hide dishonesty from him nor does politeness cover up uncleanness of thought and act. The singing of psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs stimulates him to right action; he never engages in it for the purpose of becoming oblivious to his duty.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

HEROES OF HOME MISSIONS.

Topic, May 30, Matt. 10:7-16.

Every church should be and is, to a certain extent, I think, a center of home missionary labor. It is in the church that most of us feel the quickening of our humanitarian instincts. We have been very busy during the week making money, having a good time, working to realize our ambitions, so bent on making the most of this life that we often travail in our very pleasures. Then a Sunday rolls around and as we enter into Christian service in the teaching of class or filling of office, as we hear the great ideals of service for which Jesus stood, spoken from the pulpit, we say to ourselves in sober thought, "What is my life counting for anyhow? I'm getting lots of things and advantages for myself. But dear me, I had almost forgotten that the world is full of my brothers." Then are we moved to earnestly link the Sundays with Christian service.

Unknown Heroes.

So it happens that churches are full of unknown heroes of home missions. Thanksgiving Day and Christmas time, and other days, bring to the front oftentimes a work that is being done all the year around behind the scenes. One does not have to go to Africa to be a missionary. One can be one right in his own church. Did you ever think of that? Our own America, our towns and cities, are full of ignorance, sickness, poverty, and sin. You and I have plenty of opportunity to be heroes of home missions if we will.

Moreover, there are great known heroes of home missions, inside the church and out, who set for us noble ideals.

Jerry McCauley.

Everybody nearly is familiar with the story of Jerry McCauley; how, after leading a drunkard's career he met with a rebirth and gave his life to the service of his fellow men; how he established a mission in the great city, and the ignorant sinner, the drunken bum, the decayed loafer, were seized by the power of a great soul and made into sons of God. Read the story of Jerry McCauley.

Jane Addams.

Likewise are most of us familiar with the story of Miss Jane Addams of Chicago. Bro. Jordan has told us in the pages of the CENTURY of her work shop, Hull House, where, with an intelligent emphasis upon the educational and social, as well as religious sides, she takes young men and women under her care, and makes them over again, so to speak. In the missions of various great churches as well as in the semi-religious, semi-social, settlements established by secular sources, we may find heroes and heroines who show us how to be home missionaries.

Maud Ballington Booth.

Let me tell you about one of the most inspiring things that ever happened to me. It was two years ago and the Volunteers of America were celebrating their tenth anniversary. A woman stood on the platform in the face of a great throng, and with splendid voice, oratorical power, and depth of feeling, told a wonderful story. It was the story of how she saved her prisoner boys. They called her the "little mother," and truly did her story reveal that she was deserving of some of the halo that tradition has placed around the head of Mary. The prisoner going from his cold cell into a colder world, was taken under her warm care. A job was gotten for him, the practical needs of his life were met, and the rest followed. Touched by this Christian service he was changed into another man, and henceforth led a righteous life. Was this not a noble work? Why, it saved the man, and it saved society.

These are some of the great lives whose light so shines that the feet of men are guided. Many others there be. Shall you and I not decide, moved by these and by the indwelling power of Christ, that we will be at least among the lesser lights?

TEACHER TRAINING COURSE

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

PART II. SUNDAY-SCHOOL PEDAGOGY.

Lesson XIX. Later Childhood, 6-9.

I. GENERAL CHARACTERISTICS. Many of the characteristics of the kindergarten stage are present, but these are being modified by contact with a growing experience; new interests are arising and vital powers functioning.

(1) INTEREST. The stock of "general intelligence" is increasing rapidly, thus furnishing a wider range of interest upon which the teacher may draw. The values and meaning of things, rather than their sensational qualities are becoming important. The personal replaces the naturalistic interest; hence this is the golden period for biography, both secular and sacred.

(2) ATTENTION. Attention is less fluctuating and capricious than in the kindergarten period, and is controlled by remoter ends. "Voluntary attention should now be demanded.

(3) IMAGINATION. Fancy becomes less lawless and is distinguished more or less closely from fact. The distinction between the real and the ideal world is born and with it the instinct for truth. The child is still credulous compared to the adult; but its credulity is tempered with a criticism that is sometimes even pedantic, as when the child demands that the same story be always told in precisely the same way.

(4) MEMORY. Memory is quicker and more retentive, but remains verbal and mechanical. Hence oft-repetition is still the rule. This is an ideal age for learning scripture verses—not long passages—that have reference to the daily interests of the children.

(5) PLAY. The instinct of play persists, but the games are more elaborate and social. The child plays with others rather than by himself, and begins to show almost a religious reverence for rules and "use and want." Bodily activity and rivalry are prominent in the games of the boys, while the girls are interested in dolls and "playing house."

II. NEW POINTS OF CONTACT. (1) SOCIAL TENDENCIES. If the kindergarten child is an individualist, the primary child is a budding socialist. He is not happy alone, even, as we have seen, in play. His feelings are dimly altruistic. The instinct of loyalty to play-mates and school-fellows is born. He forms boon companionships. He does what other boys are doing. Through these means the religious value of friendship and loyalty may be freely "suggested" by the teacher.

(2) THE HISTORICAL SENSE appears during this period. The interest is not so much in scenic incident or groups, as in connected narrative, especially of the biographical character. The Old Testament biographries are thus a golden treasury for the primary teacher. "Bible history," as such, should not, however, be taught.

(3) RIVALRY being one of the chief characteristics of the games of this period, should be utilized by the teacher. "To be first" should be as laudable in the Sunday-school as in the play-ground. Hence emulation between individuals and classes, stimulated by honor records and prizes, are not out of place, when wisely used.

III. DAY SCHOOL INFLUENCES. It is during these years that the day school influences begin, and these are of large importance to the Sunday-school teacher. Her method should as far as possible parallel those of the day school, in order that no conscious breach may be felt between the two. By the age of six most of the pupils of this department are learning to read, and by the seventh year simple home lessons are being assigned. Hence in the Sunday-school the lesson story, golden text and memory questions may be given for home work, though most of the learning should be done in class or by departmental drill. The social instinct already mentioned is now being rapidly reinforced by the coöperation of the larger school life. School boy honor, however imperfect, is nature's clue to higher teaching. Discipline is being more or less enforced during the week and should not be allowed to lapse in the Sunday-school.

IV. LESSON MATERIAL. The lessons of this period should be chiefly Bible stories about men of action, especially those of the Old Testament. They should be narrative rather than didactive. The historical connection may be loosely indicated, but no attempt should be made to teach "Bible history" and chronology, for it is in the personal, not the time element of the story that the boy or girl is interested. Hymns should be largely used, but care should be taken to select only those that shall turn the child's budding aesthetic sense in the direction of reverence and worship. "Ragtime" and shoddy sentiment are to be rigidly excluded. So-called "hymns for children" are apt to be written by irresponsible persons and have little rhyme, reason or music in them. Many of the classic hymns of the church may be taught in the primary; and in this case it is not necessary, as in that of the lesson-story, that the words and sentiments be wholly at the child's level. In all singing, the educational approach is through atmosphere and emotion, rather intellectual comprehension, which will only come with the years. The motor-activity of this period being great, the problem of discipline may be greatly helped and the ends of learning furthered, by manual work. The systematic study of missions should be begun in this department. Stories from the missions fields will furnish just the right material for the young imagination to work into its own ideal setting.

V. TELLING OF STORIES. The telling of stories should be the chief method of instruction in this department. Children of this age will listen to a well-told story when they will "attend" to nothing else. No primary teacher, therefore, should come before her class without having the lesson-story at her fingers end, so that she can link it on to their childhood interests and put it before theme vividly and dramatically.

VI. THE MORAL AND RELIGIOUS APPROACH. (1) MORAL. Voluntary action being more pronounced than in the preceding stage, precept may now be allowed to supplement, though not to supersede suggestion and imitation. Authority should be the keynote of moral training here, as example was that of the kindergarten stage. Right and wrong should be set forth in the form of command and prohibition. This period corresponds to the Old Testament or Sinai stage of the education of the chosen people; the freedom of the gospel-stage will not come until later. If, however, reasons are asked for this or that bidding, they should be given wherever possible; for the child's sense of injustice at this age is very keen, and once hurt is hard to heal. The budding social nature of the child furnishes an ideal point of contact for the teaching of the altruistic or other-regarding virtues (sympathy, helpfulness, friendship, etc.) (2) RELIGIOUS. The moral rather than the naturalistic qualities of God should be developed. The religious life should not be differentiated from the moral: being "good like God and Christ" should cover both spheres. In the first year of this department the supernatural will be found to still function strongly, but gradually, this will be replaced by a sense of God's orderly working in nature, which may be used by the teacher as a gateway to the understanding of God's providence; though of course no attempt should be made to tell the child about the "laws of nature."

QUESTIONS: (1) Compare the interest and attention of the primary with that of the kindergarten child. (2) What are the characteristics of imagination in this period? (3) Characterize the memory of later childhood, and indicate what clue this gives for teaching. (4) Of what kind are the plays of this period? (5) Name and discuss three new "points of contact." (6) What day-school influences are now at work and how can these be utilized in Sunday-school teaching? (7) Of what nature should the Bible lesson be in this period? (8) Discuss "hymns for children." (9) What place does the telling of stories occupy in the teaching of this period? (10) What should be the key-note of moral training for this department? and why? (11) What religious ideas should be developed in this period?

The Book World

A COMMENTARY ON THE HOLY BIBLE, Edited by the Rev. J. A. Dummelow. Complete in 1 volume. On the face of the statement nothing could seem less possible than the gathering of a commentary upon the entire Bible into a single volume. And yet this has actually been undertaken and the book is about equal in size to one of the volumes of such a Bible dictionary as Hastings or the Encyclopedia Biblica. To begin with there are a few special articles on such themes as "General Introduction to the Bible," "Hebrew History," the "Pentateuch," "The Bible and Babylonian Traditions," "Prophecy," "The Messianic Hope," the "Apocryphal Literature," "The Life and Teachings of Jesus," "The Synoptic Problem," the "Work of Paul," and some general doctrines such as God, the person of Christ, the Trinity, miracle, resurrection, the atonement, inspiration, the study of the Bible and the elements of religion. Some concluding pages of the Introduction deal with biblical geography and antiquities. This introduction covers 150 pages; and then follows the commentary to which a number of recognized scholars have contributed. It has been the manifest effort of the editor to modify as far as possible all statements out of harmony with traditional conceptions of the Bible. At times this effort has wrought some havoc with the work of his contributors. Of course it is the obvious defect of such a work as this that it is bound to leave unexplained many of the passages for whose interpretation a student would first consult such a work. But, on the other hand, a vast amount of useful material has been gathered in this brief space and probably the book will render valuable service to those who have not the means of investing in such a series as the International Critical Commentary, The Bible for Home and School, The Westminster Commentary, The Expositor's Bible, or even the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges. (New York: Macmillan Co., 1909. Pp. 1092. $2.50 net.)

CHRISTIAN SCIENCE IN THE LIGHT OF HOLY SCRIPTURE, by I. M. Haldeman. This is an excellent example of the kind of book which is so violent in its opposition to an error that it not only overshoots the mark but actually elicits interest in and sympathy for the cause it is attacking. Mr. Haldeman apparently is totally incapable of understanding the fact that no heresy or error could exist and reach the dimensions of Christian Science without having some basis of truth and the elevation of this truth not only to commanding but to exclusive place in a religious program which is both the strength and fatal weakness of Christian Science. No one will ever again gain headway in opposition to the system who does not understand these facts and who is not willing to concede that modicum of truth which Christian Science actually holds and emphasizes. The author of this volume has laboriously gone through the text books of Christian Science and set individual utterances over against quotations of the Scripture in the effort to organize a refutation of Christian Science in the words of the Bible. All this is very easy of accomplishment, and the principle could be almost equally well applied to any body of writings. But the weakness of Mr. Haldeman's book is the totally uncritical character of his citations from the Bible. The book has value for those who are willing to proceed upon a purely literalistic view of the use of Scripture, and who are incapable of pronouncing discriminating and therefore effective judgment upon Christian Science. (New York: Fleming H. Revell. pp. 441. $1.50, net.)

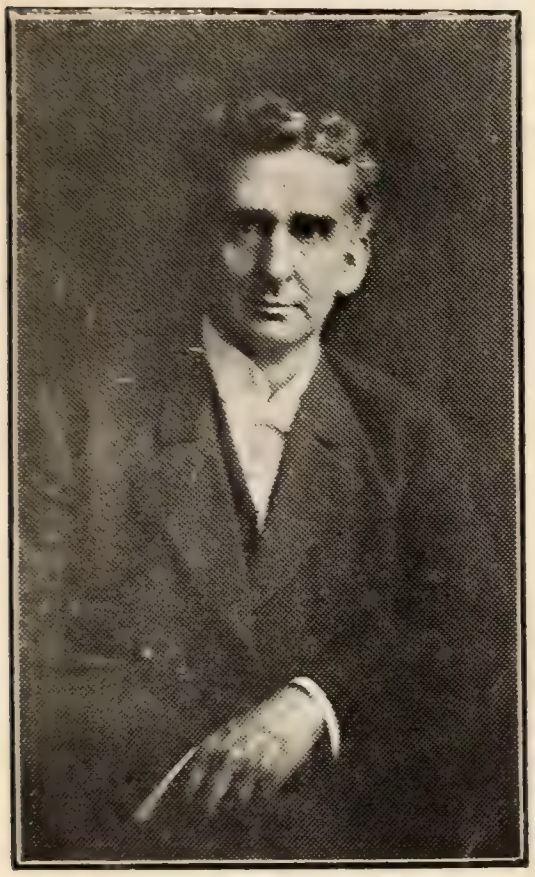
MAN IN THE LIGHT OF EVOLUTION, by John M. Tyler. The author of this book is Professor of Biology in Amherst College and has presented in attractive and popular form the main facts of evolution as the accepted scientific principle of the modern world. After a preliminary discussion of Darwin's formulation of the theory and the leading items of his program of evolution, the author goes on to describe the steps of human evolution from the brute life below. Then after the development of the theme in the direction of the family and society and a discussion of the doctrine of the survival of the fittest in its higher significance, Dr. Tyler proceeds to discuss the relationship between evolution and faith and the value of the one as an interpretation of the other. The closing chapter of the book, on racial experience, conformity to environment and social environment, are full of information and suggestion. We know of no more admirable discussion of the evolutionary principle in concise and popular form than this book affords. It is an excellent introduction to the general subject of evolution. From it one could easily go on to such books as Conn's "The Method of Evolution," Jordon and Kellogg's "Evolution and Animal Life," Metcalf's "Organic Evolution," and Romanes' "Darwin and after Darwin." (New York: D. Appleton & Company. pp. 226. $1.25, net.

THE SILVER CUP. By Charles Cuthbert Hall. The late President of Union Theological Seminary was for many years a pastor before he took up his academic duties. During those years one of the features of his ministry which attracted not a little attention was his success in preaching children's sermons. The present volume is a collection of such messages to little people. Those who have read with delight and profit Dr. Hall's volumes on Christianity in its relation to the thought of the East and West will find in the present volume a delightful collection of some of the best utterances of this prophetic mind adjusted to the simplest natures and the most plastic moments in the experience of the young. Ministers who preach sermons to children (and what conscientious and successful minister misses the privileges and obligation of such services) will be delighted to see how a brother minister of rare attainments and wonderful power meets the little people in familiar language upon their own plane of thought. (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co. 1909. Pp. 283. $1.25.)

PRESENT DAY CONDITIONS IN CHINA, by Marshall Bloomhall. B. A. This is a most timely discussion of present conditions in China, with the purpose of enlisting interest in the more rapid evangelization of that country in preparation for the great career it is to have among the nations of the East. China is awakening to its true place in international affairs, through the influence of the events of the past few years, especially the war with Japan. That struggle aroused this slumbering giant as no force for a century has been able to do. The necessity of circulating the Bible in China, the recognized need of religious teaching in that land, the duty of the hour in connection with Christian missions, form the impressive arguments of the book which is illustrated by maps, charts, and photographs. It is a campaign document of great value. (New York: Fleming H. Revell, in coöperation with the China Inland Mission. pp 58. $0.50.)

FRAGMENTS FROM GRAECO-JEWISH WRITERS, by Wallace Nelson Stearns, Ph. D. Readers of Jewish and New Testament history are certain to come upon many references to such Jewish writers of the Greek school as Demetrius, Eupolemus, Artapanus, Aristeas, Artistobulus, Philo, Theodotus, etc. These writers are discussed in such works as Schuerer, "The Jewish People in the Times of Jesus Christ." But it is not easy to lay hands upon the sources themselves. These have now been gathered into a small volume by Professor Stearns, who has added brief introductions and notes. The Greek text has been carefully edited. It would have been well if an English translation could have followed each selection, and an index is needed. But the work even as it stands will be found of great value to those who deal with Jewish life in the period from 200 B. C. to the end of the first Christian century. (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1908. Pp. 126. 75 cents net.)

IS IMMORTALITY DESIRABLE, by G. Lowes Dickinson. This little volume is the latest addition to that growing shelf-full of books on Immortality prepared on the foundation of the Ingersoll Lectureship at Harvard. Various workers in the Society for Psychical Research have challenged the statement so generally assumed by apologists for immortality, viz., that there is a universal and intense longing in the human heart to live forever. Mr. Dickinson, quite apart from this question of fact asks whether immortality is a worthful desire. His answer is a strong affirmative. (Boston: Houghton Mifflin Co, 1909. $0.75 net.)



PRINCIPLES OF SUCCESSFUL CHURCH ADVERTISING, by Charles Stelzle. The author is widely known as the Secretary of the Church and Labor under the direction of the Board of Home Missions of the Presbyterian Church. He is the author of "Christianity's Storm Center," "The Working Man and Social Problems," and other books of a similar character. Mr. Stelzle has recognized the necessity of applying the principles of successful advertising, so commonly understood and utilized in business, to church work. This little volume deals with the theme under a variety of topics, such as the principles of advertising, the preparation of advertising material, methods of advertising, the use of illustrations, etc. The cuts and reprints of advertising schemes are valuable aids in the discussion. (New York: Fleming H. Revell. Pp. 172. $1.25, net.)

THE SCOFIELD REFERENCE BIBLE, with a new system of connected topical references to all the greater themes of scripture, with annotations, revised marginal renderings, summaries, definitions and index. Edited by Rev. C. I. Scofield, D. D. A valuable text presenting many distinctive features as a reference Bible. Its chief feature is the devising of a new system of connected topical references by which all the greater truths may be traced through the entire Bible. (New York: Oxford University Press, 1909. Prices varying from $2.00 to $10.00.)

WEBSTER'S NEW STANDARD DICTIONARIES, the library edition of which is on our the library edition of which is on our desk, presents a convenient series for use on the library table, the high school desk, and for students' use generally. It is up to date in omitting certain superfluous features of the larger dictionaries. No practicable feature has been left out either in the contents or fashion of the book. (Chicago: Laird & Lee, 1909.)

H. O. Breeden at Cedar Rapids

Sunday, May 9, Dr. H. O. Breeden, assisted by Mr. and Mrs. Percy Kendall, closed a meeting of nineteen days duration with the First Chuch of Cedar Rapids, Iowa. My reason for a report of this meeting is not the quantity of the results, but the quality of the work done and the character of the people received into the church—in short the impression which the meeting made upon the community. There were forty-six accessions to the church, of which number only thirteen were from the Bible School. There were twenty-four heads of families. The weather could hardly have been worse; there were not two consecutive evenings during the entire meeting when there was not either a rain storm or a sudden change in the weather. In the light of this fact even the number of accessions is remarkable. The older and most discriminating minds in the congregation pronounced it the best meeting in the history of the church. The most unusual feature of the meetings was the class of people who attended the services. They were not the professional revival goers; the audiences were predominantly made up of the thoughtful and quiet people of the city, many from the other churches attending almost every service. The uniform testimony of all these people was that they had been helped to a more intelligent understanding of the Bible and a more wholesome and satisfying conception of the church and of their duty. The "high pressure" methods were wholly absent from the meetings, but the claims of Christ were none the less urgently impressed upon men and women. There was no riot of emotions, but men were none the less profoundly stirred in the deep things of their souls. The distinctly spiritual atmosphere of the meetings was a marked feature. Dr. Breeden is one of the truly great preachers of this generation. He is a master in his grasp of the truth and an artist in his presentation of it. He is pre-eminently a preacher of the Bible. Few men use the scriptures as much or as intelligently as he. The spirit in which men and women obeyed the gospel was not that of the slavish submission to a hard requirement as of necessity, but rather the joyous response of hearts to the high call of love and loyalty to Christ. The First Church is happy in the results of the meeting, which are indeed but the first fruits as the meeting left a great company of people in the attitude of serious thought that will ultimately mean their enlistment in Christian service. Duty will henceforth be easier for the membership of the church because it has been cast upon a higher plane. We cannot speak too highly of the work of Mr. and Mrs. Kendall. Their direction of the music, their personal work and their character and manner of life are inspired by a genuine Christian spirit and leave no doubt of the sincerity and integrity of their devotion to Christ.

Buckeye Dedication

There has been recently coming from the press a flood of articles concerning the problem of the country church. As evidenced by the story I am about to tell, there seems to be no country church problem in Huntington County, Indiana.

As per invitation of the official board of the Buckeye Church, I attended their dedicatory exercises on Sunday afternoon, May 16. About one year ago this church, sixteen miles from Huntington, the county seat, decided to build a commodious and up-to-date structure. In the building as it now stands, their fondest dreams have been realized.

I say without hesitancy that it is the finest country church building I ever saw. It is of pressed brick and Bedford stone exterior. The church is fully modern in every department. The main auditorium has a bowled floor, golden oak pews and pulpit furniture to match. The walls and ceilings are beautifully frescoed and the windows are of the finest quality, figured, stained glass. They have an open baptistery with robing rooms adjacent. There are reception rooms, choir room, and a beautifully finished basement.

The church cost complete $9,560. On Sunday afternoon this building was dedicated, Brother T. A. Reynolds, pastor, being in charge. Every cent of indebtedness was paid in cash and not in pledges before the building was dedicated. Considering all things, it seems to me nothing less than miraculous.

Much credit is due to Brother Watts and Brother Lacey, former pastors, and Brother T. A. Reynolds, the present pastor, for this work. A. D. Mohler of Huntington, Indiana was the architect and surely has proved himself a good one.

Huntington, Ind. Elmer W. Cole.

Mr. R. A. Long, of Kansas City, has offered $1,000.00 toward the founding of the Wharton Memorial Home for the children of missionaries on condition of the sum of $25,000.00 being raised. The friends of the missionaries should take note.

Our Best Convention

For nine years the writer has been a regular attendant at the Twelfth District Convention in Indiana. But the convention held May 12, 13, and 14, at Elnora, was the best convention ever held during these nine years. The attendance was the largest ever known. There were 153 delegates present. These delegates were all intensely interested people. They did not come to the convention for sight seeing or mere pleasure. They were there on business for the King. At every session the church was crowded. At the first morning session of the convention the church was filled twenty minutes before the time of beginning the program. The program was an excellent one and was carried out, with one or two exceptions, as printed. The preachers in the District were almost all there from the beginning and remained to the last. The address by the President, J. Francis Ashley, on Wednesday evening was to the point. It dealt with the fundamental needs of the work in the District. At the close of the address a delightful time was spent in social intercourse.

The session on Thursday morning was devoted to the Christian Endeavor interests. The following preaching brethren made short addresses: J. A. Spencer, J. J. Bare, and D. E. Hanna. J. M. Vawter of Sullivan, preached a very helpful sermon. The afternoon session was given over to the Sunday-school work in the district. Robert Taylor, a prominent layman of the Sullivan Church gave the convention a fine address on how the Sullivan school had built up from 200 to 700 in the last year. His address was followed by a very helpful discussion. The one thing that was noticeable in the discussion was that our people are becoming adepts in Sunday-school work. They are learning to do things. The session came to a close with an address from S. S. Lappin on "Contributions of the Sunday-school to Our Centennial Growth." The address was a splendid one. It was much appreciated and will bear much fruit. It is to be hoped that Brother Lappin may be heard again in our conventions. At the evening session the interests of Butler College were ably represented by Carl VanWinkle. J. O. Rose, state corresponding secretary, presented in a forceful and effective way the interests of the state work.

On Friday morning the missionary and evangelistic session was held. The report of the district evangelist, Mellnotte Miller, made our hearts glad. During the last year the district kept Brother Miller in the district doing evangelistic work. His report showed that he had done much hard and painstaking work. His evangelistic efforts had met with much success. During the year there had been 1,406 added to the churches in the districts. The convention voted unanimously to continue Brother Miller as district evangelist.

The afternoon session was given over to the C. W. B. M. interests. The district manager, Sister Mina Greist, had charge of the meeting. The reports of the different auxiliaries showed that good work had been done during the last year. The addresses for the afternoon were made by Mrs. Effie Cunningham, state president, and by Mrs. Frank Wells, state vice president. The writer never listened to two finer addresses than were made by these two consecratd workrs.

At the evening session, which closed the convention, the district evangelist, Mellnotte Miller, preached a very able and helpful sermon.

The music all through the convention was fine. The spirit of the convention was most gracious. There was not a single discordant Lnote. There was complete oneness in Christ. Much praise is due the Elnora Church and its pastor, Brother W. D. Terrill, for the kind and hospitable manner in which the delegates were cared for while in attendance upon the convention. Brother Ashley, the district president, and Brother Miller, the district evangelist, are to be given much praise for this excellent convention. They were untiring in their efforts in working up a great convention.

The officers elected for this coming year are: President, J. Francis Ashley; vice president, L. V. Barbre; secretary-treasurer, W. D. Terrill. The convention will go to Jasonville next year.

Northern Indiana Ministerial Institute

On May 10, 11, 12 the Northern Indiana Ministerial Institute met with the Central Christian Church of Huntington, Indiana. About thirty ministers were present. The Institute was opened on Monday evening with a paper by E. F. Daugherty of Wabash, on the subject of "Modernism." The paper was a masterly presentation of the subject in a most scholarly way. This paper was reviewed by the pastor of the Huntington Church. Lively discussion followed. Tuesday morning G. H. Clark of Rensselaer read a paper on the subject, "The Problem of Co-operative Work in Indiana." The paper was of intense interest and evoked lively discussion. This discussion was followed with a paper by A. B. Houze of Kendallville on the subject, "The Church and the Social Program." Tuesday afternoon M. H. Garrard of Laporte read a splendid paper on the "Emmanuel Movement." This paper created, perhaps, the most general interest of any item of the Institute program. On Tuesday evening, Vernon Stauffer of Angola made a great address on the subject, "Ideals of the Pulpit." On Wednesday morning the ministers received a treat in the paper from Joseph C. Todd of Bloomington on the subject, "The Growth of the New Testament Canon." On Wednesday afternoon Brother A. McLean gave his masterly address on "Thomas and Alexander Campbell."

An auto tour of the city and surrounding country was then given the visiting ministers by the Men's Club of the Huntington Church, and in the evening one hundred and twenty-five men sat down to the banquet given by the Men's Club of the Central Church. After a veritable feast the chairs were pushed back and Vernon Stauffer was introduced to the banqueters and gave a stirring address that will not soon be forgotten on the subject, "What the Minister Thinks About in His Study." The Institute closed with the general verdict—we have had a great time.

The following officers were elected for the coming year: President, E. F. Daugherty, of Wabash; Vice President, S. G. Buckner, of Elkhart; Secretary and Treasurer, E. W. Cole, of Huntington.

WITH THE WORKERS

At Cheokee, Okla., F. S. White is the new minister.

Most commendatory words are heard of the work of T. L. Noblitt of Guthrie, Okla.

J. B. Daisley is supplying the pulpit at Pomeroy, Wash., until a permanent pastor can be secured.

E. S. McKinney has resigned the pastorate at Woodward, Okla., and accepted a call to the church at Childress, Texas.

Dr. Joseph Clarke, a noted Bible-school worker, visited the school of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, May 21.

W. J. Lockhart will hold a meeting at Falls City Neb., during June. The pastor, B. E. Day, is doing an excellent work here.

E. W. Thornton is holding Bible-school institutes on the Pacific Coast and the pastors where he has been esteem them of highest value to the churches.

J W. Kelsey is supplying the pulpit of the church at South Berkeley until the coming of the new pastor, O. B. Irelan, who is expected about the first of June.

A. B. Moore, St. Louis, has been called to the church at Chickasha, Okla., where he succeeds J. E. Dinger, recently called to the work at Fort Worth, Texas.

Dr. F. D. Fox, pastor of the California Ave. Congregational Church, Chicago, is to lecture at Drake University, being the closing number on the annual lecture course.

It is said that D. C. Peters, the new minister at Payette, Idaho, is making a propitious beginning. A new parsonage has just been completed, and the church building has been repainted.

Four additions to the membership of the Central Christian Church in Gulfport, Miss., since last report. Disciples going to the gulf coast to spend the summer are requested to notify Louis H. Stine, the pastor at Gulfport.

H. C. Runyan has begun work with the church at Kingfisher, Okla. Mr. Runyan was for three years the successful pastor of a good church in Oklahoma, but left the state for a time to complete his education. He has now returned for his life work.

Christian ministrs of Portland, Ore., have held a meeting and debated the question, "Resolved, That Organic Unity Would Be Advantageous to the Kingdom of God." Mr. Ghormly of the First Church had the affirmative, which, as we might suppose, carried the day.

J. Will Walters of Sullivan, Ill., delivered the commencement address at Bethany High School last Wednesday evening. Subject, "Voices Worth Heeding." He also delivered the baccalaureate sermon May 23 for the high school. The church at Sullivan raised nearly $100 for missions May 2.

Andrew P. Johnson, Fayette, Mo., writes that the church there has this year doubled its offering for Home Missions. This church has a flourishing Sunday-school of 250 attendants. In their church calendar the request is made for ladies to remove their hats during the service.

At South Pasadena, Cal., a meeting has just closed in which the preaching was done by R. P. Shepherd, with Princess C. Long in charge of the music. There were twelve additions to the church, and the pastor, Mr. McConnel, counts it a truly successful meeting.

The Sacramento Valley Convention was held at Colusa, May 18-20. It was a great "gathering of the clans." The principle speakers were F. E. Boren, Vacaville; G. L. Lobdell, Chico; J. J. Evans, Sacramento; Dr. H. H. Guy; H. J. Loken, Alameda; W. H. Brown, Oakland; W. B. Reed, Marysville; and W. P. Bentley, Berkeley.

In the First Church at Warren, Ohio, where J. E. Lynn ministers, there has been for several Sundays a "hatless section" of the congregation, and it is increasing in numbers. The ladies of the church look with favor upon the plan to attend public assemblies during the summer without the milliners' decorations.

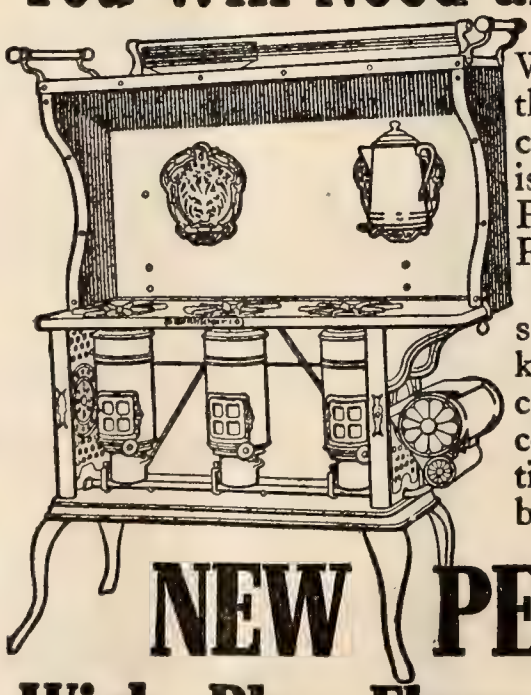
The Texas Christian Convention will be held at Corsicana June 4-8. A strong program has been prepared, including many of the best men in the state. The program as published present the portraits of many of the leading men, and cuts of several of the churches of the state.

O. L. Smith, El Reno, Okla., was invited to preach the baccalaureate sermon for the high school at Minneapolis, Kans., May 16. While he was away the Baptist and Christian churches held a union service, with preaching by the pastor of the Baptist church. The Baptist church will return the courtesy by arranging a union service when the Christian pastor can preach.

To the list of places where Baptist and Disciple ministers hold union meetings we are advised to add New York City. L. N. D. Wells, pastor of the Park Ave. Church, East Orange, N. J., says, "While we are overshadowed in numbers, all our men are members of the association and the fellowship is fine." The Divine Hand is leading toward union.

C. L. DePew, State Bible School Superintendent, spoke both Sunday morning and evening, May 9, at Galesburg, Ill., and the pastor, J. A. Barnett speaks enthusiastically of his work. It was the rally day of the school. There were 241 present, and they made an offering of $9.59. On the following Tuesday evening Mr. DePew addressed the Men's Bible Class.

P. J. Rice reports several additions to the Portland Ave. Church, Minneapolis, in his special services following Gipsy Smith's visit.



Guy E. Sarvis of the university addressed the Douglas Park Church recently on Africa. Mr. Burns, the pastor, and all the people report that Mr. Sarvis has a most helpful message to deliver.

W. B. Crewdson, who has been pastor of the church at Salida, Colo., has decided to return to Iowa and has been called to the pastorate of the church at Logan, Iowa. A local paper commends very highly Mr. Crewsdons' work in Salida, and comments upon his having led in the building of a beautiful new house of worship, and maturing plans by which the church will be entirely freed from debt within one year.

S. S. Lappin, editor of the Christian Standard, and P. H. Welshimer, pastor at Canton, Ohio, are to hold a debate during the convention at Elyria, Ohio, on the question, Resolved, That where members of the church attend the Bible-school, it is profitable to eliminate the Sunday morning sermon, and confine the morning worship to Bible study in the Bible-school, and the observance of the Lord's Supper." Mr. Welshimer will take the affirmative.

The second annual meeting of the Fourth District Convention of Oklahoma will be held in Geary, June 2-3. H. S. Gilliam will represent the Bible-school interest, J. M. Monroe the Oklahoma Christian Missionary Society, Mrs. M. A. Luey the C. W. B. M., and President Zollars the educational interests. Other addresses will be, "Our Centennial," C. T. Runyan; "Oklahoma and the Centennial," F. M. Colville, Calumet; "The Convention Sermon," C. A. Musselman, Anadarko; "The Outlook," B. H. Morris, Cement; "Caring for What We Have," O. L. Smith, El Reno.

Alva, Okla.—Offering today for Home Missions will exceed $50; offering last year was $28.00.—GARRETT W. MCQUIDDY.

Chehalis, Wash.—$23.75 contribution from the First Church, Chehalis, Wash., for Home Missions.—U. E. HARMON.

Rogers, Ohio.—$25.24 for Home Missions from the Rogers Church; offering last year was $15; our apportionment this year was $20.—P. M. BAKER.

Woodbine, Ia.—Find enclosed draft for $140 for Home Missions from the Woodbine Church of Christ. Offering last year $85.00. —B. F. HALL.

Asherville, Kans.—Took May offering for the Home work yesterday: $32 in cash and pledges; best in the history of the church; offering last year $5.70.—W. H. CURTIS.

Greensburg, Kans.—$22.75 as a Centennial Offering from the Greensburg Church. May the Lord bless our cause this year.—BISHOP M. HOPKINS.

Fulton, Mo.—Enclosed find draft for $100, a part of the contribution from the Fulton Church for Home Missions. We expect to send more later.—W. A. FITE.

Rocky Ford, Colo.—$26.18 for Home Missions from the First Church at Rocky Ford. $10.50 was the offering last year.—LEON V. STILES, Pastor.

Erskine, Alta.—Please accept the amount of $21.50 from this new church, $10 of the amount being given by Brother Clark Hawley.—A. W. BERGMAN, Treasurer.

Elk City, Kans.—Enclosed find $21.50 for Home Missions. Our apportionment was $15. I promised $10, and the offering reached $21.50. Success to Home Missions.—O. L. SUMNER.

Fayette, Mo.—Offering at the First Church will double last year's offering. I also went out to one of the country congregations and preached on missions in the afternoon and took an offering which amounted to $5.00—ANDREW P. JOHNSON.

Eustis, Fla.—May is one of the hardest months in the year for us to take an offering, but the little church has done astonishingly well. $20.55 for Home Missions, an average of 75 cents per member for those present at this season.—J. J. HALEY.

Galveston, Texas.—Offering will reach $20, five dollars beyond apportionment. Foreign offering was $12.50. This does not mean that I did not try just as hard for the Foreign as for the Home Offering, but it means that the advance marks our progress since March 1, which is evident on every hand.—C. G. BRELOS.

Telegrams

Cincinnati, O., May 22.—We have received 3,200 orders for Children's Day supplies and they are still pouring in. Many thanks for your generous advocacy of the day.—S. J. Corey.

Cincinnati, O., May 22.—May offering coming. Thousand dollars a day. Gather up the fragments. Remit promptly. If delayed take offering next Sunday. Help us break all records.—Ranshaw and Denton.

En voyage.—Greetings from this side. Land of Erin in sight. Reach Queenstown in few hours. Calm and beautifuul voyage. I send a breath of these rejuvenating sea breezes to the readers of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY. Heartily yours.—Herbert Yeuell.

Evansville, Ind., May 23.—Sixty-eight today, 232 in seven days of invitation. Scoville forces leading Christian forces of Evansville to greatest victory in history of Southern Indiana. Evans' Hall, seating 2,200, packed to uttermost. Brethren pray for us. Bring great delegation to this inspiring service.—H. A. Turney.

Ernest C. Mobley has received a unanimous call to succeed George L. Bush as pastor of the Dixon St. Church, Gainesville, Texas, and accepted. This church has had a line of fine ministers. Mr. Bush is held in high esteem by the entire church and by the city at large. It was largely through his ministry that the church became a Living Link in the foreign, home and state societies. C. R. Scoville held his first great meeting for this church. The prospects for the future are bright.

H. O. Breeden will supply the pulpit of the West Side Church, San Francisco, until a successor is found to Robert Lord Cave, who recently resigned. This removes Dr. Breeden from the evangelistic field temporarily. He says he is too much enamored of the evangelistic work to leave it except for a short time. Certainly the fact that Dr. Breeden has over a hundred invitations from our best churches which he cannot accept indicates that there is a deep desire among us for the highest evangelism.

One of the leading Bible school specialists of Western Pennsylvania, and one who is charged with a part of the responsibility for the success of the Centennial Bible School exhibits is Chester A. MacDonald, the minister at McKees Rocks. He went to Pennsylvania from Ohio after a few years of thorough testing in hard places. He has doubled the power of the church, greatly increased its membership, put its Bible school among the first in the district, with a splendid men's class at the head, and made himself the trusted friend of every young man and boy of McKees Rocks.

Obituary Notice

HATCHER.—Born August 25, 1833, Josiah H. Hatcher departed this life in his seventy-sixth year. He was a charter member of the Englewood Christian Church, and most faithfully filled his place as senior elder for nearly a quarter of a century. Throughout his long life he enjoyed uniform good health; the summons to "come up higher," arriving very suddenly. On Thursday, May 6, he was stricken with apoplexy; dying peacefully and painlessly, two hours after the stroke. Bro. C. G. Kindred preached the funeral discourse from the pulpit of the Morgan Park Baptist Church, our brother having resided in that suburb during the closing years of his life. He died in the faith and his works follow him.

W. P. KEELER.

Chicago (Englewood) May 17, 1909.

JACKMAN.—Mary Jackman was born February 12, 1869, died April 15, 1909. She united with the church when quite young and lived a most faithful and consistent Christian life. She was a public school teacher and had the kindly sympathy which made the child, the parent and the home the objects of her solicitude. The poor and needy had a friend in her. Her charities, which were many, were without display. She occupied many and important positions in the church and gave herself to them with rare devotion. She was resourceful in methods, self-sacrificing in efforts and dependable in the highest degree. Religion to her was not an ebb and flow of feeling, but a life of joyous, because grateful and love-inspired, service. She leaves an aged mother, five sisters and four brothers. The church as well as these have lost a time friend.

Notes From the Foreign Society

Sunday, May 16, Secretary F. M. Rains assisted pastor H. H. Harmon in the formal setting apart of the great new church building of the First Church, Lincoln, Neb. It was a great day. The property is worth over $50,000, and over $16,000 was raised at these services. This is the Living Link church that supports Miss Olive Griffith in India through the Foreign Society. Dr. C. C. Drummond and wife, missionaries in India, went out from this church and still hold their membership here where Dr. Drummond's parent still reside. O. J. Granger, also in India, went out from this church. And in this church Secretary S. J. Corey made the good confession and was baptized by J. Z. Briscoe, one of the elders. This is a great missionary center. Our churches in and about Lincoln united in the dedicatory services. This great occasion reminds us that the first sermon preached by one of our brethren in Nebraska dates back to June 15, 1845, on the North Platte River near the present town of Ogalalla. The first church in the state was organized at Brownville, January, 1855, by Joel M. Wood. This is said to be the first church organization in the territory by any people.

Dr. M. E. Poland of Bethany, W. Va., has been appointed a medical missionary to Nantungchow, China. He and Mrs. Poland will leave for the field in September.

Mr. and Mrs. A. F. Hensey have arrived home on furlough from Africa. Their address is Bedford, Ohio. They have done good work, and are entitled to a season of rest.

Dr. Dye expects to sail from New York on the S. S. "Baltic," June 18. The missionaries on the Congo are counting the days until he joins them. Dr. Dye has done a great work among the churches. His life has reinforced his message.

THINK HARD

It Pays to Think About Food.

The unthinking life some people lead often causes trouble and sickness, illustrated in the experience of a lady in Fond Du Lac, Wis.

"About four years ago I suffered dreadfully from indigestion, always having eaten whatever I liked, not thinking of the digestible qualities. This indigestion caused palpitation of the heart so badly I could not walk up a flight of stairs without sitting down once or twice to regain breath and strength.

"I became alarmed and tried dieting, wore my clothes very loose, and many other remedies, but found no relief.

"Hearing of the virtues of Grape-Nuts and Postum, I commenced using them in place of my usual breakfast of coffee, cakes, or hot biscuit, and in one week's time I was relieved of sour stomach and other ills attending indigestion. In a month's time my heart was performing its functions naturally and I could climb stairs and hills and walk long distances.

"I gained ten pounds in this short time, and my skin became clear and I completely regained my health and strength. I continue to use Grape-Nuts and Postum for I feel that I owe my good health entirely to their use.

"I like the delicious flavor of Grape-Nuts and by making Postum according to directions, it tastes similar to mild high grade coffee."

Centennial Bulletin

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

A CAMP FIRE OF VETERANS.

One of the problems that has been constantly before the Centennial Committee has at last been solved. Provision is being made to have a Camp Fire of veterans in one of the large churches of the Centennial district, Saturday afternoon, October 16, while the five sessions of the special Centennial Day are in progress in the halls.

The men whom we especially delight to honor in this Centennial occasion are those who were comrades of the Pioneers themselves in their mighty labors. It would be too great a tax on their strength to deliver addresses in the great Centennial auditoriums. But even there some of them will be presented at every session, so that all the pilgrims to the Centennial may have the privilege of seeing them and according them the honor that is due their long, distinguished and unselfish service. They will be chosen to preside at the tables in the celebration of the Lord's Supper. In many other ways the Centennial hosts will honor these aged servants of the Lord. But the Camp Fire is planned to be of the veterans, for the veterans, and by the veterans. It will necessarily be held in an auditorium that will seat only 800 or 1,000, because their voices are not strong enough to reach a larger number. But it is easy to guess that the meeting will be of such great interest that especially strict regulations will have to be adopted to prevent the younger people from crowding out the elders.

THE CENTENNIAL COLISEUM

The intense interest that is being taken in the Centennial is manifest in the microscopic scrutiny that is given to every detail of the plans of the celebration. In the Associated Press dispatch the statement was made that a baseball grandstand was to be used for the communion service. One of the noblest of our women has written inquiring anxiously if this is true, and entering an earnest protest. The statement is both true and false. If you are thinking of an ordinary baseball grandstand with the usual surroundings and associations as such places it is absolutely untrue. What we are expecting to use is a great steel and concrete coliseum located in the center of the higher life of Pittsburgh, and newly constructed at a cost of one million dollars. It will seat in comfortable opera chairs securely protected from the weather 17,000 persons. 6,000 more are provided for in the open air if the weather is as perfect as our mid-October days usually are. The great desideratum for the communion service is that we shall all be together. The use of this building the six preceding days for the sessions of our Convention will have so consecrated it that even those who look upon clean and honorable athletic recreation as profane will count the coliseum a sacred place when they come to the Lordsday.

NUMBERING ISRAEL?

Astonishing objection has been made to the use of the Centennial Roll Book, which is a survival of the deplorable extreme to which some of the brethren went in the period from 1830 to 1850, when they refused to keep church rolls or records because they found no New Testament command or precedent for them. But this objecter bases his argument especially upon the condemnation of David for numbering Israel. This is going back under the old covenant! In the Book of Acts we read that three thousand were converted on the Day of Pentecost, and a little later we are told the number of men in the Jerusalem church had come to be five thousand. Brethren if we are going to go back to Jerusalem we must count the disciples in the Centennial year! Moreover, we have good precedents for wanting not only the numbers but the actual names of all the disciples, for the inspired evangelists give us the names of all twelve of the Apostles. Luke gives a full list of the seven deacons appointed at Jerusalem. Paul names many of his associates in missionary labors. Since we are all one in Christ Jesus, and all on an equal footing, if it is permissible to tell the names of each member in the church, there can be no vital objection to giving the entire list of its membership. This is precisely what we are striving to do with the Centennial Roll Books, and it is going to prove one of the most inspiring features not only of the Centennial Celebration, but of the years that follow.

MEMORIALS FOR THE YOUNG.

The great feasts of Israel were instituted especially for the instruction and inspiration of the children. This is the chief value of every memorial. It is of the past but for the future, so that Centennial Children's Day in the interest of world-wide missions should and will prove one of the greatest events of the entire Centennial year. The exercise is the "Centennial Call." The gifts go to make up a Centennial offering. The frequent use of the word "Centennial" gives a priceless opportunity to tell the story of the Pioneers and of their missionary labors. They did not stop with taking missionary collections. They gave themselves as missionary offerings. If their stories are fairly told in all the Bible School classes of our great brotherhood, both young and old will rejoice to emulate their example, and to make not only a cash offering that will run beyond the $100,000 aim, but to consecrate hundreds of young lives to Gospel service in our own or other lands. Select any worthy preacher or missionary from Thomas Campbell, Barton W. Stone, Alexander Campbell and Walter Scott, down to the last recruit to the ranks and raise the question, In what secular calling could he possibly have done so much for God and humanity and his own soul? "First they gave their own selves to the Lord."

Pittsburg News

Tuesday, May 11, W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary and J. H. Garrison, Chairman of the Centennial Committee, went out to West Middletown, found the old paths our fathers trod, and very gladly walked therein. We don't mean to say that this is the first they ever did it, but without joking they went on a quest for the old foundation of the Brush Run Church, that church where Alexander Campbell was ordained to preach in 1811, where for a number of years he and his father preached to a small company of rustic pioneers. The old log building was removed to West Middletown, two miles, two years ago and converted into a blacksmith shop and afterwards into a stable. Truly it has fallen in evil ways. We recall with pleasure having visited the little log congregational church in Salem, Mass., built in 1620. There were tablets there that we read with very great interest. Somehow we feel that the timbers of this old church ought to be taken down to old Bethany, and there reconverted into a church building. It would be a building of historic interest. Probably some of our loyal disciples who have somewhat of antiquarian spirit will purchase the building from the colored man who now owns it and sees that its final resting place is in this town of historic interest. In this building could be placed documents and a tablet properly inscribed, and all visitors to this college town would be deeply interested in everything connected with the old church. Our visitors went also to the bend in the Buffalo some two or three miles away and saw the place where the first baptisms were ministered.

The Monday morning meeting was attended by twenty-four ministers and visitors. J. D. Dabney of Herron Hill read a review of Professor Orr's, "The Resurrection." It showed much patient research in its preparation.

Among few of the best things might be noted, F. M. Gordon's Juvenile Boys' Band for park services. He has conducted these services for the past two years with excellent success. The large attendance at the Bellevue Bible School, there being 312 present, eighty-five men in the Adult Bible Class.

Shall We Have a Centennial Hymn?

A fine Centennial Hymn set to excellent music has been received by us. Growing out of this a suggestion is made by us. For the next two months the music committee of the Centennial will receive other compositions of a similar character, after which a competent committee of five will make a selection. We ought to produce for this Centennial occasion a hymn that would have in it the divine flame of sacred poesy,—a hymn if you please that could be sung for a hundred years to come. It should be so catholic in its spirit that it could be sung acceptably in all religious gatherings. It should be so true in its conception that in singing it every heart might be filled with a burning desire to realize the Lord's prayer for unity.

We solicit contributions from all sources. Send such with or without music to O. H. Philips, 203 Bissell Block, Pittsburgh, Pa., on and before July 15, 1909.

Talk Happiness

"Talk happiness every chance
You get—and Talk it good and strong!
Look for it in
The by-ways as you grimly
Pass along;
Perhaps it is a stranger now
Whose visit never Comes;
But talk it! Soon you'll find
That you and happiness
Are chums."

FOUND OUT

A Trained Nurse Discovered Its Effect.

No one is in better position to know the value of food and drink than a trained nurse.

Speaking of coffee, a nurse of Wilkesbarre, Pa., writes: "I used to drink strong coffee myself, and suffered greatly from headaches and indigestion.

"While on a visit to my brothers I had a good chance to try Postum, for they drink it altogether in place of ordinary coffee. After using Postum two weeks I found I was much benefited and finally my headaches disappeared and also the indigestion.

"Naturally I have since used Postum among my patients, and have noticed a marked benefit where coffee has been left off and Postum used.

"I observe a curious fact about Postum used among mothers. It greatly helps the flow of milk in cases where coffee is inclined to dry it up, and where tea causes nervousness.

"I find trouble in getting servants to make Postum properly. They most always serve it before it has been boiled long enough. It should be boiled 15 or 20 minutes after boiling begins and served with cream, then it is certainly a delicious beverage."

Southwest Missouri Notes

The Third District convention was held this year with the church at Neosho. The splendid new church, which was erected last year under the leadership of J. W. Baker, is a thing of beauty. J. B. Hunley and his good people made admirable hosts. The entertainment of the convention was all that could be desired. The program was of unusual merit. F. L. Moffet presided at all sessions. J. H. Hardin, T. A. Abbott, G. W. Muckley, C. M. Chilton, G. D. Edwards, J. H. Diehl, George B. Ranshaw, Joseph Keevil and P. C. Macfarlane were there from outside the district. Messrs. Walters, Moore, Ragland, E. L. Ely, Gaylor, J. H. Jones, Miller, Cooksey et al. contributed to the feast of good things. The C. W. B. M. had their usual good program. The fellowship was one of the most enjoyable features. Mrs. Persis L. Christian slipped away from her retreat at Eureka Springs, Ark., and came to be once more in a convention of her brethren. Her presence was a benediction to all. The closing session was notable. The men of the Neosho church banqueted the men of the convention. Joplin sent down seventy-five. About a hundred and thirty-five sat down together. There were great speeches, short talks and running through all masculine note that was inspiring. No doubt Brotherhood work will be greatly strengthened in this district as a result of this meeting.

Perhaps the most notable action of the convention was the passage of a resolution accepting the invitation of Drury College to establish and maintain a Bible professorship in the college. The churches of southwest Missouri have been wrestling with the college problem for years but have been unable to make any advance, being unable to provide the necessary equipment and endowment. Drury College was established in 1873. It has buildings and equipment valued at $517,197 and endowment amounting to $446,445. It enrolled 496 students this year. It is undenominational, being on the Carnegie foundation, and it has invited the Christian churches to place a professor in its faculty to teach the Bible, he to be appointed and maintained by the Christian churches, and to be untrammeled with respect to his teaching of the Bible. His standing in the college would be that of any professor. Such an opportunity as this has rarely come to our people. The convention was quick to recognize it and appointed an executive committee of the following persons to launch the enterprise. F. L. Moffet, N. M. Ragland, George L. Peters, Joseph Gaylor, D. W. Moore, F. F. Walters, and E. L. Ely. It is hoped to see the professor installed at the opening of the fall term.

Re-Examining the Successful Revival

The Evangelistic Meeting Questioned Conscientiously by the Evangelist

Our study last week engaged us in the problem of defining the test by which all church work, including evangelistic work, must sooner or later be judged. We saw that there is danger of standing within the Revival and judging it by a standard intrinsic to itself. The true standard of evangelistic success lies outside the evangelistic meeting, outside the church, even. Both church and Revival must be judged by their worth to the kingdom of God, a kingdom of righteousness in personal character and social organization.

If, as was pointed out, the church is a means to an end and not an end in itself, it is possible that a church might prosper without advancing the kingdom of God. It is even conceivable that a church which forgot the end it was meant to attain would actually weaken and retard the kingdom of God. Likewise a Revival, judged by a standard inside itself, might be successful in a marvelous degree, while, judged by its abiding fruits in personal holiness and community well-being, it might prove to be nil or even reactionary.

The conscientious Christian leader will not tolerate the stereotyped assumption that success justifies itself. Shallow people and vulgar are the only ones who accept as theirs tne motto, "Nothing succeeds like success." Thoughtful people agree with Chesterton that oftimes nothing fails like success.

Awareness to the truth of this paradox and a sincere desire to make his work really advance the kingdom of God will prompt every conscientious evangelist to thoroughly re-examine his work to see what relation it has to the wider and deeper order of righteousness which the church is organized to establish.

We do not share the popular criticism of evangelists. We believe that as a class of men they are consecrated to Christ and his work. They are not grafters as is often charged. They are not professional —no more so than pastors. If there are serious faults in their work they are traceable, not to the evangelist as an individual, but to the conventional system of values and methods under which the church in general is working.

It is our firm conviction, however, that if there is to be a reform in our evangelistic methods and standards it must be made by the evangelists themselves.

So long as a crass evangelism—sensationalistic, hypnotic, manipulative, irreverent—is abroad in the land there will be hard-pushed pastors and churches that will utilize it. Judgment of evangelism must begin with the evangelist's own heart if there is to be an effective reform. And there is no group of men whom we would expect to face the situation more conscientiously and squarely than our evangelists. Because we believe they will earnestly re-examine their work in the light of anybody's intelligent suggestion, we have formulated certain questions which may aid in making concrete and immediate the criterion of evangelistic success set forth in our last article. We would suggest, to begin with, that the evangelist ask concerning his work:

Does the Revival which I hold make itself "at home" in the church where I hold it?

Do the methods and results of the Revival link in naturally with the work the church was doing before the Revival began and must do after it closes? There must be continuity and progressiveness in the life of every church. If the Revival is a diversion, an episode or an adventure, the reaction from it is bound to leave the church and the community in a worse condition than had there been no Revival at all. After the Revival does the process of settling down to the regular work of the church with its steady ministries and stated services, and, throughout, its quieter routine of activities, operate so as to leave the converts disappointed? Unless the church is working on a false plan altogether the evangelist's work should fit naturally into its methods and habits and be itself a natural foundation for future work.

Often times, however, we have observed that the converts were siezed with a chill on the second Lord's day after the evangelist went away. The minister was not versatile and fertile enough to supply sufficient stimuli to keep up the interest awakened by the methods of the evangelist. Ordinarily the blame for this is laid upon the pastor. In many cases, no doubt, he is to blame. But it is just possible that the evangelist has produced an overwrought situation which in the nature of things cannot be maintained by any honest methods. The very wistfulness with which, in after months or years, the church looks backward to the Revival does but betray its lack of the sense of steady progress now. And a Revival which does not set a church in the path of steady progress by means of normal methods of work has hurt the church and weakened the kingdom of God. Following close on this first question the earnest evangelist will ask:

Does my Revival create an appetite in the church for sensational methods?

This question deals with one of the diseases of the modern church—the mania for methods. In a time when the masses are indifferently turning away from the church, her leaders, instead of re-studying the content of the gospel that they might speak a prophetic message to the men of today, are exhausting their imaginations with devices and tricks and attractions to get people to attend church.

The church seems to have given up commanding men and is devising ways and means of attracting men. These ways and means are often very clever and often very silly. But whether we call them silly or clever they do, in their net influence, cheapen the gospel in the eyes of the world.

It is a sad day for prophecy when preaching instead of being a passion becomes an art.

The question is an open one whether our present day evangelism has not debauched the churches with the notion that we must at all hazards get the crowds no matter what we do with them, and get converts no matter what they are converted to.

The conscientious evangelist will deal drastically with himself on this question for his success is so conspicuous that his methods are certain to be imitated by many others in the ministry and to set up a craving in the churches and the communities that cannot be satisfied by a normal procedure. A third question the downright honest evangelist will consider, and prayerfully, is:

What is my attitude toward people? Do I conceive them as possible "converts" for my meeting or as spiritual beings not to be taken advantage of, and do I approach them with that courtesy of the spirit which allows full right to their personalities?

In other words, does the evangelist conceive his meeting as made for men or men for his meeting?

This is no fictitious question to the religious leader who has been instructed in the ethics of crowd psychology. Concerned primarily about the Kingdom of God and only secondarily about "breaking his record" in this meeting he would scorn to use the tricks of hypnotic control which are the common asset of a certain type of evangelist. He sees plainly that "breaking down the will" by organizing a social situation around a man to which he is compelled to yield through hypnotic pressure is the poles apart from a genuine spiritual conversion.

The conscentious evangelist who is instructed in the mere rudiments of mental science will spurn all hypnotic control over people because he knows that while it makes a "great meeting" it outrages the personality of every individual involved in it and builds wood, hay and stubble into the temple of God.

If this uncanny method is objectionable in the case of a congregation of adults it becomes positively vicious when practiced upon crowds of children. We are bold to say, and we believe every earnest

DEMOCRATIZING OXFORD

Lord Curzon, for many years Viceroy of India, now Lord of the Realm and Chancellor of Oxford University, proposes to make that ancient and tradition loving seat of learning modern and democratic. He tells members of the university that he has been offered $150,000 for a certain scientific object if Greek is removed from the stated requirements for entrance and recommends that the conditions be met. He further asks that degrees be given woman. These two things are enough to make the hoary spirits of the Middle Ages wrap themselves in sack-cloth and prepare to forsake the sacred confines of the Oxford medieval curriculum. What, are not Greek and Latin inspired by the gods of learning and endowed thereby as the only means by which brains can be developed? Further the iconoclastic Chancellor would take up the program of John Ruskin and provide for the education of workingmen at the university. Oxford is already richly endowed with the spirit of Ruskin's efforts in this matter and has extra-college provisions for the enlightening of the working-classes as well as extension courses for the people of the country without regard to class. It will be a great day for the democracy of education in old England when it becomes as possible for a penniless boy to take a course at Oxford as it is for an American lad of ambition to work his way through our best universities.

THE SUGAR THIEF

Call a spade a spade. The inimitable Will Maupin sings:

"If in sheerest desperation he protects his little flock
By the theft of but a single loaf of bread,
Clasp the handcuffs tight upon him, thrust him in the prison dock;
Fling the curses of the righteous at his head!
But if by manipulation he depletes the widow's store,
If by cunning he can mint here tears of gold;
If he profits by the burdens he imposes on the poor
We must hail him as a man of business bold."

It was supposed Mr. Loeb would be given a cabinet place. When he was appointed Collector of the Port of New York it was generally said it was the payment of a political debt. Now it seems that the very able Loeb desired that place and the why is appearing. He was no sooner installed in this very comfortable and rich post than he began to show signs of his association with the great Nimrod, except that he went after a certain colored gentleman he had sighted in that particular wood-pile.

Back some thirty years ago there was a "Sugar Ring." Even then a certain treasury expert wrote some pamphlets charging that the "Ring" had cheated the government out of some $12,000,000 by the manipulation of the "polariscope test." He offered to furnish the names and prove the cases but those were days when we were falling under thralldom to the "Captain of Industry" and these were "men of business bold" who were leading the country to the conquest of the world of commerce.

The polariscope is an instrument that tests the purity of sugar. It is a very exact instrument and does its part well and truthfully. But the tariff rates are variable as to the different standards of purity and thus manipulation of the polariscope test would reduce duties at the will of the manipulator and put the steal into the pockets of the "Ring." But this is not all.

It is now found that the stealing has been continuous and by many bold methods. It has bribed the clerks charged with the scales and tests at the custom house. Loeb has seven of these $13 a week men in the toils of the law. Will he get the real thieves who bribed these seven? They simply cogged the scales to beat honest weight, but they were petty criminals compared to the rich managers of the Sugar Trust who bribed them to do it and who thus cheated the government out of millions while the poor petty tools of their bribery reaped a few ill-gotten dollars. Loeb has made them return $2,500,000 of this stolen money. But this is really petty pilfering compared to the greater criminality of the Trust that levies toll upon every table in the land and most of all on that of the humblest.

They have monopolized this article of common living and made it pay dividends upon some $240,000,000 of capitalized iniquity. No one knows just what part of this is "water" but from the fact that it began by capitalizing a property that cost in actual money but $7,000,000, into a company of $50,000,000 and made it pay dividends, it may be well presumed that the "water" is to the actual investment as one to five and perhaps much more—and it all is made to pay dividends by its levy upon the table of the masses and not a man who works for $1.50 per day and sweetens the food of his family but that pays toll to this highwayman.

The favorite ruse of the Trust is to get a "joker" into any bill that would protect the people against its interests. This "joker" is a hidden provision that will permit the Trust or Interest involved to reap from the law what that same law is supposed to deprive them of. It is as if you hired a policeman to guard your premises and he himself stole what he was keeping from the burglars. The Sugar Trusts "joker" is the provision relating to unrefined sugars. It is the use of the "No. 16 Dutch Standard" which is supposed to discriminate as to quality, but in reality discriminates only as to color. That is, to the public a duty is supposed to be levied according to the quality of the unrefined sugars; to the Trust it is simply a difference in color for there is little difference in the quality. Dr. Wiley denounced it ten years ago.

People want only white sugar. White sugar is sugar that has been run through bone-black and thus whitened. This is called refining. The Sugar Trust's monopoly consists, like that of Standard Oil, largely in the refining business. Thus its advantage from the "joker." There is a high duty on refined sugars to prevent competition from refineries that might be built in sugar producing countries. But the duty on unrefined sugar is very low so the product that cannot go on the consumer's table until it passes through the Trust's refineries, pays little duty before it comes to the refinery, but after there being put through the very simple process of having its color removed is sold to the consumer upon the basis of the highly taxed refined sugar. The Trust buys the unrefined sugar cheaply because there is a small duty, refines it at an insignificant cost, and sells it at a big price because of the high duty on refined sugar.

MR. BRYAN ON TEMPERANCE

It is the destiny of Mr. Bryan to become the political idealist of our country. Doubtless the reason he cannot be president is that he is too utterly an idealist and a man of conscience and no compromise for our exceedingly practical and materialistic folk. It is greater to be right than to be president and the Great Commoner, as even his political enemies now distinguish him, has before him the pleasing prospect of winning so distinguished a place in history. He is the most eminent of political preachers. His particular plans for enacting legislation may not be adopted, but his campaign for principle will be adopted regardless of the party in power.

Naturally insistent demands have been made by temperance folk that Mr. Bryan espouse each particular plan that each particular advocate thinks the only one for the defeat of the liquor traffic. Because he refuses to do so multifarious a thing many particular advocates vote him a fraud. In recent issues of the Commoner he takes very marked ground on the temperance question. He defines his position by saying he is for temperance, that he is also and fundamentally for the principle of local option, i. e., that the people should rule in all things and that the problem of whether the option should be limited to a town or village, a township, a county or should take in a whole state depends entirely upon circumstances. For the first time he uses the word "recent" personally in saying that he "resents" a certain effort of the liquor dealers to use his name in their interests. His usual calm and his imperturbable good humor under misrepresentation is thus broken by the unprincipled efforts of the liquor dealer who sought to help his cause by a misconstruction of Mr. Bryan's local option principles in favor of the saloon.

Further he has taken up a definite crusade in favor of such legislation as that of the Littlefield and Hepburn bills. The national government issues licenses to men who buy them for use in prohibition territory. He says the government collects the $25 either "without giving anything valuable in return (in case the one receiving it cannot sell liquor), or it encourages the one buying it to violate the local law, for he cannot use it without violating the law" and adds "Can the federal government afford to continue a partner with the lawbreakers?" Noting the charge so often made by campaign orators and a partizan press that the Democratic party was the party of the saloon and lawlessness he says significantly, "The time has come to put it to the test."

EDITORIAL

Rev. George H. Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Church in Kansas City, is just completing a European journey of several months, and in a recent note from Venice he speaks with enthusiasm of the journey and especially of the happy anticipations of return home.

Mr. P. C. Macfarlane, our Brotherhood secretary, is adding to his literary laurels by a new story in McClure's Magazine for June, entitled, "Sergeant McCarty, Man Handler." Mr. Macfarlane's serial, "Unto the Lion's Mouth," printed three years ago in THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY was deservedly popular with the readers of this paper.

The pastors of Memorial Church of Christ and the Hyde Park Baptist Church exchanged pulpits on Sunday evening last. Dr. John L. Jackson, the pastor of the Hyde Park Baptist Church, is soon to leave Chicago after a fruitful ministry of ten years. He has been a close friend and sympathizer in the union of the First Christian and Memorial Baptist Churches into the Memorial Church of Christ, and has promoted friendly feelings between Baptists and Disciples wherever possible. He goes to accept the Baptist pulpit at Sharon, Pennsylvania.

Citizens of Montclair, N. J., recently gave a dinner to Rev. Amory H. Bradford whose long ministry there has made him one of the chief figures in the city life. In the course of his talk after the dinner, Dr. Bradford gave voice to the following municipal creed:

"I believe that the place in which I live, while I live in it, is for me the greatest place in the world, and that as it gives me the best which it has, it deserves from me the best that I can give to it. I believe that my duty to my city and to my country is as sacred as my duty to my church, and a part of my duty to my God. I believe that service of the public is one test of true religion, and that the ballot is a sacrament as holy as the Supper of our Lord."

Brooklyn takes its place beside Chicago in declining to invite Dr. J. Wilbur Chapman to hold union evangelistic meetings in that city. The Congregational pastors took the lead in voicing the opposition to his coming. The reason assigned for the opposition of such Congregational leaders as Drs. Hillis, Boynton, Cadman, Waters and others is that the churches of their denomination are involved in especial obligations for next year making it inopportune to join in the proposed united evangelistic movement. It is well known, however, that more important considerations lie back of the opposition. Among these considerations the chief is the earnest desire of the best leaders of the churches to purify evangelism of professionalism and commercialism.

A new plan has been matured for the program of the Chautauqua Assembly at Chautauqua, New York, for this season. Special themes are to be considered during each week of the season. The week of July 11 is to be given to the work of the Religious Education Association, and a special series of addresses on character development occupies the 2:30 o'clock hour each day. Professor Coe will speak on Monday on "Character Development through the Colleges and Universities;" Professor Votaw on Tuesday on "Character Development through the Public Schools;" Professor Starbuck on Wednesday on "Character Development through the Sunday-schools;" Professor Willett on Thursday on "Character Development through the Churches;" Dr. George J. Fisher on Friday on "Character Development through Social and Personal Hygiene" and Secretary Cope of the Association on Saturday on "Character Development through Social Living."

It has been the custom of recent years for cities that have attained an honorable history to celebrate some important anniversary with a historical pageant. The coming summer is to be marked with such a celebration by the city of Bath, England. This celebration occurs July 19-24 and will recall by a series of historical scenes the story of Bath from Roman times to the present. Among the tableaux and pageants presented will be the Roman market and the dedication of the temple, about 160 A. D., the sack of the British city of Bath by the West Saxons in 577, the coronation of King Edgar in 973; the visit of King Henry VII, in 1499; the visit of Queen Elizabeth and the confirmation of the city's charter in 1590; the battle of Landsdown in 1569; the glorious days of Beau Nash in the period of 1750; the visit of Queen Charlotte to Bath in 1817, and other notable events in the history of this quaint and historic English town.

The preparations for the 24th International Christian Endeavor Convention at St. Paul, Minnesota, July 7-12 are going forward with precision and enthusiasm. It is apparent that the Convention is going to be one of the greatest in the history of the Christian Endeavor Society. The general topic "Thy kingdom come" will be considered from practically every point of view in the many sessions that will be held in the Auditorium, the Armory, the Opera House, and the various churches of St. Paul. Special noon evangelistic services will be held; conferences and schools of methods will develop the ideals of Christian Endeavor in practical application to life; and a large number of addresses will deepen consecration and arouse enthusiasm. One of the notable features of the series of meetings is the celebration of Mendelssohn's Centennial on Saturday evening at the Auditorium with the rendition of the oratorio "Elijah" by eminent soloists and a great chorus. Every Christian Endeavor Society that can possibly arrange to do so ought to have its representative at this Convention. The program, containing the details of the sessions, lists of special convention features, of churches to be used as state headquarters, information regarding railroad rates and state transportation managers, will be mailed upon request made to the Convention Committee in the Germania Life Building, St. Paul, Minnesota.

The desperate struggle the saloon is making for its life is illustrated in the surprising victory gained by the liquor forces in the Illinois Legislature a week ago when the local option law, adopted two years ago, was annulled by a vote of 78 to 70 in the House of Representatives. This measure is now in the hands of the Senate, and strenuous efforts are being made by the friends of temperance throughout the state to prevent the complete annulment of this admirable measure. The significance of the battle may be seen in the fact that Chicago with its enormous liquor interests must depend upon the state at large to win the victory against the forces of the saloon. With the enormous following of the United Societies, which are recruited largely from the foreign elements in the city and are banded together to promote the interests of the open saloon, doing continuous business, nights and Sundays included, the temperance forces of Chicago have on their hands a fight which cannot be won without the assistance of sober-minded and decent people of the small cities and communities throughout the state. The liquor men realize this fact and are making desperate efforts to limit the power of local option to each community, thereby forestalling the possibility of state-wide prohibition which would be the only means of reaching the deeply intrenched liquor interests of Chicago. The temperance people of Illinois are abundantly able to deal with the saloon as it deserves if only they are sufficiently aroused, and hold together in the combat. The Anti-Saloon League is nobly leading in the effort to crush the greatest foe that progress, civilization, and Christianity encounter in our age.

One of the most active workers in the cause of social uplift in this city is Rev. Morton C. Hartzell, pastor of the South Park Methodist Church. Mr. Hartzell's church is in the third ward of Chicago, in the middle of the South Side district, which has perhaps suffered more than any other part of the city from the deteriorating influences of the saloons and dance halls during the past ten years. Property owners throughout that district assert that the value of real estate has declined for residence purposes not less than one-third. Mr. Hartzell two years ago accepted the presidency of the Douglas Neighborhood Club which has ever since waged war upon the all-night saloon, Sunday desecration, and the presence of music in the saloons, a factor that is recognized as the fruitful source of most of the evils which the saloon breeds. Mr. Hartzell has been attacked viciously by the element against which he has roused the forces of righteousness in his district. One of the city aldermen is a member of his church, and this man has spared no efforts to remove Mr. Hartzell from his pastorate and to discredit his work in the city. The fight has culminated at last in a lining up of the respectable forces against the lawless and vice-breeding element in the third ward. The charges against Mr. Hartzell are, of course, undue political activity and the neglect of his church work in the interest of reform efforts. This is a very old and stale charge to bring against a man who is accomplishing the very tasks for which the church is set in any community. The ministers of the entire district, including Protestants, Roman Catholics and Jews, are at one with Mr. Hartzell in his noble crusade, and it is to be hoped that the authorities of the Methodist Church, to whom the matter has now been submitted for final decision, will recognize the splendid work that has been done both by the Douglas Neighborhood Club and by Mr. Hartzell in person to promote the cause of decency and community welfare.

The Death of Marcus Dods

Few men have been more prominent in the Protestant church of Great Britain than the Reverend Marcus Dods, Principal of New College, Edinburgh, who died a fortnight ago. The story of his life is intimately interwoven with the progress of the Free Church of Scotland during the past half century. He was educated in Edinburgh Academy and at the University. Later he studied at New College in the theological department, and after his graduation waited for seven years before he was able to secure a pulpit. He preached as a supply in a number of places, but never received a call until he was summoned to Renfield Church, Glasgow, where he continued as minister for twenty-five years. In 1869 Dr. Dods was called to the Free St. George's Church, Edinburgh, as a colleague of Dr. Candlish, but he declined the call.

In 1877 he was brought before the church courts for heresy, following a sermon on revelation and inspiration. But the case was finally closed with the decision of a majority of the presbytery that they found the views expressed in the sermon were to be tolerated in the church and were not condemned in the Confession. In 1889 at the semi-jubilee of his ordination, Dr. Dods was presented with various addresses and the sum of $5,000, together with a six months' holiday. In the same year he was called to the chair of New Testament Criticism and Exegesis in New College, Edinburgh, the position held by him until the end. In 1901 he was nominated as moderator of the General Assembly, but declined, much to the regret of his friends. When Principal Rainey died in 1907, Dr. Dods was elected to the leadership of New College, but expressed even at that time the fear that the honor had come to him too late.

Dr. Dods has been known familiarly to ministers and teachers who are acquainted with recent literature through his many books, of which "The Commentary on Genesis," "The Gospel of St. John," "The Parables of our Lord," and "The Bible, Its Origin and Nature" are best known. Most of his books were the results of his preaching at Renfield. Dr. Dods was a very wide reader and his book reviews in British periodicals cover a large range of subjects. Perhaps his favorite studies were in the life of St. Augustine, on whose "Confessions" he wrote probably the best existing commentary.

Marcus Dods was a scholar of the first rank, a fearless defender of the newer science and criticism as applied to biblical study, an eager worker, and a Christian of unblemished character and of profound influence upon the lives of his students.

The Scandal of Easy Divorce

One of the most encouraging signs of the times is the arousal of public interest regarding the divorce laws which have too long disgraced American legislation. The variations between the statutes in the different states have permitted grave irregularities to gain legal standing. Encouraging proofs are at hand that those states which have been most lenient in regard to divorce regulations are being aroused by a continued agitation of the matter to a larger degree of sensitiveness and are remedying the worst of the abuses which still exist. The scandal of easy divorce laws and of discordant statutes in the various states is, we may hope, to be remedied in the not distant future. The churches are giving renewed attention to this question. The Roman Catholic and the Episcopal Churches have long been leaders in insistence upon the integrity of the marriage vow and the sin of divorce. Ministers are recognizing the necessity of careful inquiry into the conditions upon which they marry applicants who come with marriage licenses, and of refusing such as cannot justify their right to enter the marriage relation.

In the meantime the whole question of the New Testament teaching upon divorce is receiving fresh attention. Ministerial commissions have taken up this study with a desire to know, if possible, exactly the attitude which Jesus took upon the question and the limits of the principles he laid down. A recent utterance of Professor Milton S. Terry, of Northwestern University strikes the heart of the whole question. It is his contention that Jesus absolutely forbade divorce and suggested no modifying or mitigating circumstances in connection with the subject. This he bases upon the statement of our Lord in the earliest gospel, Mark, and points out that the modifying clause in Matthew and Luke, which provides that statutory offenses may furnish a justification for divorce, is wholly a later and temporizing addition which the early church felt to be necessary considering the laxity of morals and the Jewish customs which had rendered divorce so easy and so common. Professor Terry insists that the Christian law of marriage can know no abridgment or limitation. Separation of absolutely uncongenial spirits in the marriage relation may be necessary, but divorce with the right of remarriage can never be justified.

On critical grounds Professor Terry's contention seems amply justified and has indeed long been held by some of the best biblical scholars. It is clear that the modifying clause in Matthew regarding sins against the purity of the marriage state, has been used with ever widening application until a flood of abuses has gathered force and threatened to overwhelm the sanctity of marriage throughout Christendom. An arousal of conscience is needed in all the churches upon this theme. The impossibility of absolute divorce would work unquestioned hardship to large numbers of innocent and well meaning people. But is there not a higher law involved—the law of the integrity of the family? And in the interest of that law may it not be necessary that the abiding sanctions of the Christian faith and the undoubted teachings of our Lord upon this subject be reaffirmed with an emphasis that cannot be mistaken?

Let us Hope it is not Quite So Bad!

We are witnessing now several cases of acute hysteria in pulpit and religious press due to the appearance of certain new books on religious subjects. As a rule, the books themselves are only indirectly responsible for the nervous disorder. The direct cause of the trouble is some sensational comment by a reporter in a daily paper who has read perhaps the preface and glanced through the pages to find some startling sentences. These he quotes with the air of one who has read and inwardly digested the volume in hand. Often the injustice of the second hand pronouncement is neutralized by the utter ludicrousness of it. One of the best specimens of this sort we find in the Christian Union (Des Moines). A student in Drake University writes an article for that paper on Professor Sharman's new book on "The Teaching of Jesus About the Future." He has not read the book itself, but takes his text from a review published in a Des Moines paper, which makes the statement that Professor Sharman says "Jesus did not commission his disciples to preach the gospel." The "student" concludes his over-a-page effusion with this peroration:

"Christ did not commission his apostles or disciples to preach the gospel. Why the very name apostle means missionary. Oh you poor deluded, self-sacrificing missionaries, who have gone to heathen lands and sacrificed your lives for poor, blind, misguided humanity, you were mistaken in your mission. Christ did not want you to go. Oh you poor old fathers and mothers who gave them up for His sake, you were deceived! He did not require it.

"Oh you poor old broken-down pioneer preachers; you have spent all your lives in toil and tears to build up his cause, but you were not sent.

"Oh you poor, Charles Reign Scoville and other mighty men of God, you are burning up with zeal without knowledge you toil and pray and preach and plead with men to give up their sins and flee from the wrath of God, you are mistaken.

"Oh, Brother Medbury, thou man of God, you are mistaken when you meet with us every Friday evening and thrill our hearts with a burning message to the world and God's people. For there is no heaven, no hell and no commission to preach the gospel for so says the 20th century apostles of Chicago University, and yet strangely doth it contrast with the words of Christ, 'All power is given unto me in heaven and in earth, go ye therefore and preach the gospel unto every creature.' 'He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved.'"

Burbank's Fairy Garden

Luther Burbank is the wizard of the garden and fields. He bids fair to make the desert blossom as the rose. A company has been organized to put his inventions in plant life on the market. It is to be sincerely hoped that Mr. Burbank has guarded the public against a monopolistic control that will take toll from the pockets of the many for the sake of the few who will manage the business. Mr. Burbank cares nothing for money. May no mere money mongers be allowed to exploit his genius! It belongs, by his own splendid spirit, to all humanity.

Burbank has grown an ever-blooming poppy, ten inches in diameter; he has developed the common field daisy into a flower as gorgeous as the chrysanthemum, called the Shasta Daisy; his canna lillies range from two to twelve inches in diameter; he has crossed the almond and the peach stone and produced a rapidly growing walnut with a rich white meat and a thin shell; he has crossed the potato and tomato and made the new hybrid grow the Irishman's favorite fruit on the roots and something very like the tomato on the stem; he has new fruits made up from the plum and the apricot and from the pine-apple and the quince. But greatest of all is his spineless cactus. Here is a desert plant that will grow in a rainless region to a bulk of 600 pounds in three years time, furnishing both food and water for stock. It will people vast areas of the west and southwest that are now useless and open in the desert the great ranges for cattle that wheat is driving from the plains. Now comes announcement of another product of his botanical wizardry that is among the greatest. It is that he has developed a saccharine cactus that will yield both sugar and alcohol. If these last two prove industrial commodities it will mean millions for our desert west and a boon for the table of every man by adding to the cheapness of both meat and sugar.

and informed evangelist will agree with us, that there is a way so much better for guiding children into the church that the machinery of the revival ought never to be used as a substitute for it.

The evangelist's constant temptation is to forget the good of the individual in his passion for the success of the "meeting," just as the pastor's temptation is to forget the good of the individual in his passion for the success of the church. After all, as we are saying over and over again, the test of the "meeting" is not in the meeting itself but in the souls of the men and women who have a part in it and in the community where their life is carried on.

The conscientious evangelist who is thinking about the Kingdom of God will want to know not alone how many are being brought into the church by his meeting but also how many are being alienated from the church.

This is an aspect of the problem rarely treated of. There is no way of counting those who vote no. It is the common experience of every pastor to meet persons who have formed an attitude against the church by attending some revival.

Here is a man who under the influence of the evangelist went to the altar night after night to pray God for a change of heart. Not receiving the "feeling" claimed by others he turned away from the whole performance as a hoax. Throughout the years he has maintained a stubborn cynicism toward religion. This man's name is legion.

Here is the man who has been offended by the so-called "personal work" in the modern revival. Its cheapness is apparent to him, its unreality, its indelicacy, its breach of the rights of personality. He judges the church by that. His suspicion of charlatanry in leaders who organize that kind of device inhibits a natural trust in other leaders. And so the church never gets hold of him. His name, too, is legion.

Add to these the names of those whose intelligence revolts at the utterly fictitious and impossible dogma which makes up so much of evangelistic preaching and one has found at least the typical lines along which to look for the injurious effects of a certain type of successful revival. The evangelist who is in earnest in making his work count its utmost for the Kingdom of God will reckon honestly lest this by-product of harm outweigh the direct product of good.

This last consideration will bring up to the evangelist's mind a query concerning his stock of doctrines. Although a conscientious man of God he is in constant peril of choosing his doctrines with his meeting's success in mind, forgetting for the time the deeper interests of the Kingdom of God. Such a preacher will search his heart not once nor twice with this question:

Do I preach what I preach because I really, thoughtfully believe it and because human souls profoundly need it, or because I have found that such preaching gets results for my meetings which another kind of preaching would not get?

We do not suggest this question to the evangelist as though he particularly of all Christ's workers needs his heart searched. For the pastor as well as the evangelist must ever consider the same temptation. Only this week a well-known pastor brought to us the problem that is haunting his soul. His church is "prosperous." But he is not preaching his real heart to the people. He says things he is expected to say. He is seeming to be interested in points of doctrine that do not interest him at all. The truth that does interest him and into which his life-blood goes is eclipsed, he feels, by his people's complacent satisfaction with the conventional formulæ he recites.

Even editors are tempted thus! In these weeks since THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY has passed into new hands our office has received much precious counsel from our brethren. This counsel is invaluable. It is prompted by a sincere desire to help. And it does help. But there is one bit of counsel that no one has proffered.

No one has yet urged us to speak right out plainly the thing that is in our soul.

Some have said, If you wish to make your paper a success, say thus and thus. Others, if you wish to build up a great business stand for this and this.

No words can express our appreciation of the good wishes of our brethren in behalf of the larger success of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY. We well know we cannot succeed without the earnest support (oftimes the sacrifices) of men and women who share our ideals.

Yet, after all, we do not hold it important that THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY be a success. But that the editors be honest men we believe is very important. We do not believe that it is important that the church of which our brother is pastor should succeed in numbers and property. But that their pastor preach the truth that is in him, nothing less nor more, we believe to be all-important.

Nor do we believe that it is important for your Revival to succeed, Brother Evangelist, if it costs you your intellectual integrity. We heard an evangelist preach on the personal devil recently. Afterward, as we walked away, we found our mind considering the question, not whether there was a personal devil or not, but whether the evangelist, despite his passionate talking, really believed there was.

Oftimes we wonder if the evangelist's appeal to his hearers on the basis of the "old time religion" is not motived by the fact that men act more readily on the basis of familiar, even obsolete, ideas than upon fresh, though vital, ones. Certainly no informed evangelist, if he once thinks of it, can fail to discern the inapplicability to actual life of certain of these "old-time" dogmas upon which great stress is laid in the exhortation. And no conscientious evangelist can be blind to the many reasons why the Kingdom of God is hindered by his preaching them even though they are his strongest incitements in getting results.

Another question to be asked concerning an evangelistic meeting is:

What is the direct and indirect effect of the Revival upon the sacred cause of Christian Union?

Certainly every evangelist among the Disciples will ponder this question earnestly, aware, as he must be, that to the championship of this sacred cause his people are especially called. The naive assumption prevails too widely that the sheer ingathering of additions to a church of Disciples is a contribution to Christian union. As a general rule, no doubt, this is a fact. But it is not a safe assumption for evangelistic procedure. As a result of this unconscious assumption the Disciples are reputed to be trouble-makers among the Christian people of a community where they hold a Revival. The explanation often given in the reports to the effect that our phenomenal success awakened jealousy on the part of other Christian people is too purblind, if not perverse, to require attention.

We feel like making short work of this question. Whatever may have been the fact as to past conditions, there can be no defense of an evangelistic method which produces a bitter temper in the souls of men and women who are equally with ourselves Christ's disciples. We make bold to say that no Revival is a success in its value to the Kingdom of God even though its accessions to the church mount up into the hundreds if it has operated to alienate the denominations from one another or from us.

Christian union is not coming so much by the way of correct preaching as by Christian consideration. No dream is more wild than the notion that the Disciples are to effect unity by swallowing up the denominations. Our championship of the cause of unity must be conceived as an influence, an illustration of it, which shines like a city on a hill. But no Ishmaelite among the denominations, his hand against every man and every man's hand against him, can so much as get the considerate ear of Christ's divided people to urge his plea upon them.

The problem is delicate. Our great plea calls for a wondrous great spirit. The Kingdom of God is "love, joy, peace, in the Holy Spirit." And if the Kingdom of God is the standard of evangelistic success we must conclude that no numerical results can outweigh the baneful results of envy, strife and hatred among God's people. One of the most hopeful and significant indications of our present day is the demonstration by one or two of our evangelists that the people whose plea is union are the logical leaders in union evangelism.

We have already passed far beyond the limits we had set for this article and will leave a further consideration or two until next week.

The Religion of the Spirit

By Carlos C. Rowlison

"God is spirit: and they that worship him must worship him in spirit and truth." John 4:24.

The religious world always is in more or less turmoil and conflict over the differences between the ecclesiastical and the spiritual. Mankind is incurably religious, as Sabatier said. And naturally religion seeks social expression. But social expression must have form. While we are young and uncritical, how easily do we yield to the insistence of the recognized, authoritative form. Having once accepted it, how it holds us by its anathemas; by its cries of heresy; by its appeal to the lazy, uncreative side of our nature, which is always ready to put the spirit in bondage. Hence the power of tradition, of ecclesiastical and theological authority; the value of holy lands, sacred places, religious pilgrimages, holy days. And hence comes inevitably, for the vast majority of worshippers, the substitution of the form for the reality. The all-important question becomes, Shall one worship in Gerezim or Jerusalem, in a Roman Catholic church or a Protestant meeting house, with this denomination or with that?

In Gerezim or Jerusalem?

To the many Samaritan women (and men too) who are asking this question, the Prophet of the Religion of the Spirit is saying, "There is, of course, a difference between Gerezim and Jerusalem, for the face of Jerusalem is open toward the redemption of the world, though she herself perish—'salvation is from the Jews.' Nevertheless, these distinctions are insignificant and puerile. They are ridiculous in God's eyes. He is spirit, independent of our ecclesiastical forms to which Romanism has tried to bind him, independent of our theologies to which Protestantism has tried to limit him. 'God is spirit,' and his worship consists only in true, spiritual union with himself."

Contrary Currents in this Century.

In this twentieth century of the Christian era, there is a vast unrest in church life. There was never before in the Christian church such prosperity, such missionary enterprise, such evangelistic fervor, such world-embracing programs of propaganda, such insignificant apostacies, such cessation of hostilities between sects. And yet there is universal dissatisfaction with present forms of church life, everywhere indifference to the commands of tradition, silent but widespread contempt for the authority of the priest and the theologian.

Carlos C. Rowlison.

A noted Protestant minister, of New Haven, Conn., a year or so ago expressed his belief that, since Protestantism is proving a failure, therefore some form of Catholicism will be the inevitable ecclesiasticism of the near future. He may be right in his guess of the near future, though I doubt it; but he certainly is wrong in his belief that the adoption of Catholicism will correct the evils of Protestantism. The failure of Protestantism, in so far as it has been a failure, is due solely to the element of Catholicism which it long ago adopted and has clung to fanatically. That element is, its insistance upon authority.

The Spiritual Fathers of Our Age.

The Religion of the Spirit produced Savonarola and John Wycliffe, and Martin Luther and John Wesley and Alexander Campbell and Charles Darwin and Phillips Brooks and their kind. These men are the spiritual fathers of the age in which we are living. Catholicism broke into Protestantism under John Calvin and his scholastic successors, inspiring them to create an authoritative standard for the defeat of Rome. Thus, in order to fight Roman Catholicism, a narrower, harder catholicism was created which has inevitably been the chief factor in creating all our warring, divisive sects. The weakness of Protestantism, as of Romanism, is Catholicism, and correction will come only by transcending this element in both. As Catholicism is everywhere repudiated today in science and philosophy, this repudiation reaching even to the most elementary grade of education, so this age of enlightenment, of the awakened religious consciousness, of a profound devotion to Jesus Christ and his world-ideals, is gradually throwing off the yoke of Catholicism, whether Romanist or Protestant, and is transforming the church into an opportunity for the free worship of God and the whole-hearted service of man, is transforming the priesthood into the prophetic order of the free spirit.

Freedom in Christ.

"For freedom hath Christ set us free"; and never has any age known so well as ours how necessary to the truest life this freedom is. Of course we must beware not to make our freedom a cloak of bondage. Yet we who believe in the Lord Jesus Christ (and who are not?), are called now to the heroic task, not of restoring Catholicism, either Romanist or Protestant, but of building up the church of the free spirit, under the leadership of our supreme Master.

Centennial Studies

By Dr. Errett Gates

The Disciples as Rationalists

The Campbells were born and reared in an "age of reason." During the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries rationalism had dominated both philosophy and theology. It was an all-persuasive spirit which put all systems of thought and activity under homage. Christianity did not escape. The temper of the age demanded that every cause justify itself before the court of reason. The defenders of the Christian religion set about a construction of its doctrines in the forms of the prevailing rationalistic method to satisfy the demand. Both the friends and foes of religion construed Christianity in terms of reason—the one as a vindication of the truth of revelation, the other as a vindication of the sufficiency of reason; the one for the purpose of commending revealed religion, the other for the purpose of supplanting it.

Books of the Age.

It is instructive to scan the titles of books published in the age of reason preceding the opening of the nineteenth century; Toland's "Christianity Not Mysterious"; Tindal's "Christianity as Old as Creation"; Locke's "The Reasonableness of Christianity," and many others of similar import. These books created the atmosphere of religious thought in the midst of which the Campbells grew up. No religious teacher could go far without coming to terms with "right reason" and the "light of nature."

Notice the appeal to reason in the "Declaration and Address." The author professes to base his plea for unity upon "universally acknowledged and self-evident truths," and after laying down thirteen propositions he inquires: "Do they exhibit truths demonstrably evident in the light of scripture and right reason?" He is confident that he has "been happily led to suggest obvious and undeniable truths," and therefore does "not claim the approbation" of his brethren for his plan of union, "further than it carries its own evidence along with it."

But the rationalistic element was not so pronounced in Thomas as in Alexander Campbell, whose influence upon the movement was the greater. He was its theologian in so far as it had a theology; and it was he who impressed his calm rational nature upon the doctrines which have been characteristic of the teaching of the Disciples. In two very notable respects Campbell's teachings disclose rationalistic influence: in his principles and method of biblical interpretation and in his doctrine of spiritual influence.

Rational Interpretation.

1. Concerning the interpretation of scripture he says: "The same philological principles, deduced from the nature of language, or the same laws of interpretation which are applied to the language of other books, are to be applied to the language of the Bible."

The Bible had been treated quite differently in the church down to modern times. It was a magical book, filled with a hidden meaning and a mysterious influence. Only the instructed, or the initiated, or the inspired knew what it meant. A lawless fancy gave it such meaning as the supposed influence of the Spirit upon the mind dictated. Campbell was among the first to declare that in its interpretation it was subject to the natural laws of human language. He gave it historic setting, and implied the presence in it of historic, human coloring. There was diversity of authorship, variation in date and place of composition, which made inevitable a variety and idiosyncracy of ideas. Such was the import of the familiar investigation which, he insisted, must precede any correct understanding of scripture. He says: "On opening any book in the sacred scriptures, consider first the historical circumstances of the book. These are the order, the title, the author, the date, the place, and the occasion of it." "The peculiarities of the author, the age in which he lived, his style, mode of expression, illustrate his writings. The date, place, and occasion of it, are obviously necessary to a right application of everything in the book."

A New Bible.

Such an attitude toward the Bible was new to the general thought of his time and place, and made of it a new and fascinating volume. People went to it with a new interest and found in its reading a new pleasure and profit. Bible reading and study were greatly stimulated by the burning controversy that sprang up wherever the preachers of the movement carried the new ideas. The old position had to be defended and the new position vindicated out of the scriptures. The frankness and courage with which the layman was invited to open and read his Bible, and interpret it as he would any other book, made many friends to the new cause, and contributed in no small measure to its popular success.

Rational Conversion.

2. But it was more particularly in his conception of spiritual influence that Campbell's teachings show the influence of the rationalistic temper of the age.

The prevailing conception of spiritual influence in religious circles was mystical and supernatural. The action of the Holy Spirit in conversion was miraculous, arbitrary, and physical. Sinners were taught to look for marvelous signs as evidences of their regeneration. Conversion was a divine act, accomplished in the soul by a decree of the divine will and under the irresistable workings of the divine power. The soul was helpless in the possession of supernatural powers whose operations were capricious and unnatural.

Spiritual Influence.

But Campbell reduced all spiritual influence to the action of spiritual words, ideas, and truths upon the mind. The process was rational and natural. He says: "Evidence alone produces faith and testimony is all that is necessary to faith." "No person can help believing when the evidence of truth arrests his attention, and without evidence it is as impossible to believe as to bring something out of nothing." The evidence that produces faith are the facts recorded in the Bible. He says: "The purification of our hearts, the refinement of our feelings, the elevation of our character, the reformation of our lives, are the inseparable fruits of the belief of the one fact, 'Jesus is Christ,' upon the evidence contained in the faithful record." "The truth to be believed, however, could never have been known, but by the revelation of the Spirit."

Hence the operation of the Holy Spirit upon the mind and heart was not direct but indirect, not physical or supernatural but moral—through the agency of written words. "In communicating moral influence to men, God uses the same means that men do in communicating moral influence to their kind. He addresses the will, the understanding and the affections, through ideas embodied in words." "No other power than moral power can operate on minds; and this power must always be clothed in words, addressed to the eye or ear." "As the Spirit of man puts forth all its moral power in words which it fills with ideas, so the Spirit of God puts forth all its converting and sanctifying power in the words which it fills with its ideas."

The Scientific Method.

This is a frank recognition, in the spirit of modern science and rationalism, of the presence of secondary causes in divine action—the reduction of God's influence upon man to a normal moral process, as science has reduced his action in nature to a natural process. According to Campbell's conception, God does not violently and lawlessly break in upon a man's spiritual nature, and work a miracle of creation in conversion. But he works in the creation of a saint as in the creation of a tree, according to natural laws and by means of resident forces. The conditions of the process were all subject to control on the human side. Conversion, therefore, depended upon human will and action. Man was no longer a passive subject of supernatural powers in his own regeneration, but an active agent. Whether he was saved or not depended upon himself, not upon God.

This view completely reversed the process as taught from all the pulpits of the time. It was rank heresy. The usual name given to it was Pelagianism; it was but one remove from Unitarianism. Campbell's view was held up to scorn as everything bad, short of atheism. It was declared that he denied the influence of the Spirit in regeneration, and turned God out of the process.

Practical Fruits of the Rational View.

This rational doctrine of conversion was turned to account in an effective evangelism, which brought a steady and increasing stream of recruits to the societies founded by the Campbells and those who held with them. As illustrating the effective use of this rational view of conversion, the following story is told of John Whitacre. "On one occasion he was at a meeting where several persons were gathered at the altar in prayer for a divine power to come down. Among them was a lady of intelligent appearance who evidently was in deep distress. She prayed that God would give her faith, saving faith; that he would help her to believe in Jesus. When she ceased Whitacre spoke to her: 'Madame,' he said, 'What would you give for faith in Mohamet?' 'Nothing,' was her somewhat indignant reply. 'Why not?' he continued. 'Because,' she rejoined, 'I believe him to be an impostor.' 'But why are you so anxious for faith in Jesus Christ?' 'Because,' said she, 'I think he is my only Savior.' 'Well,' said Whitacre, 'Why are you praying for that which you say you have? Why not go forward and obey the gospel and be made free from sin?'"

Great Preachers

By Dr. B. B. Tyler

Six pictures of a half dozen great preachers adorn my room. They represent Henry Ward Beecher, Charles H. Spurgeon, Phillips Brooks, John Hall, Dwight L. Moody, and Joseph Parker.

A friend, himself a preacher, came in the other day and looking at the pictures elicited from me the remark that they were great preachers. To my surprise he indulged in a facial grimace. A shrug of his shoulders, a wave of his hand, accompanied by a verbal explosion, which indicated with no chance for misunderstanding, that he did not consider any one of them a really great preacher. Then I said to myself: How varied are the opinions and convictions of men. Notwithstanding this set-back I still entertain the opinion that the men named were, in the true sense of the word, great preachers.

The World's Great Sermons.

Here are ten volumes from the press of Funk & Wagnalls, containing one hundred or more discourses entitled, "The World's Great Sermons."

These discourses have been selected with unusual care. The compiler says in his preface, that numerous clergymen, publishers, librarians, and others assisted in the work of selection. Dr. Lewis O. Brastow, who has occupied the chair of practical theology in the Yale Divinity School since 1885, wrote an "Introduction." He says that "Professor Kleiser has brought to his task a personal knowledge of homiletic literature that is the product of much observation and study during many years, and an enthusiasm for his work that has been fostered by these intercourses in professional service, with preachers and theological students. He has had the assistance also of men whose acquaintance with homiletic literature is very extensive, whose critical judgments are sound and reliable and who may be regarded as experts in this branch of knowledge."

It would be interesting to hear the choice of sermons in this collection discussed in a meeting of preachers!

From Basil to Jowett.

The first discourse is by Basil, who lived in Capadocia in the fourth century, and the last is by Jowett, who lives in England in the twentieth century. The subject of the initial sermon is "The Creation of the World," and the topic of the final discourse is on "Apostolic Optimism."

These one hundred addresses on sacred themes show the influence of the times on the ministers of the word. And this is as it should be. Great preaching is such a presentation of the truth as fits closely the people in their personal experiences. A great preacher must know the thoughts of his time and place.

The discourse of Basil, surnamed "The Great," excites a smile and this is a personal confession. The sermon by the justly famous Birmingham preacher on "Apostolic Optimism" thrills me. Why? Because optimism is my long suit! Excuse the slang, please.

This leads to the remark that our judgments reveal our temperaments, prejudices, idiosyncrasies, etc. No person can entirely get rid of his personal peculiarities when making a choice, or rendering a decision. When deciding that a preacher, or sermon, is great, or the reverse, every one reveals himself to a degree.

Who Is a Great Preacher?

What constitutes a man a great preacher? What are some of the marks of a great preacher? How may he be known?

Moody was a great preacher, of his kind. Would Mr. Moody have been a great preacher, week after week, year in and year out, in the Fifth Avenue Presbyterian Church, New York, the Plymouth Congregational Church, Brooklyn, or Trinity Episcopal Church, Boston, where Henry Ward Beecher, John Hall, and Phillips Brooks were unquestionably great preachers? On the other hand, would these men have been great before the congregations, or in doing the work of Dwight L. Moody? You see the point?

A great preacher brings things to pass—desirable things. He may preach to large audiences; he may address small congregations; but moral and spiritual results follow his efforts. Beecher, Spurgeon, Brooks, Hall, Moody, Parker, produced tangible and visible results which abide to this day. They preached to great audiences; but a man may be a really great preacher and address small congregations. Assemblies ought to be weighed as well as counted. There have been men who spoke to great crowds; but nothing, or almost nothing, remains as a result of their efforts and splendid opportunities. Was such a man a great preacher? The reader can, if he will, insert the name!

Executive Ability Desirable.

Some of the men whom I have characterized as great preachers possessed also unusual executive ability. Mr. Spurgeon was such a man. It used to be said of Dr. Talmage that he was so lacking in this talent that if three men were to be put to work he could not organize them nor direct their movements. This, of course, was exaggeration. But this was his one weak point and explains why he left no church, nor other institution, as a monument of his life work. Mr. Beecher was not a great organizer; but there were men in Plymouth Church who possessed this ability and used it for the good of the church. Whitefield was, probably, a more popular and stirring preacher than Wesley, but John Wesley possessed executive talent in an extraordinary degree. Moody knew how to put persons, and things, together in a way to secure results. John Hall did a wonderful work with, and for, the Fifth Avenue Church, but he was not above the average in executive talent, and so the tide began to go out some time before he died.

Henry Ward Beecher.

It is extremely interesting to study conspicuous men and seek to discover the secret of this man's success and of that man's failure. It is a profitable exercise, also, as well as interesting.

One of the sermons in the collection of which I have spoken, "The World's Great Sermons," is an address delivered by Alexander Campbell in Cincinnati, before the American Christian Missionary Society at its meetings in 1860 on "The Missionary Cause" from the text, "He that winneth souls is wise," Prov. 11:30.

In the preachers' meeting, alluded to above, there would, almost certainly, be a difference of opinion as to Mr. Campbell's greatest sermon.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

The Correspondence With Z. T. Sweeney Resumed

Dear Brother Willett: I have been absent continuously since your issue of March 20 and today is the first opportunity I have had to consider your last reply to my letter.

In both the index and appendix of your article, you repeat your request that I answer certain questions regarding miracles. It may as well be understood now as any other time, that I have no intention of answering those questions in the course of this controversy. This is not because I am not able to answer them, but because I feel it would shift this discussion from your position on miracles to mine and thus the object aimed at in this discussion would be lost. Almost the first declaration in my first letter, was to say that I wished to give you an opportunity to express to the Brotherhood just what you believed about miracles. I have advanced no revolutionary teaching upon the subject of miracles and you have. I have not been quoted in the newspapers as not believing in miracles, and you have. I have not given any recent confession of my faith, and you have. I am not even under suspicion, and you are. It is therefore your position on miracles that is important and not mine. So we will stick to the original line of the controversy.

This controversy must not be turned aside from its original intent. If you think there is any burning desire on the port of the Brotherhood to know my position on miracles, I will make you this proposition: You are to speak at the General Convention at Pittsburg, next fall, and so am I. I will agree to prepare and deliver a discourse on miracles, setting forth my views on all the questions you have asked, if you will agree to prepare a similar sermon. The Brotherhood at that great convention can have an opportunity to hear us both and judge for themselves concerning our positions.

First: You say, "We are quite agreed on the point that super-natural is not contra-natural, neither capricious nor arbitrary." But, my dear brother, are we agreed also that a miracle is the intervention of a super-natural (as above agreed) power in the realm of natural law? That is the question I have so often asked and that presses for answer, and I sincerely hope you will give me a plain yes or no in your next issue.

Second: You reiterate, that "a miracle is the natural employment of law by one empowered to reach beyond the common powers of man, because of unique and full relations with God," and assert in another place that "Jesus is the only being that ever had this fullness." This makes Jesus the only person ever having power to perform miracles. You seem to overlook the fact that miracles have been performed by various sundry and divers persons in various stages of the world's history. If Jesus performed miracles because of unique and full relations with God, was it not because of unique and full relations with God that Paul performed them? That Peter and John performed them? That Elijah and Balaam's beast performed them? My dear brother, do you mean to say that all these parties performed miracles because of "unique and full relations with God which enabled them to reach beyond the common powers" of man today? There is something radically wrong with your definition or with the Scriptures which record these miracles. They don't agree at all.

Third: You say "If he (I) means that miracle is wrought either in direct violation of law or in accordance with other laws than those by which God is ruling the universe, the opinion is without a shread of evidence, either in Scripture or science." Let us look that in the face a little while. There is not a scientist on the face of this earth that can show a single hint of a law among those by which God is ruling this universe, under the working of which, a man can pass through a furnace of fire, heated to smelting heat, without being burned up. Now, if there is such a law, Brother Willett, rack science or nature to find it. But the Bible tells us that men did pass through such a furnace of fire and came out without the smell of fire on their garments. Now, my dear brother, don't you think God saved those men from destruction by some other law than the laws by which he is ruling this universe? When you limit God to the laws by which he rules this universe, you have the hearty support of every great materialistic scientist on the face of this earth. They say, "Amen" to that. But they also accept the logical consequences of their doctrine and declare that no man ever went through a furnace of fire and came out alive and that is the conclusion to which you must inevitably come. It is logically impossible for you to reach any other conclusion. When you limit God to the laws by which he rules this universe, away goes the story of the fiery furnace, the virgin birth, the resurrection of Jesus from the grave, the testimony of the Father at the baptism of Jesus, the feeding of the five thousand and the walking on the water, with all other miracles of the New Testament. There is no room in the mind of a man for miracles who limits Almighty God to the laws by which he rules this universe.

Again: The laws by which God is ruling this universe are immutable, unchangeable, eternal. Under those laws "Like causes always produce like effects." "Like conditions produce like results." If men passed through a fiery furnace and came out unsinged thousands of years ago by virtue of one of the laws by which God is ruling this universe, they can do the same today, under the same conditions. Do you believe, Brother Willett, there is a law by which God is ruling the universe today under which men can pass through a furnace of fire "heated seven times hotter than smelting heat" and come out without the smell of fire on their garments? If there is no such law today, was there ever one?

Fourth: Again you say, "Still less does the older view of miracles explain miracles. It only falls back upon the assertion that they were wrought by divine power." Well, to my mind, that is a pretty satisfactory explanation. Much more so than to say that they were "the normal activities of a human life at its best." The one traces them to a rational cause, viz: Divine power. The other has not even the shadow of a cause by which to explain the miracle. But this word "explain" is shifting of question. The original expression was "account for" and the expression "account for," the dictionary says is "to trace to some cause or natural law." The old view of miracles traces them to the intervention of a supernatural power in the realm of natural law as a cause. Yours traces them to human activity as a cause. You say, "I entirely agree that if by accounting for a phenomenon, one states a law within whose range the observed facts will fall. The assertion is quite proper." That is very good, let us try it. You say you believe in the virgin birth of Jesus as described by the Evangelists. Will you state "a law within whose range" that fact will fall? You say that you believe in the resurrection of Jesus from the dead. Will you state "a law within whose range" that fact will fall? You say that Jesus walked on the water. Please state "a law within whose range" that fact will fall. Take any other miracle of the New Testament and show that it can be accounted for by coming within the range of some natural law.

Fifth: In answering my number two, you say, "When he (I) asserts there is no scientist to support the theory, I have set forth, he only misses the issue as I know of no scientist who discusses the subject of miracles, do you?" Of course I do and so do you. Scientists often discuss the subject of miracles. Sir Oliver Lodge produced a remarkable work on the subject last year. I did not miss the issue because I did not say what you represent me as saying. I said that no scientist would support you in saying that because men had "close and full spiritual relations with God, they, therefore, had power to use the laws of nature to a greater degree than other men," and I say further that you can't point to a single fact of nature that will support it. Neither is there a single act in all human nature that will support it. Nature yields up her secrets to men who force her doors, regardless of their spiritual relations to God. It was at this point and to enforce this fact, that I used the illustration of my pious neighbor and her worldly minded brother. And I regard it as an exceedingly apt illustration and one that can't be turned aside by a few words. This good woman has twenty times the "spiritual communion and unique fellowship with God" that her worldly-minded brother has, and yet he has fifty times the power to control the forces of nature that she has. Now, if the spiritual fellowship with God, "therefore," gives power over the forces of nature, why does not this good sister have more power than her brother? I hope you will tell us in your next, Brother Willett, why she doesn't have it.

Sixth: You say, "My objection to the word "visitant" applied to Jesus is that it is unbiblical; that it assumes he was but a messenger sent with a divine message." The word "Visitant" may be unbiblical, but it is your word, my dear brother, and not mine. You introduced it into this discussion. You object to it because "it assumes that Jesus Christ was a messenger sent with a divine message." That is exactly the reason why I like the word. If Jesus was not a messenger sent with a divine message, what was he doing here anyhow? Why did he come into existence more than any other human being? And furthermore, what does he mean when he says, "The spirit of the Lord is upon me, because he hath annointed me to preach the gospel to the poor; he hath sent me to heal the broken hearted; to preach deliverance to the captives; the recovering of sight to the blind; to set at liberty them that are bruised." Again he says, "He that receiveth you, receiveth me, and he that receiveth me, receiveth him that sent me." Now my dear brother, I could quote Scripture like that by the square yard to show that Jesus was a messenger and sent with a divine message. The Scriptures that I quoted in my former letter set forth certain great facts, among which are the following:

First, "He had glory with the Father before the world was."

Second, "The Father loved him before the foundation of the world."

Third, "He came down from Heaven."

Fourth, "He came into the world from the Father."

Fifth, "He ascended up where he was before."

These facts cannot be waived aside by an interpretation of what is meant in other passages by the word "world." They state clear fundamental facts. They are either true or false. If they are true, Jesus was a visitant to this world, bearing the supernatural character of heaven, sent as a divine messenger to bring a divine message. And yet, my dear brother, that is the very thing you say, "must be given up to meet the demands of modern thinking." If we have to give that up, why not give it all up, and be done with it.

Seventh: In my former letter I showed ten or fifteen cases where people believed in him directly, because of miracles which he did. Your reply to that fact is, "The difficulty with this faith was that it was too partial and superficial to be permanent and trustworthy." How did you find that out? Is there anything in the record that will justify you in speaking thus slightingly of the faith of these good people? I think not. If there is, I would like to have you cite me to it, for I never was good at guessing at things. The trouble with the faith of all the early disciples was that it was partial and superficial. So with us of today. It would be interesting to know what those disciples would say about your faith on miracles. After they had seen all his miracles and heard all his teachings, they all forsook him and fled. But there is nothing in the record to show that the faith of the parties I mentioned was more superficial than any of the rest of the disciples.

Eighth: You say, "In fact nowhere is it asserted or even hinted that the purpose of miracles was to produce faith," and yet in the very next sentence you say that miracles "were evidences of his divine authority and mission." Now, my dear brother, I wish you had not made both of these statements, for they are directly contradictory. What are "evidences" for, unless they are "to produce faith?" I will give you leave to take one of those statements back and I prefer that you take the first one back, because that is the one that is not true, and I will prove it to you out of the mouth of Jesus, himself. When John sent to inquire of him whether he was the Christ or they should look for another, he replied, "Go your way and tell John what things ye have seen and heard; how the blind see, the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, the deaf hear and the dead are raised." Now did not Jesus mean that John should believe in him as the Christ when he should learn of these miracles? If he did, how can you say that "it is not hinted that the purpose of the miracles was to produce faith?" Again: "The very works that I do bear witness of me that the Father hath sent."

Now, Brother Willett, let us have a little more directness in this correspondence. There has been too much "firing at long range." I began this correspondence to open up the way for you to express yourself fully and freely on miracle. If that is not done, it shall not be my fault. I propose to summarize the contents of this letter in a few questions.

First: Do you believe that a miracle is the intervention of a supernatural power in the realm of natural law, granting that supernatural is not contranatural?

Second: Do you believe that Paul, Peter, John, Elisha and Balaam's beast were, because of unique and full relations with God, enabled to reach beyond the common powers of men today?

Third: Do you believe that there is a law among those by which God is ruling this universe, under the working of which human beings can pass through a fiery furnace seven times heated and come out alive?

Fourth: Do you believe there ever was such a law?

Fifth: Do you believe such a transaction ever occurred?

Sixth: Do you believe the virgin birth and the resurrection of Jesus from the grave fall "within the range" of one of the laws by which God is ruling this universe?

Seventh: Do you believe that a person who has a close spiritual fellowship with God, "therefore," has power to use the forces of nature to a greater degree than one who has not such fellowship?

Eighth: Do you believe that the five facts stated categorically in my number six in this article are facts?

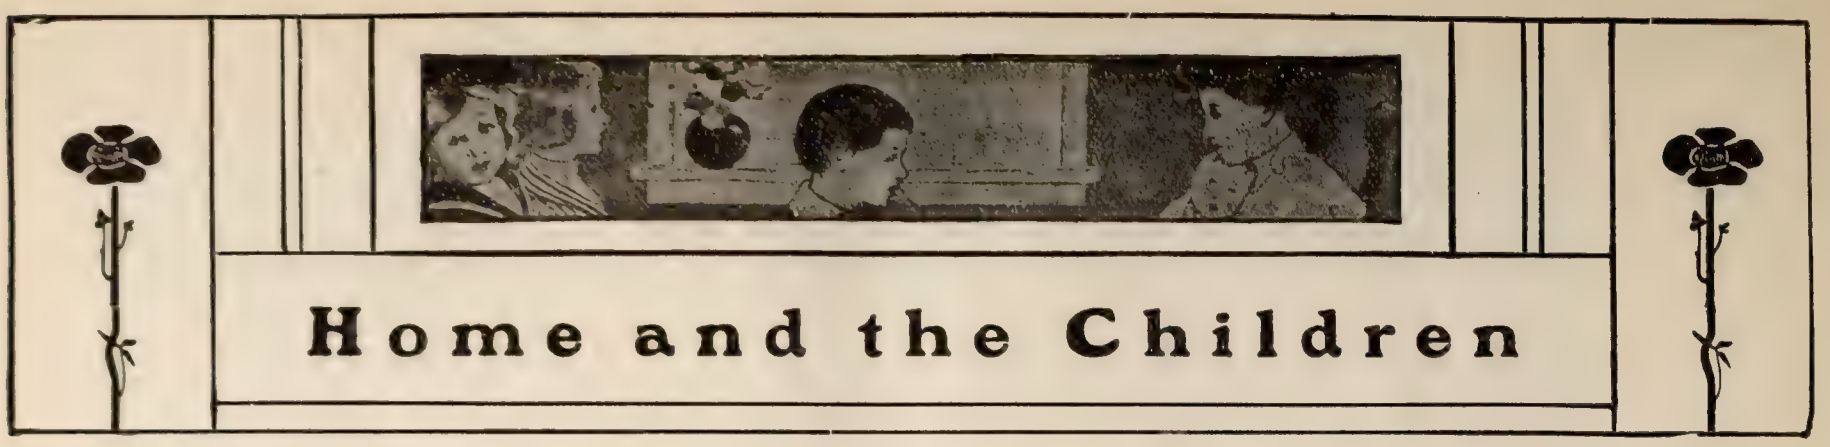
Ninth: Do you believe that Jesus intended John should believe that he was the Christ, when John should hear the marvelous miracles Jesus had done?

Now, my dear brother, the above questions bear directly on the issue in this correspondence. They can each be answered by a single word, but I will not ask you to do that. What I wish you to do and what your readers wish you to do is to answer them plainly and unequivocally. This will clear matters up in the minds of many that have been reading after us.

Let me in conclusion commend to you the language of Jehovah to Job, "Gird up now thy loins like a man, for I will demand of thee, and declare thou unto me."

Sincerely and fraternally,
Z. T. Sweeney.

The length to which Brother Sweeney's paper runs makes impossible any lengthy rejoinder. Fortunately no such response is required. Brother Sweeney attempts to justify his refusal to define his position on miracle by the statement that this position is not in question. Two things need to be said on that point. First, it is the first instance I have ever known in which one of the parties in what is supposed to be a candid and clear discussion of religious views declined to define the terms he is constantly using. Second, Brother Sweeney's attitude, or what his readers have the right to assume as his attitude, on the subject of miracle is the very one that is under fire where it has not already been discredited by students of the subject. I should be the last to believe that Brother Sweeney is unable to define his terms, or that he is unwilling to commit himself to any definite statement on the matter. But to have answered my questions, as I have answered his, would have been to keep to the central issue, and not waste time in mere digressions. His suggestion regarding the Pittsburg convention is somewhat diverting to anyone with a sense of humor, and it was perhaps on this humorous side of his genial personality that the idea presented itself. Surely Brother Sweeney would not concede that he stands in need of any such publicity as a debate on miracles would offer to secure the hearing at the convention to which his merits and popularity entitle him.



In his first articles Brother Sweeney assumed or intimated that miracle was contranatural, an "intervention" in the process of God's orderly rule of the universe through law. This I denied. Then he conceded in his last discussion of the matter, the fact that miracle is not contrary to law, and therefore not capricious or arbitrary, but is in accordance with a "higher law." I hailed this as a distinct advance toward clearness of thinking and definition. In the present paper, however, he appears to return to his first ground, not only in the long series of questions which he accumulates, but distinctly in his inquiry, "Are we agreed that a miracle is the intervention of a supernatural power in the realm of natural law?" Brother Sweeney knows very well that I do not accept any such view. More than this it is at distinct variance with his own statement regarding the "higher law." My own definition has been given repeatedly. Stated as I have stated it, it accounts in the fullest manner for the miracles of our Lord and the apostles, and these miracles give ample ground for the testing of the definition, without widening the discussion by appeal to the Old Testament whose narratives of miracle range all the way from authentic fact to parable, allegory and figures of speech. The power to work miracles resided in unique personalities, in such conscious unity with God that they possessed powers, passed through experiences, and performed works impossible to natures less competent. Every miracle of the life of our Lord, from birth to resurrection is within the range of this principle, our ignorance of the process is one of the essential elements in the occurrences, which made them miracles and not common events.

The view that it is not inconsistent with God's nature and purposes that he should reverse, disregard or violate the very laws by which he is ruling the universe in harmony and beauty, in order to give arbitrary attestation to religious truth whose very foundation is the unchanging and orderly divine life, is rightfully and inevitably yielding to the satisfying belief that nature has not revealed her full powers to us as yet, but that in the measure of our approach to God in knowledge and character those mysteries are disclosed. There are levels of law to which we have not yet come. Approaches have been made at times, and most fully in the life of Jesus. But in no instance need we suppose these events whose uniqueness justifies the words "miracle," "sign," "wonder" to have been violations of law or interventions. They were the natural activities of fuller, more perfect lives. I know of no event in the life of Jesus as recorded in the gospels for which this principle does not fully account. The new facts which nature constantly reveals, the new and startling powers daily disclosed, make men of scientific temper increasingly modest in discussing the boundaries of nature and of law. These facts give us hints, remote indeed, and imperfect, yet significant, regarding those marvelous facts in our Saviour's life which have found record in the gospels. The more we study that life the more natural, quiet, commanding it becomes, a life supreme in virtue not of strangeness and distance, but rather of the perfection of its touch with nature and with God.

The purpose of the miracles of Jesus requires but a word. I pointed out two facts regarding these works of power, first that they produced faith of a certain sort in the witnesses and cited passages to illustrate this fact, with the additional remark that many others might be quoted; second, that Jesus knew the unsubstantial character of this faith, and did not depend upon it for character, and therefore did not work miracles with the object of converting men. This was the temptation constantly thrust upon him, but one which he resisted to the end. Brother Sweeney cites additional passages, which are convincing on the first point, but valueless to disprove the second.

I should be glad to take space to answer

A Laborer's Spring Song

By Ophelia M. Tracy.

Little birdie, sing to me;
I am lonely, as can be!
Tell me of the fields of grain,
How they woo the sun and rain!

I will toss you crumbs to eat,
If you'll lend your voice so sweet,
For I live apart from ease,
Barred from brooks and leafy trees.

So confined in walls am I!
With its patch, of street, and sky!
Dust, and smoke! And glaring heat!
And noise of busy crowded street!

Thus I'm held from morn till night!
Close, in city walls, so tight!
I'm a prisoner! You are free!
Come then, birdie, sing to me!

Tell me of the woods so gay!
With cool hollows, hid away!
Tell me of their friends, the flowers,
Hid in shady, deep-green bowers!

Why they hide in woods so deep;
Why such secret silence keep;
When their beauty, each one knows,
Is not far behind the rose.

Do they weep, when there alone,
Tears of dew, to most winds' moan?
Sin and sorrow have they known?
Hide and weep they, to atone?

Tell me of these flowers so wild!
Each seems nature's favorite child!
Why do moss and wild-rose sweet,
Shun the crowded, city street?

Why the modest blue-bell, blue,
Hides its pretty face from view?
Why the vines, and graceful fern,
Love the solid oak so stern?

Why the tender, graceful vine,
Round the hard, old oak doth twine?
Hiding branches, rough and bare,
With a dress of green, most fair!

Tell me what the birdies say,
As they woo their mates, each day?
What they name their birdies wee,
In their nests high in the tree?

Birdies must have names most sweet;
Names Dan Cupid cannot beat,
For they have such cunning feet;
Little wings and breasts, so neat.

Tell me what you birdies sing,
As you fly through space, on wing?
Sing to me a song so gay;
For this is a glad, spring day!

Little birdie, sing to me!
I am lonely, as can be!
For I'm held, from morn till night,
Close, in city walls, so tight!

I will toss you crumbs to eat,
If you'll lend your voice so sweet,
For I live apart from ease,
Barred from brooks and laughing trees!

So confined in walls am I,
With its patch of street and sky,
Dust and smoke and glaring heat,
And hum-drum noise of hum-drum street!

I'm a prisoner! You are free!
Come then birdie, sing to me!

Give Limpy a Chance

"Here, boy, let me have a paper."

"Can't."

"Why not? I heard you crying them loud enough to be heard at the city hall."

"Yes, but that was down t' other block, ye know, where I hollered."

"What does that matter? Come now, no fooling. I'm in a hurry."

"Couldn't sell you a paper on this here block, mister, 'cause it b'longs to Limpy. He's just at the furdest end now. You'll meet him."

"And who is Limpy? And why does he have this block?"

"Cos us other kids agreed to let him have it. Ye see, it's a good run, 'count of the offices all along, and the poor chap is that lame he can't git around lively like the rest of us, so we agreed that the first one caught sellin' on his beat should be thrashed. See?"

"Yes, I see. You have a sort of brotherhood among yourselves."

"Well, we're goin' to look out for a little cove that's lame, anyhow."

"There comes Limpy now. He's a fortunate boy to have such friends."

The gentleman bought two papers of him and went on his way down town, wondering how many men in business would refuse to sell their wares in order to give a weak, halting brother a chance in the field.—The Watchman.

How Birds Dress

Birds think a good deal about their dress and are careful to keep themselves tidy and in good order.

Of course their fashions differ because birds themselves differ, but they do not change. A robin today dresses just as her grandmother did, and none of her neighbors would dream of calling her old-fashioned.

Neither do birds have many suits. Two a year are quite sufficient for most of them and many are content with only one.

As a rule the gentlemen dress more gaily than their mates though they spend less time upon their toilets.

Just watch your canary after he has had his daily bath. See how each separate feather is cleaned, pulled and looked over, and how all the loose ones are taken out and dropped.

All this is done by the bill, for a bird's neck is so flexible that it can be turned in all directions, but the bill cannot reach the head, and so Mr. Canary uses his foot.

With it he combs his hair, first on one side, and then on the other, scratching very fast, as if to get all tangles out. Then he uses his hair oil, for, although complexion powders are not known in the bird world, hair oil certainly is. Ladies and gentlemen alike carry it about with them. They have a little pouch or sack on the back near the tail for the purpose. When Madam Bird wishes to use it, she squeezes it out with her beak, just as you would press a rubber bulb; then she lays the oil on her back, just above her wings, and rubs her head against it, turning her neck in all directions until every feather in her head is straight and shining.—Selected.

George's Queer May Basket

By Sarah N. McCreery.

"I thought you promised me you would be careful if I let you wear your new shoes," said Mrs. Lane to her son. George looked ruefully at his mud-bespattered shoes. "If I had rubber boots, like the other boys have, it wouldn't hurt if I did get muddy. Can't I have a pair, mother, please?" "No, George, we can't afford to get them just now, besides you are always wanting something. First it was the skates, then a football. If you had the boots you would soon be wanting something else."

"If I had rubber boots I don't believe I would want a thing for a whole year." said George solemnly. "If I saved up my money could I buy them?"

"Yes, if you save the money you may have a pair," was the answer. Mrs. Lane knew that George wanted boots very much if he would save money for them, for "saving money" was not one of his strong points. "I will spend it just this once," he always said, and as a result his bank never had a penny in it.

From that day George talked and dreamed rubber boots. As the weeks went by the "boots" fund grew slowly. Every few days he made a visit to Vincent's shoe store, and gazed in admiration at a pair of boy's rubber boots. One day he ventured to ask the price, and when the clerk said three dollars the boots looked very far away. He felt better when he counted his money, and found he had one-third the amount.

The last of April came, and George decided he would not hang May baskets, for if he did he would have to part with his precious pennies to buy them. He would give Dorothy Cline one, of course, he could not slight her. He share everything with Dorothy Cline because she lived next door. On May Day eve, George hung his one basket and then went home. He wandered around restlessly for he was lonesome. His boy friends were out having a good time, but he wouldn't go without having baskets. He was wondering whether it paid to give up all the fun for the sake of having rubber boots, when the door-bell rung. George opened it and there was a big bundle hanging on the knob. He brought the bundle in, and found his name on it. "It looks like I had a May basket, mother," he called gaily.

When he opened the paper, he didn't find a basket filled with flowers, but a pair of rubber boots. A note was pinned to them which said, "Donald West left these boots when he visited me. He don't care for them, so you may have them. I hope they will be a good fit. Aunt Alice." "That's a queer May basket, isn't it?" Mrs. Lane remarked, as George looked at the boots in happy surprise.

"Queer? I don't think so, I call it a fine one. The boots are almost new," and he danced around in glee. "Mother," he said a minute later, "you know Miss Chase gave us those boxes for our Children's Day money last Sunday. She asked us to try to put in a nickel a week. The money is to be sent to a kindergarten in Japan. I didn't see how I could save money for two things, but now it's all settled. I didn't feel good about keeping all my money for boots, but I didn't want to give any away."

Mrs. Lane smiled at the happy face. "I am glad the boots came, if they will help my boy to be unselfish," she said. George ran upstairs to put in his first nickel. "Mother," he said earnestly when he came down, "I am going to put in an extra ten cents to show that I am thankful for the boots. 'Be ye therefore thankful,' it says on the box."

"I think that is a splendid plan," responded his mother, "I couldn't have thought of a better one myself."—The Advance.

Woman's Sphere

—Mrs. Helen D. Longstreet, widow, of the confederate general and postmistress at Gainesville, fought a duel with a man whom she discovered in her home about two o'clock in the morning. The man escaped after an exchange of shots.

—The Misses Deering of Chicago whose father used to have considerable to do with binders, mowers, etc., much to his financial benefit, have been on a trip around the world. While in India a prince of the country proposed marriage to the young ladies and was promptly turned down according to report. There must be a mistake somewhere.

—Mrs. Marion Crawford, widow of the novelist, has removed to Naples, where she will reside with her married daughter, Signora Pietro Rocca. Under the terms of Mr. Crawford's will his library and his manuscripts go to his son Harold. His son Bertie receives the greater part of the estate, and will devote himself to commerce.

—A member of the English nobility said something about American heiresses who marry titles, that although truthful was not very complimentary, the other day. King Edward made him apologize. The English ruler does not propose to have the "goose" that lays the golden egg handed any rough talk.

—Chicago's first policewoman is Miss Josie E. Sullivan. She is a "special" and has all the powers, privileges and duties of a "regular." Her beat is limited to the State street department stores. Miss Sullivan will be provided with a star, whistle, and a patrol box key. She has been an employe of a detective agency for six years.

—Miss Gertrude Mac Arthur, daughter of Rev. Dr. Robert F. MacArthur, pastor of Calvary Baptist Church in New York, has been appointed a teacher of English in the Peeress' school, in Tokyo, Japan, according to a letter her father has just received from her. In this school the young daughter of the mikado is a student. It is for the exclusive education of the daughters of the nobility of Japan.

—One of the most talked about actresses of the day who came to this country poor and unknown fifteen years ago has given it out that she is to retire. Her investments, it is said, are worth $1,000,000. With all the human nature that most people are afflicted with she advises women not to go on the stage. A queer line of talk from a woman who has made a big fortune in the business.

—It is said that the mother of the deposed Sultan, Abdul Hamid, was an Armenian slave girl.

—The new Sultan of Turkey has two wives who are said to be educated and who dress in French fashion.

—Mrs. Carrie Chapman Catt of New York has been re-elected president of the Woman's International Suffrage alliance without a dissenting vote.

—Mrs. G. W. Wilson of Philadelphia (she and Mrs. Tuttle of Naugatuck, Connecticut, and Mrs. T. Fielden of Tadcaster, England, are about the only well-known women Orchid Fanciers in the world) is continually increasing her possessions. She began by purchasing the A. R. Smith and the Erastus Corning collections, the latter of which was gathered at an expense of $500,000 for four thousand plants.

—Mrs. Ruth Bryan Leavitt, eldest daughter of William J. Bryan, and the president of the Jane Jefferson club of Denver, will deliver an address at the state meeting of Jane Jefferson clubs next July on the upbuilding of the Democratic party from the feminine point of view.

—Commander Miss Booth, dressed in the costume of a London flower girl, talked to a large audience in Orchestra Hall, Chicago. Miss Booth told of her work in the slums of London and Paris and said that love, sympathy, sacrifice and action were the four essentials of a mission worker's spiritual equipment.

—Florence Nightingale has just entered her ninetieth year. It is only the older persons who remember her great services in the Crimean War and at later times. She was really the pioneer of trained army nursing. The British people raised a fund of $250,000 for her, which she used in founding a training home for nurses. She was frequently consulted with regard to the location of camp hospitals in our Civil War. At one time her name was a household word, and was a common subject of reference in patriotic speeches.

How the Boy Was Saved

BY B. B. LINDSEY
Judge of the Juvenile Court of Denver.

Shameful to relate, he was in jail. A strange place for a twelve-year-old boy with a soul and heart.

The jailer had telephoned me one cold, wintry night that the boy was in a spasm crying, and had so alarmed him that he urged me to come at once. I grabbed my coat and hat and went out into the night, feeling that the pitiless beat of the sleety rain was ever kinder than a criminal law that condemns little children to crime and iron cells. But this was before the fight against the jail was fought and won. This was before love and firmness had supplanted hatred and degradation.

Behind iron bars that would shame the king tiger of the jungle I found the boy. He was sleeping, and you would have thought not a care had ever visited that little tousled head, with its worn and tear-stained face. But he wakened, startled by the grating of iron bolts and bars, and clinking of great keys turning in their solemn, monotonous locks, as the jailer, leaving me alone with the boy, returned from the cell back into the dimly-lighted corridor.

The boy frightened at these strange surroundings, looked at his new cell mate at first cautiously—almost fearfully. Then a look of joy and gladness came to his eyes, as might come from the captive at the approach of deliverance. The boy knew me, for he had been a chronic little truant, and there may have been worse things, but they may be left unsaid, for it was the boy, and not the "things," we were trying to redeem.

I sat down in the cell on the iron floor and put my arm around the boy. I told him how much I thought of him, and how much I despised the bad things he did. Yet what could I do if he did not help me? I might help him; but I could not carry him; I would always be his friend, but he was getting both himself and me in trouble if he "swiped things," for if I should let him out and he "swiped things" again, would not the officer say that the judge made a mistake in not sending "that kid to the State Industrial school, where he would not have a chance to swipe things"? Then they would say both judge and the boy should be in jail. How could he expect a judge to keep his job if his boys did such things? He saw the point, and, standing upright there in the cell, the light in his eyes speaking better than his words, the earnestness of his promise to "stay wid yer, judge," as he tearfully declared he would never get me into any trouble and we would both keep out of jail.

And so I almost as tearfully accepted his proffered protection, and out of the jail we walked together into the now raging storm. And yet, it was no such storm as had raged in that boy's life—a home blighted by a father who had deserted and trodden under foot every vow he took at the marriage altar. And so a father's care, the divine birthright of every child, had been denied him. The boy was not bad. His opportunity had been poor; his environment was bad. I took him home to his mother, a poor, struggling woman deserving of a better fate than to toil all day to feed and clothe her hungry children. A child with no father and a mother, however noble, who under such handicaps and difficulties tries to perform the functions of both, generally fails to perform that of either. Is it a wonder, then, that the child is not "brought up in the way it should go"? Is it the child's fault? If not, why then the jail and degradation?

The boy returned to school. He brought good reports for over two years, and with them he brought joy and gladness. We had, in a poor way, tried to supply what was lacking in his little life, but to do this well a spark had to be struck somewhere, or a heart-string had to be sounded that would respond.

One day his mother came at the end of a weary, toilsome day to tell me that Harry was a changed boy. She told me how thoughtful and loving he was, and that once when she had been sick he had, with the tenderness of a woman, waited on her and given up all the pleasures of the street. Finally the tears came into her eyes, and she said: "Judge, I never knew just why Harry changed so much till one day while I was ill, and he had been so sweet and kind, I asked him how it was he became good for the judge, and looking up into my face with a tear in his eye, he said: 'Well, mother, you see, it's this way: if I ever gits bad, or swipes things again, the judge—the judge will lose his job—see?—and he is my friend—he is—and I am goin' to stay wid him.'"—Journal of Education.

Elissca

Elissca dear she smiles so sweet,
And works hard, all the day.
Said mamma: "With a girl like this,
We need no flowers in May."

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XVIII.
Under Test.

The prairie lay dim and shadowy in the creeping dust when Winston sat on a red-wood stringer near the head of his partly-finished bridge. There was no sound from the hollow behind him but the faint gurgle of the creek, and the almost imperceptible vibration of countless minute wings. The birches which climbed the slope to it wound away sinuously, a black wall on either hand, and the prairie lying gray and still stretched back into the silence in front of him. Here and there a smoldering fire showed dully red on the brink of the ravine, but the tired men who had lighted them were already wrapped in heavy slumber.

The prairie hay was gathered, harvest had not come, and for the last few weeks Winston, with his hired men from the bush of Ontario, had toiled at the bridge with a tireless persistency which had somewhat astonished the gentlemen farmers of Silverdale. They, however, rode over now and then, and most cheerfully rendered what assistance they could, until it was time to return for tennis or a shooting sweepstake, and Winston thanked them gravely, even when he and his Ontario axmen found it necessary to do the work again. He could have told nobody why he had undertaken to build the bridge, which could be of no use to him, but he was in a measure prompted by instincts born in him, for he was one of the Englishmen who, with a dim recognition of the primeval charge to subdue the earth and render it fruitful, gravitate to the newer lands, and unusually leave their mark upon them. He had also a half-defined notion that it would be something he could leave behind in reparation, that the men of Silverdale might remember more leniently the stranger who had imposed on them while in the strain of the mental struggle strenuous occupation was a necessity to him.

A bundle of papers it was now too dim to see lay beside him clammy with the dew, and he sat bare-headed, staring across the prairie with an ironical smile in his eyes. He had planned boldly and striven tirelessly, and now the fee he could not take would surely be tendered him. Wheat was growing dearer every day, and such crops as he had sown had not been seen at Silverdale. Still, the man, who had had few compunctions before he met Maud Barrington, knew now that in a little while he must leave all he had painfully achieved behind. What he would do then he did not know, for only one fact seemed certain—in another four months, or less, he would have turned his back on Silverdale.

Presently, however, the sound of horse-hoofs caught his ears, and he stood up when a mounted figure rose out of the prairie. The moon had just swung up, round and coppery, from behind a rise, and when horse and rider cut black and sharp against it his pulses throbbed faster and a little flush crept into his face, for he knew every line of the figure in the saddle. Some minutes had passed when Maud Barrington rode slowly to the head of the bridge, and pulled up her horse at the sight of him.

The moon turning silver now shone behind her head, and a tress of hair sparkled beneath her white hat, while the man had a glimpse of the gleaming whiteness of rounded cheek and neck. Her face he could not see, but shapely shoulders, curve of waist, and sweeping line of the light habit were forced up as in a daguerreotype, and as the girl sat still looking down on him, slender, lissom, dainty, etherealized almost by the brightening radiance, she seemed to him a visionary complement of the harmonies of the night. It also appeared wiser to think of her as such than a being of flesh and blood whom he had wildly ventured to long for, and he almost regretted when her first words dispelled the illusion.

"It is dreadfully late," she said. "Pluto went very lame soon after I left Macdonald's, and I knew that if I went back for another horse he would have insisted on riding home with me. I had slipped away while he was in the granary. One can cross the bridge?"

"Not mounted!" said Winston. "There are only a few planks between the stringers here and there, but, if you don't mind waiting, I can lead your horse across."

He smiled a little, for the words seemed trivial and out of place in face of the effect the girl's appearance had on him, but she glanced at him questioningly.

"No!" she said. "Now, I would have gone round by the old bridge, only that Allardyce told me you let him ride across this afternoon."

"Still," and the man stopped a moment, "it was daylight then, you see."

Maud Barrington laughed a little, for his face was visible and she understood the slowness of his answer. "Is that all? It is moonlight now."

"No," said Winston dryly, "but one is apt to make an explanation too complete occasionally. Will you let me help you down?" down?"

Maud Barrington held out her hands, and when he swung her down watched him tramp away with the horse, with a curious smile. A light compliment seldom afforded her much pleasure, but the man's grim reserve had now and then piqued more than her curiosity, though she was sensible that the efforts she occasionally made to uncover what lay behind it were not without their risk. Then he came back, and turned to her very gravely.

"Let me have your hand," he said.

Maud Barrington gave it to him, and hoped the curious little thrill that ran through her when his hard fingers closed upon her palm did not communicate itself to him. She also noticed that he moved his head sharply a moment, and then looked straight in front again. Then the birches seemed to fall away beneath them, and they moved out across the dim gully with the loosely-laid planking rattling under their feet, until they came to a strip scarcely three feet wide which spanned a gulf of blackness in the shadow of the trees.

"Hold fast!" said Winston, with a trace of hoarseness. "You are sure you feel quite steady?"

"Of course!" said the girl, with a little laugh, though she recognized the anxiety in his voice, and felt his hand close almost cruelly on her own. She was by no means timorous, and still less fanciful, but when they moved out into the blackness that closed about them above and beneath along the slender strip of swaying timber she was glad of the masterful grip. It seemed in some strange fashion portentious, for she felt that she would once more be willing to brave unseen perils, secure only in his guidance. What he felt she did not know, and was sensible of an almost overwhelming curiosity, until when at last well-stiffened timber lay beneath them, she contrived to drop a glove just where the moonlight smote the bridge. Winston stooped, and his face was clear in the silvery light when he rose again. Maud Barrington saw the relief in it, and compelled by some influence stood still looking at him with a little glow behind the smile in her eyes. A good deal was revealed to both of them in that instant, but the man dare not admit, and was master of himself.

"Yes," he said, very simply, "I am glad you are across."

Maud Barrington laughed. "I scarcely fancy the risk was very great, but tell me about the bridge," she said. "You are living beside it?"

"Yes," said Winston. "In a tent. I must have it finished before harvest, you see!"

The girl understood why this was necessary, but deciding that she had on other occasions ventured sufficiently far with that topic, moved on across the bridge.

"A tent," she said, "cannot be a very comfortable place to live in, and who cooks for you?"

Winston smiled dryly. "I am used to it, and can do all the cooking that is necessary," he said. "It is the usual home for the beginner, and I lived six months in one—on grindstone bread, the tinctured glucose you are probably not acquainted with as 'drips,' and rancid pork—when I first came out to this country and hired myself for ten dollars monthly, to another man. It is a diet one gets a little tired of occasionally, but after breaking prairie twelve hours every day one can eat almost anything, and when I afterwards turned farmer my credit was rarely good enough to provide the pork."

The girl looked at him curiously, for she knew how some of the smaller settlers lived, and once more felt divided between wonder and sympathy. She could picture the grim self-denial, for she had seen the stubborn patience in this man's face, as well as a stamp that was not borne by any other man at Silverdale. Some of the crofter settlers, who periodically came near starvation in their sod hovels, and the men from Ontario who periodically came near starvation in the first wheat crop to be wrested from the prairie, bore it, however. From what Miss Barrington had told her, it was clear that Courthorne's first year in Canada could not have been spent in this fashion, but there was no doubt in the girl's mind as she listened. Her faith was equal to a more strenuous test.

"There is a difference in the present, but who taught you bridge-building? It takes years to learn the use of the ax," she said.

Winston laughed. "I think it took me four, but the man who has not a dollar to spare usually finds out how to do a good many things for himself, and I had working drawings of the bridge made in Winnipeg. Besides, your friends have helped me with their hands as well as their good-will. Except at the beginning, they have all been kind to me, and one could not well have expected very much from them then."

Maud Barrington colored a trifle as she remembered her own attitude towards him. "Cannot you forget it?" she said, with a curious little ring in her voice. "They would do anything you asked them now."

"One generally finds it useful to have a good memory, and I remember most clearly that, although they had very little reason for it, most of them afterwards trusted me. That made, and still makes, a great difference to me."

The girl appeared thoughtful. "Does it?" she said. "Still, do you know, I fancy that if they had tried to drive you out, you would have stayed in spite of them?"

"Yes," said Winston dryly. "I believe I would, but the fact that in a very little while they held out a friendly hand to a stranger steeped in suspicion, and gave him the chance to prove himself their equal, carries a big responsibility. That, and your aunt's goodness, puts so many things one might have done out of the question."

The obvious inference was that the prodigal had been reclaimed by the simple means of putting him on his honor, but that did not for a moment suggest itself to the girl. She had often regretted her own disbelief and once more felt the need for reparation.

"Lance," she said, very quietly, "my aunt was wiser than I was, but she was mistaken. What she gave you out of her wide charity was already yours by right."

That was complete and final, for Maud Barrington did nothing by half, and Winston recognized that she had held him blameless in the past, which she could not know, as well as in the present, which was visible to her. Her confidence stung him as a whip, and when in place of answering he looked away, the girl fancied that a smothered groan escaped him. She waited, curiously expectant, but he did not speak, and just then the fall of hoofs rose from behind the birches in the bluff. Then a man's voice came through it singing a little French song, and Maud Barrington glanced at her companion.

"Lance," she said, "how long is it since you sang that song?"

"Well," said Winston, doggedly conscious of what he was doing, "I do not know a word of it, and never heard it in my life."

Maud Barrington stared at him. "Think," she said. "It seems ever so long ago, but you cannot have forgotten. Surely you remember Madame Aubert, who taught me to prattle in French, and the day you slipped into the music-room and picked up the song, while she tried in vain to teach it me. Can't you recollect how I cried, when you sang it in the billiard-room, and Uncle Geoffrey gave you the half-sovereign which had been promised to me?"

"No," said Winston, a trifle hoarsely, and with his head turned from her watched the trail.

A man in embroidered deerskin jacket was riding into the moonlight, and though the little song had ceased, and the wide hat hid his face, there was an almost insolent gracefulness in his carriage that seemed familiar to Winston. It was not the abandon of the swashbuckler stock-rider from across the frontier, but something more finished and distinguished that suggested the bygone cavalier. Maud Barrington, it was evident, also noticed it.

"Geoffrey Courthorne rode as that man does," she said. "I remember hearing my mother once tell him that he had been born too late, because his attributes and tastes would have fitted him to follow Prince Rupert."

Winston made no answer, and the man rode on until he drew bridle in front of them. Then he swung his hat off, and while the moonlight shone into his face looked down with a little ironical smile at the man and woman standing beside the horse. Winston closed one hand a trifle, and slowly straightened himself, feeling that there was need of all his self-control, for he saw his companion glance at him, and then almost too steadily at Lance Courthorne.

The latter said nothing for a space of seconds, for which Winston hated him, and yet in the tension of the suspense he noticed that the signs of indulgence he had seen on the last occasion were plainer in Courthorne's face. The little bitter smile upon his lips was also not quite in keeping with the restlessness of his fingers upon the bridle.

"Is that bridge fit for crossing, farmer?" he asked.

"Yes," said Winston quietly. "You must lead your horse."

Maud Barrington had in the meanwhile stood very still, and now moved as by an effort. "It is time I rode on, and you can show the stranger across," she said. "I have kept you at least five minutes longer than was necessary."

Courthorne, Winston fancied, shifted one foot from the stirrup, but then sat still as the farmer held his hand for the girl to mount by, while when she rode away he looked at his companion with a trace of anger as well as irony in his eyes.

"Yes," said Winston. "What you heard was correct. Miss Barrington's horse fell lame coming from one of the farms, which accounts for her passing here so late. I had just led the beast across the incompleted bridge. Still, it is not on my account I tell you this. Where have you been and why have you broken one of my conditions?"

Courthorne laughed. "It seems to me you are adopting a somewhat curious tone. I went to my homestead to look for you."

"You have not answered my other question, and in the meanwhile I am your tenant, and the place is mine."

"We really needn't quibble," said Courthorne. "I came for the very simple reason that I wanted money."

"You had one thousand dollars," said Winston dryly.

Courthorne made a little gesture of resignation. "It is, however, certain that I haven't got them now. They went as money usually does. The fact is, I have met one or two men recently who apparently know rather more games of chance than I do, and I passed on the fame, which was my most valuable asset, to you."

"You passed me on the brand of a crime I never committed," said Winston grimly. "That, however, is not the question now. Not one dollar, except at the time agreed upon, will you get from me. Why did you come here dressed as we usually are on the prairie?"

Courthorne glanced down at the deerskin jacket and smiled as he straightened himself into a caricature of Winston's mounted attitude. It was done cleverly.

"When I ride in this fashion we are really not very unlike, you see, and I let one or two men I met get a good look at me," he said. "I meant it as a hint that it would be wise of you to come to terms with me."

"I have done so already. You made the bargain."

"Well," said Courthorne, smiling, "a contract may be modified at any time when both parties are willing."

"One is not," said Winston dryly. "You heard my terms, and nothing that you can urge will move me a hairsbreadth from them."

Courthorne looked at him steadily, and some men would have found his glance disconcerting, for now and then all the wickedness that was in him showed in his half-closed eyes. Still, he saw that the farmer was unyielding.

"Then we will let it go; in the meanwhile," he said, "take me across the bridge."

They were half-way along it when he pulled up, and once more looked down on Winston.

"Your hand is a tolerably good one so long as you are willing to sacrifice yourself, but it has its weak points, and there is one thing I could not tolerate," he said.

"What is that?"

Courthorne laughed wickedly. "You wish me to be explicit? Maud Barrington is pretty, but it is quite out of the question that you should ever marry her."

Winston turned towards him with the veins on his forehead swollen. "Granting that it is so, what is that to you?"

Courthorne nodded as if in comprehension. "Well, I'm probably not consistent, but one rarely quite loses touch with everything, and if I believed that my kinswoman was growing fond of a beggarly prairie farmer, I'd venture to put a sudden stop to your love-making. This, at least, is perfectly bona fide, Winston."

Winston had borne a good deal of late, and his hatred of the man flared up. He had no definite intention, but he moved a pace forward, and Courthorne touched the horse with his heel. It backed, and then, growing afraid of the blackness about it, plunged, while Winston for the first time saw that there was a gap in the loosely-laid planking close behind it. Another plunge or flounder, and horse and rider would go down together.

For a moment he held his breath and watched. Then, as the beast resisting its rider's efforts backed again, he sprang forward and seized the bridle.

"Get your spurs in! Shove him forward for your life," he said.

There was a momentary struggle on the slippery planking, and, almost as its hind hoofs overhung the edge, Winston dragged the horse away. Courthorne swung himself out of the saddle, left the former the bridle, and glanced behind him at the gap. Then he turned, and the two men looked at each other steadily. Their faces were a trifle paler than usual.

"You saw it?" asked Courthorne.

"Yes, but not until you backed the beast and he commenced plunging."

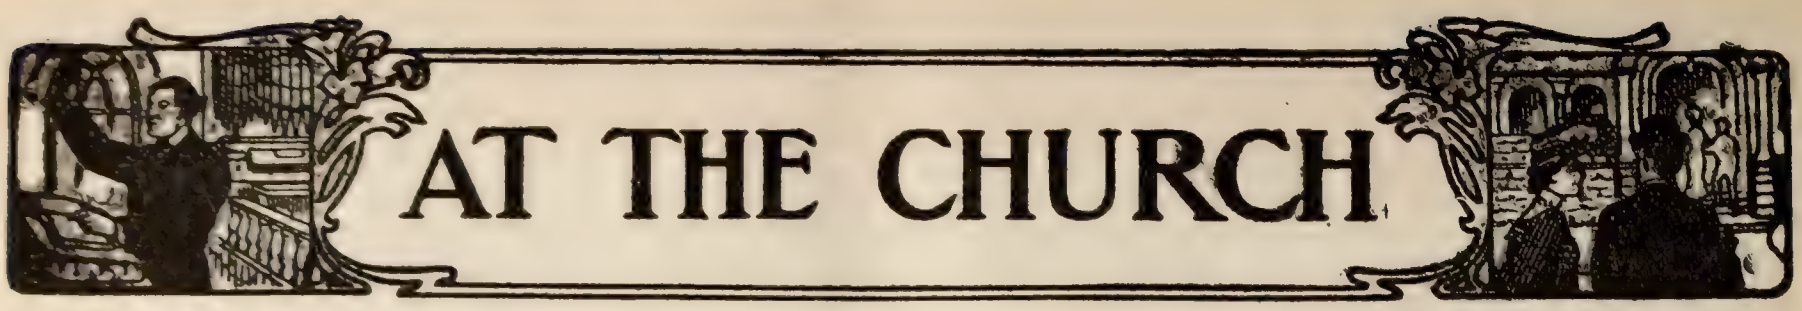
"He plunged once or twice before you caught the bridle."

"Yes," said Winston quietly.

Courthorne laughed. "You are a curious man. It would have cleared the ground for you."

"No," said Winston dryly. "I don't know that you will understand me, but I scarcely think it would. It may have been a mistake of mine to do what I did, but I have a good deal on my shoulders already."

Courthorne made no answer as he led his horse across the bridge. Then he mounted, and looked down on the farmer who stood beside him.



"I remember some things, though I don't always let them influence me to my detriment," he said. "I'm going back to the railroad, and then West, and don't quite know when you will have the pleasure of seeing me again."

Winston watched him quietly. "It would be wiser if you did not come back until I send for you."

The Perverse Sex

Walter Pater, an old man at fifty, bald as a coot and grotesquely plain, regarded every woman much as did Dean Swift, who wrote: "A very little wit is valued in a woman, as we are pleased with few words spoken intelligently by a parrot." "You don't approve of marriage?" a friend once observed to Pater. "No," he replied, "nor would anybody else if he gave the matter proper consideration. Men and women are always pulling different ways. Women won't pull our way. They are so perverse."—Cleveland Leader.

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

The Glorious Roll Call*

The Book of Hebrews is like the Gospel—an anonymous production of the New Testament. Although it bears the name of Paul in both the authorized and the revised versions, the earliest manuscript gives the title as merely "To the Hebrews." Probably Paul's connection with the authorship of the book was assumed by the early Christian teachers both from the desire to append some name to the production and also because Paul was a conspicuous writer whose general point of view seemed to be reflected in this epistle. At the present time, however, there are few biblical scholars who would accede to the Pauline authorship of this book.

Who the writer was we do not know. On that question there is no satisfactory theory. Some have though Barnabas was the writer, others Apollos, and Professor Harnack has recently defended the view that Aquila and Priscilla were the authors. We can only accept the general fact that the book is non-Pauline, and await further evidence regarding the actual writer.

Destination and Purpose.

The destination of the epistle is not difficult to determine. It was written to Jewish Christians in a time of persecution. Perhaps these Christians lived in Rome, although this is not stated. There are personal hints in the epistle, particularly in the final chapter, which give the impression that the author was acquainted personally with those to whom he wrote. It is the purpose of the epistle to point out the relation between the law of Moses and the gospel of Christ. Paul in his letters insists that the law had been abolished in the death of Christ and was no longer of any value. The author of this epistle takes a different ground. His view is that the law leads up to and prepares for the gospel, that it is a prophecy of it in the form of that typology of which the Jews of the first Christian century were so fond. It is the constant effort of the writer to show how the gospel which has come through the redemptive work of Jesus is superior to the law given by Moses. The watchwords of the epistle are, "how much more" and "a better covenant."

The Cathedral of the Faith.

The eleventh chapter is the roll call of the heroes of the faith. It is like a great cathedral in which one sees all about him the monuments of the great man of the past. One might appropriately call it the Westminster Abbey of the Christian faith. The list of those who, through faith, had inherited the promises, is a long one and includes most of the heroes of the Old Testament. The entire chapter should be studied, and not the mere fragment which is printed in the lesson papers.

The Triumphs of Faith.

It is of course evident that faith is the theme which arouses the writer's admiration. It is this confidence in invisible things which is the ground of Christian hope and assurance. Indeed not only are Christians the children of faith, but even those who belong to the Old Testament dispensation, because through faith they laid hold upon realities which were as yet invisible but in the process of revelation. And then begins the long list of those who through faith inherit the blessings. It is by faith that we know the worlds were framed by the command of God. Far back in the ages, the creative purpose was manifested, and that purpose was one with all the on-going movements of God's power through the ages. It was by faith that Abel, trusting in God, offered a sacrifice whose motive met with the divine approval. It was by faith that Enoch walked with God so that he entered upon the deathless life through that divine companionship. Such a faith is the kind that opens every door of access to God. Those who live in the realm of faith are able to realize the presence of God so completely that he becomes to them a friend and a rewarder of their search.

Heroes of Faith.

It was such a faith that led Noah to prepare for the dark days of judgment, even though none of his neighbors would believe that evil was impending. By this act Noah revealed the loftiness of his own faith and his superiority of his fellows. But most of all was Abraham, "the father of the faithful," as he prepared for the new home afar from the country of his birth, led on by that sense of the divine purpose which became to him the call of God. He left sure worldly possessions to accept the lot of an emigrant and wanderer, and spent all his days landless among enemies because he believed in God who had promised him a future glorious for himself and a blessing to the world. Thus he became the father of that growing company not only of the Hebrew people but of the faithful in all lands and ages who, trusting in God, become like him. Such a faith had Isaac, Jacob, and Joseph. And Moses, the earliest of the prophets of Israel, leoder and law-giver, had such a faith that he threw in his lot with the afflicted people of Israel rather than accept the proffered riches and honors of Egypt.

The Last of the Faithful.

And thus the roll goes on with the story of the Exodus and the occupation of Canaan. And then the author, feeling that the theme would be endless, sums up with his splendid question, "And what shall I say more? For time would fail me to tell of Gideon, and of Barak, Samson, and of Jephthah; of David also and Samuel and the prophets." These were heroes of faith, although the list only begins the story of that notable company who through the Old Testament achieved immortality by their noble lives.

The Later Heroes.

It is significant that nearly all of these who are mentioned are taken from the first section of Hebrew history, that which tells of the beginnings of the nation and of the Hebrew people. But such men were typical of all, and certainly if the author had been making his list complete he would have included the great heroes, prophets, and martyrs of the later day. How worthy would Amos, Hosea, Isaiah and Jeremiah have been of a place in this illustrious company? And if we are to trust the description of the last verses of the chapter, it was especially the heroes of the Maccabean revolution whose story is told in the apocryphal books of Maccabees whom the author had in view. These were they who were "stoned, sawn assunder, tempted, slain with the sword, wandered in sheepskins and goatskins, being destitute, afflicted, and tempted (of whom the world was not worthy)." All these uplifted to the heavens the pure and stainless flowers of blameless and faithful lives, and in the attainment of like virtues the Christian who listens to the voice of God finds the satisfaction of his own life and the glory of his career.

Truly this is a noble edifice, a cathedral worthy to enshrine the worship of the ages.

PRAYER MEETING

By Silas Jones

WALKING AS CHILDREN OF THE LIGHT.

Topic, June 9. Eph. 4:25; 5-14.

It has been said that we Americans are the most unhappy people in the world because we are the most enlightened. This raises the question of the relation of enlightenment to happiness. It is a good one for discussion in the prayer meeting. I shall not attempt to answer it. In dealing with it we must consider the fact that education creates unrest. Men accept injustice without murmuring only when they do not know their rights. Jesus and his apostles taught obedience to the law of the state but the rulers of the time saw in them enemies of the existing order and the rulers were right, for the new teaching gave men a sense of their own worth and prepared the way for rebellion against every form of injustice. If by happiness we mean contentment with things as they are, then enlightenment does make us unhappy. If however, happiness belongs to the moral order, ignorance is its enemy, not enlightenment.

The Light of Truth.

The liar denies that he has obligations to others. He breaks down the confidence which must exist between man and man if human relations are to be satisfactory. But the truthful man goes beyond the mere formal keeping of his word. He takes his promises seriously; he also takes seriously the matter of making promises. He tries to have his word agree with his deepest feeling of right. He goth further and examines the conduct approved by the majority to see whether injustice may not be concealed by ancient custom. We cannot be said to walk in the light of the truth if we rely wholly upon custom to guide our conduct. To speak the truth is often to speak what is painful to ourselves and to others. Men used to think slavery and Christianity stood or fell together. An attack on slavery was to them an attack of Christianity. They join our faith to other wrongs. They need a better faith and loyalty to truth requires that the error which binds Christianity to any wrong be exposed and the mind of Christ be allowed to dwell in his people in its purity.

Anger and Forgiveness.

There is a place for wrath. Can the man of right impulses sit by unmoved while the innocent are corrupted and the weak defrauded? What is the proper feeling for the sincere man to cultivate in the presence of hypocrisy? The good man does not engage in clamor and railing. His opposition to sin does not turn him into a madman. He controls his indignation and directs it even to the advantage of him who does the wrong. He is not satisfied with a personal success; he would put down what ought to be put down for the sake of all men. His forgiveness is a vindication of the truth, not a surrender to the inevitable. He forgives that he may help another to live right before God in man. The anger of the Christian has forgiveness as its goal. The two are found in every well rounded life.

Honesty and Work.

The stealing that should give us the greatest concern is not that which is under the ban of the law. That disgraces him who practices it and it is not attractive to the average man. Of course the Christian is deeply interested in holding all the ground gained and therefore he supports the laws aimed against stealing. His more important task is that of making disgraceful forms of stealing not under the condemnation of the law, some of which the law can never reach. The able bodied men who never works is no less a thief because his father left him enough to keep in food and clothing. Honesty as it is seen by the Christian requires that every one shall contribute in some way to social welfare and progress. The gambler is not an honest man even if he never cheats in his game. Some forms of trade are dishonest, for they simply enable one man to get what belongs to another and in no way add to the material or spiritual goods of the world. The honest man is busy about something that is worth while. We may grant that many men are honest in their intentions even when they are doing what might as well be left undone, but we should insist that Christians may claim to be enlightened only when they know what ought to be done.

First Christian Church, Lincoln, Neb.

Dedication at Nebraska Capital

The First Christian Church of this city dedicated its new $33,000 building May 16, with F. M. Rains leading us in the worship and victories of the day. Our people here certainly experienced one of the happiest days in their history, for our brotherhood well knows of their struggles and experiences of past years. Now to have an adequate workshop on one of the best sites in this capital city is a matter of extreme gratification.

After a day or so of heavy rains pouring over our Nebraska farms the Lord's Day dawned most beautiful and bright. The University Church at Bethany, the churches at Havelock and East Side, united with us in the morning worship, and with friends who had gathered from all over the state and with the people of the community filled the large auditorium to overflowing. Brother Rains thrilled all hearts with his message, having to do with the nature and mission of the church. Before his sermon had ended we were all expectant of the best results for the audience was tremulous with the spirit and gripped with power.

We called for $16,000 to provide for the indebtedness and permit some additional expenditures in Bible-school equipment. The amount raised was $16,800, which will reach $17,000. Our people are so very grateful and enthusiastic, their hearts just bubbling over with praise. The church is to grow and thrive in the atmosphere created by that master of such occasions, Brother Rains. He made us feel our privileges and obligations under God and the joy of Christian giving and service.

Since the great Scoville meeting, our former church home was entirely inadequate for our purposes and the church was compelled to hold regular services in one of the theatres of the city and later in the city auditorium. Work on the new building was begun in July, 1908. Its construction is of beautiful brick, trimmed with stone. The style of architecture is of Greek Cross effect, with plain cornice, and balcony arrangement, and in addition to basement and main floor auditoriums, contains fifteen separate class rooms. The basement seats about 650 persons in addition to the four kindergarten class rooms and a kitchen. In a sub-basement is the heating plant. The main auditorium is about seventy feet square and seats 800 persons with a balcony seating 300, making a total seating capacity of 1,100. On this floor also are six class rooms, and choir-loft and space for a pipe-organ in an elevated position. The balcony floor contains six class rooms. The seating is with circular pews, four-ply, quarter-sawed oak. All of the aisles of the auditorium are carpeted with the best cork carpet, also the steps, vestibule and cloister. The pulpit is covered with velvet carpet. The windows are made up in artistic style, containing such figures as "Christ Knocking at the Door," "The Boy Jesus," "The Flag and G. A. R. Emblems," three designs carrying out the "Parable of the Sower — Wayside — Stony Ground—Thorns," and one "The Open Bible." Class rooms also have windows of beautiful designs. Bird Critchfield, chairman of our Building Committee, has been a master at the work and united in his efforts.

This church was organized on the 24th day of January, 1869, by D. R. Dungan, who was serving as Chaplain of the Nebraska Legislature at that time. The church now has an enrollment of 1,100 of whom 900 are resident members. It supports one of its own members, Olive Griffith, as a missionary, in Damoh, India, and is generous in its contributions to all missionary, educational and benevolent enterprises. The Bible-school enrolls more than 700, striking recently an average attendance of 500.

Others have labored and we are entering into their labors. The former minister, N. S. Haynes, did a great service in the unifying of our forces and enlarging the vision of our people. Under his ministry the church became a Living Link in the Foreign Society and built the house which was torn down to make room for the larger structure. The present minister has been with this good people for three years. H. H. Harmon.

Reception at Eureka

On May 2 Brother David H. Shields began his pastorate here in Eureka and on Tuesday evening, the 11th, a reception was given in honor of Mr. and Mrs. Shields by the official board and the Men's Club.

Pastors from over the state attending the Ministerial Association lectures and Disciples from neighboring towns joined the community in filling the auditorium of the church.

The following program was given, interspersed with congregational songs and special music. T. J. McGuire, chairman, presided.

Prayer—Prof. B. J. Radford.

Welcome from the State—J. Fred Jones, secretary Illinois Missionary Society.

Near Neighbors—W. F. Turner, Central Christian Church, Peoria.

Welcome from Local Churches—Dr. C. H. Tichnor, Presbyterian Church.

Outer Circles of Influence—Annie E. Davidson, State Pres. C. W. B. M.

Welcome from the Community—Mayor R. J. Dickinson.

The Field is the World—Dr. Royal J. Dye.

The Church and Missions—Mrs. Emma C. Ewing.

Welcome from the College—Pres. R. E. Hieronymous.

Welcome from the Old Eureka Boys—S. E. Fisher, University Church, Champaign, Ill.

Out West—W. Frank Richardson, First Christian Church, Kansas City.

Response—David H. Shields.

Following these addresses a formal reception was held in the church parlors, Mr. and Mrs. McGuire receiving. Lunch was then served by the Men's Club and the social hour following was enjoyed by all.

—Bishop Charles Betts Galloway of the M. E. Church, died at Jackson, Miss., of pneumonia last week. He had been a bishop since 1886, and was sixty years old. Bishop Galloway had traveled the world in church work and was a brilliant speaker.

Return of Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair to Christian College as President of That Institution

The fifty-eight annual commencement of Christian College, Columbia, Mo., marks a change not only for the graduates and students, but it means that the college is to continue its many years of splendid work under the direction of a new president.

Upon the resignation of Mrs. W. T. Moore, Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair of Lexington, Ky., president of Hamilton College, was unanimously elected by the board of trustees to the presidency of Christian College. Mrs. St. Clair comes well equipped for this responsible position. As an executive and as an educator she has won an enviable position in the educational realm.

The outlook for Christian College is very promising. Mrs. Moore leaves the college in good condition for her successor and under the capable and efficient leadership of the newly elected president. The alumnae, patrons, and friends of this institution are looking forward to the most successful era in the history of this great school. A short history of her life work will bear witness to the fitness of Mrs. St. Clair for this large and important work.

Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair is a native of Illinois, coming of Virginia ancestry on her mother's side and on her father's side from early settlers in New York, and is of Scotch-Irish descent. She grew to womanhood in her native state, attending the public schools in Virden, graduating in the high school of that town with the first honors of her class. In 1884 she entered Hamilton College, from which institution she was graduated in 1885 with the highest standing of the class. The following year she did post-graduate work and September of 1886 married Prof. F. P. St. Clair, who for twelve years held the chair of Latin and Mathematics in Hamilton College. On account of Prof. St. Clair's impaired health they removed to Colorado in 1888. During five years' residence in that state, Mrs. St. Clair taught for three years in the public schools with marked success.

Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair.

In June, 1893, Professor and Mrs. St. Clair responded to an urgent call to take charge of Christian College at Columbia, Mo., where Prof. St. Clair's death occurred in November of the same year.

Mrs. St. Clair was unanimously elected by the board of trustees to succeed her husband, being the first woman to serve at the head of this large and successful school then in its forty-third year.

After four years of untiring labor, Mrs. St. Clair had a serious illness which compelled her to resign her position. The summer of 1897 she spent in Europe, and the following year in study in Chicago, and later in Tulane University, New Orleans.

In 1898 Mrs. St. Clair returned to Missouri, where plans were consummated with Mrs. W. T. Moore for a joint partnership in the administrative office of Christian College. Plans were also inaugurated for large building enterprises and for a greater future for this school devoted to the education of women. After four years at Christian College, during which time fully one hundred and fifty thousand dollars were invested in new buildings, and after much other work was accomplished, Mrs. St. Clair responded to a strong call from Hamilton College and entered upon the presidency of her Alma Mater in June, 1903. During the six years of her administration many improvements have been made in both the academic work and in the business management of the school. More than fifty thousand dollars have been spent in additions and improvements, and Hamilton has become affiliated with higher colleges and universities, where students are allowed to enter upon Hamilton College certificates. In addition to the successful management of the college, she has done much valuable work in many other organizations of the city and state.

The board of trustees of Christian College are greatly rejoiced at the acceptance by Mrs. St. Clair of the presidency of this institution, and under her able management and aggressive and efficient leadership, they expect in the very near future to see Christian College take first rank among the schools for women, not only in the west, but in the whole country.

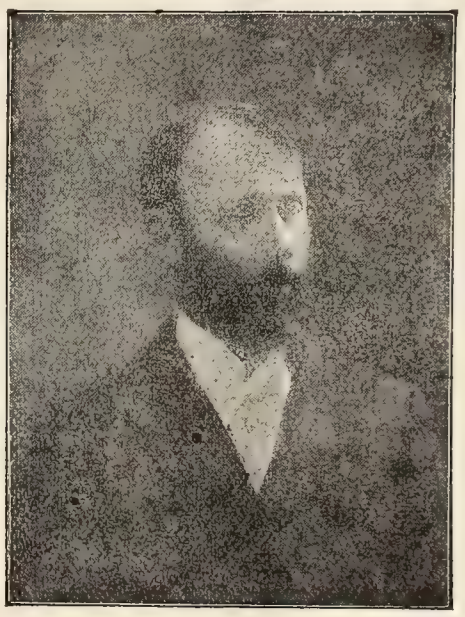
Our Church Men

By John R. Ewers

A Visit to Kenton, Ohio

On the evening of May 12, I made my last address to a Men's club for this season, and surely the pleasure, for me at least, was great. I rode all day on one of the slowest trains that makes any pretense of moving at all, but, it was across Ohio. Ohio always looks good to me, and just at this time the many apple orchards are in their glory. People were planting their gardens. The farmers followed their plows through the rich and fragrant furrows. "The cattle were grazing, their heads never raising, there were forty feeding like one." The awkward lambs, all legs, frolicked about like youngsters on stilts. The woods were delicate green. One thought of Corot. There was plenty of time to see all these things and to think, for the train was very accommodating. She ambled along like an old mare, once in a while taking brisk little streaks of movement and again slowing down to an absent-minded gait of near-inertness. When within sight of Kenton the train stopped for several minutes while the crew got off and had a game of ball, then a train whisked by from the west, and we deliberately glided into the city.

Nothing Slow About Kenton.



At the depot a fine machine was in waiting. There is nothing slow about Kenton and this auto dashed away at a frightful speed. The little city is a most beautiful one. Uniformly good homes are there, while most of the streets have elegant houses. A quaint old pillared court house stands in the center of the square and all about are the substantial business houses. Our church, unlike some of which we know, is well located on the best street in town, well up among the finest houses. The pastor is one of our noblest Ohio ministers, Mr. T. W. Pinkerton, and he has served this congregation, in all, thirteen years, nine years before his Salt Lake City pastorate and four since. He is recognized as the leading minister in the city. Perhaps he is the most popular citizen. He has made the church what it is, with the help of some grand laymen like Dr. Willet's father-in-law, Mr. Henry Price. The Men's Club is an unusually good one. I noted the quality of the men. Hand picked fruit of Pinkerton's long pastorate they are. They represent the best young and middle aged business men of the city. Teachers, attorneys, doctors, who are leaders in their professions, are among them. It is a great group and no mistake. One would travel far to find a church of five hundred members who would excel this one in clean efficiency, in solid worth, in broad culture, in generous ministry, in Christian worthfulness. It was a delight and a positive stimulus to meet these people.

What the Men's Club Does.

What does this club do? Several things. But one thing it does, which is characteristic and peculiar. It supports two excellent young men in college, both of whom will undoubtedly be ministers. Friends, this is the way out. We need more men, of broad unselfish vision like Pinkerton. He has laid his powerful, loving hand on two splendid young fellows and has guided them into the college. His men back him up in his enterprise and put up the needed cash. Now we have heard of many men's clubs which are doing many laudable things but here is a new idea. Anderson, Ind., has its "Big Brother" idea and cares for the boys. That is highly commendable. Uhrichsville has it's public reading rooms. Kenton men are recruiting our depleted ministry. We need to guard our boys. Nothing is more far sighted than that. Nothing will bear richer fruit in coming days. We need to look after the physical and social needs of our men. We need, oh, how we need, worthy young men for our ministry. Every one of our eleven thousand churches could be made strong and great if only we could put the right man into each. This is not an extravagant statement.

God and Man.

I recently talked with an enthusiastic Y. M. C. A. secretary who goes about putting weak associations on their feet. He said, "God and a good man can do anything." Macfarlane hits a grand note when he eloquently cries out in his appeal for large things: "I can do all things in him who strengtheneth me." Those are not the words of a little man with a little vision. Those are the words of heroes attempting big tasks. As ministers we must follow Pinkerton's worthy example and seek out certain Timothies and get our men to put them through college. It takes a fine quality of manhood to do this. Long years this minister has been training and inspiring this group. This is the ripe, rich fruit of a long and efficient pastorate. This is not the result of "Whoopee" methods. That man Richard Dobson, who said, "Let us have less fuming about 'our plea' and more emphasis upon practice. Less Bickering and more brotherliness. Less ambition for telegraphic additions and more anxiety for retentions," is a man after my own heart. The wise, balanced, cultured pastor who works along these lines, ushers in the kingdom.

Rev. T. W. Pinkerton.

A Well Organized Church.

A great, clean, solid, powerful church like the Kenton church has been built carefully and well. It is a perfect machine, well oiled, and turning out a valuable product. No, it is a finely organized group of worthy people, taught, cultured, warmed by love, inspired by visions, captained by the Christ. Here is a harmonious and happy church and pastor. The saloons have been voted out of the county. The fine homes speak their lesson. The men's club does its unselfish work. Mr. Pinkerton is this year president of our state missionary society and next week at Elyria will deliver a great speech at our convention. For a study in harmony, real worth, solid results, positive service, broad views, noble unselfish living, essential Christianity, I commend you to the Kenton church.

—The will of F. Marion Crawford expresses the desire that his yacht and the villa Sant' Angello in Italy be sold and that the testator's body lie buried in the Sant' Angello Cemetery.

CHICAGO CHURCH NOTES

The ministers of Chicago have issued invitations for a farewell luncheon to Dr. Royal J. Dye before he leaves for Africa. A number of men from each church have been invited. They plan to raise some money for the work at Bolenge at this meeting.

The reports of the ministers indicate that the amusement parks have begun the work of depleting the audiences in the churches. The task of securing a hearing for the gospel in Chicago during the summer is doubly hard.

Charles Pearce began his ministry at West Pullman on May 23. He comes to us from Ashland, Ohio. He will do some work at the University of Chicago, though giving most of his time to the work of the West Pullman Church.

Clarence E. Rainwater has spoken in several of the Chicago churches on the claims of Christian journalism with special reference to the Christian Century. The paper is being received by Chicago church members most cordially.

The ministers' meeting held on May 24 chose the Pennsylvania railroad as their official route to the Centennial convention and have arranged for a special Chicago train. Delegations from adjoining churches are invited to go to Pittsburg with the Chicago train. O. F. Jordan has been appointed as transportation manager and communications concerning the CHRISTIAN CENTURY special should be addressed to him in care of the CHRISTIAN CENTURY office, 235 East Fortieth St., Chicago. We shall have more to say about the special later.

The church at Irving Park, of which A. W. Taylor is pastor, has appointed a certain Sunday soon as a day for a church canvass. They will send canvassers to all the churches in the park to count the audiences, and will make an accurate survey of religious conditions in the community.

A. W. Fortune gave his lecture on home missions, illustrated with the stereopticon, at the Evanston Church while he was in Chicago at the district convention. He has a most telling address for the cause of home missions.

Mr. E. M. Bowman, well known among the Disciples of Chicago, has moved to Glencoe, on the north shore, for the summer.

The convention of the second district of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society was held at Memorial Church of Christ last week on Thursday and Friday. The Chicago Woman's Board of Missions held the sessions on Thursday, at which time reports were made and addresses delivered regarding the work of the organization during the past year. Miss Lura V. Thompson, state secretary, Miss Ford of Porto Rico, and Miss Minor, superintendent of the children's work, were present to lend their help and counsel. Luncheon was served by the ladies of the memorial Church, and in the afternoon tea was given in honor of the life members of the auxiliaries. In the evening Mrs. W. E. Hopkins, a returned missionary from India, gave a stereopticon lecture on "Womanhood and Childhood in the Orient." Friday was devoted to the district, state, and general missionary work. Addresses were delivered by the state officers, J. Fred Jones, for the Illinois Christian Missionary Society, and Clarence Depew, for the Sunday-school work. Secretary Muckley of the Church Extension Fund, P. C. Macfarlane of the Christian Brotherhood, and A. W. Fortune of Cincinnati for the American Christian Missionary Society, were prominent features in the program. Rev. Johnston Myers of Immanuel Baptist Church spoke upon the problem of missions in Chicago. It was hoped that the state president, J. H. Gilliland of Bloomington, would be present, but he was unable to come.

—Mayor Rose of Milwaukee, who has been debating the temperance question with President Dickie of Albion College, has come out with a statement that he will not be a candidate for his office again. He is a Democrat and has served two or three terms in office.

Notes From the Foreign Society

The May and June numbers of the Missionary Intelligencer reveal the master hand of Secretary Stephen J. Corey as an editor and an all around missionary propagandist. Without question, the Intelligencer is one of the leading missionary papers of the world. It is so regarded by the leaders in our missionary host.

Miss Muriel Molland, daughter of Mrs. Lily W. Molland, Nankin, China, has completed her course at William Woods College, Fulton, Mo., and will return to China, her native land, the coming autumn. She made a splendid record in her course in the college.

E. A. Gougwer, superintendent of the Vermont Avenue Sunday-school, Washington, D. C., says: "We intend to be a living-link again this year: can't afford not to be." This is the good church of which F. D. Power has been pastor for about three decades.

The steady gain in the receipts from all sources of the Foreign Society is a source of much encouragement to the hard pressed missionaries far out on the firing line of the world.

Last week the Foreign Society received a direct gift of $500 from a friend in Oregon, to help establish the new training college at Bolenge, Africa. Also a friend in Florida sends $500 to help the two schools: one at Vigan, Philippine Islands, and the one on the Congo. Besides these two direct gifts, there were also three $100 gifts.

The Children's Day offerings should be sent to F. M. Rains, secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio. Please be careful to give local name of school when different from the post-office.

The Foreign Society has decided to discontinue its work in Honolulu. With the exception of the Japanese and Chinese population, the island is pretty well evangelized. The Oriental population is very changing and unsettled, and the Chinese speak several dialects, making the work among them very difficult. There is a strong Hawaiian Congregational Missionary Society, doing active work on the islands. Our work has always been small there. With the great opportunities which we have in the larger fields where the people have not the gospel at all, and our inability to expend any large sum in Honolulu, it has seemed the part of wisdom and economy to withdraw.

Lathrop Cooley of Ohio made the Honolulu work possible by his generous gifts. Both he and our missionary, C. C. Wilson, concur in the conclusion that the discontinuance of the work is wise. C. C. Wilson and wife have returned to America. The Society never appointed more faithful and competent missionaries. He has accepted the pastorate at Northside, Cincinnati. We have a good American church in Honolulu which is self supporting. These brethren have loyally supported the work which the Foreign Society has done and have generously contributed to it. The cordial attitude of the pastor, A. C. McKeever, has been very helpful. They will continue to do what mission work they can in the beautiful city.

Transylvania University Notes

In the recent debate of the Kentucky Inter-Collegiate Debating Association, held in Lexington at the State University between the representatives of the State University and Transylvania University, the men of Transylvania won, giving to Transylvania University the championship of the state in debate for the year 1909.

President R. H. Crossfield is visiting nearly all parts of the state of Kentucky this spring, familiarizing himself with educational conditions in both the towns and the country. In chapel talks before the students of the University, he has told in a very interesting way something of what he has seen and learned while on these trips throughout the state. At present Dr. Crossfield is in the mountains of Eastern Kentucky.

Prof. Charles Louis Loos will be very greatly missed by both the faculty and the students of Transylvania next year. Prof. Loos's resignation was handed in some weeks ago, after a most honorable and beautiful service of almost thirty years in this institution. He began his duties in 1880 as President of Kentucky University. Since his resignation as President in 1897, he has been Professor of the Greek Language and Literature. He will be succeeded in this work by Dr. Thos. B. McCarthy, Jr., who has so ably assisted him for the past six years. It is with deepest regret at his loss to the college community and truest love for him who is indeed "the Grand Old Man of Transylvania University" that we realize that his regular duties in the class room are ended, though we know that his influence and beautiful life will continue to help us not only as his friends, but as college people so long as he is permitted to live in our midst.

In the contest of the Southern Inter-State Oratorical Association, held with the University of the South at Sewanee, Tennessee, May 5, the representative of Transylvania University won second place. Our representative was Mr. Rupert C. Foster, an Indiana man, whose family have recently come to Lexington to make their home here. Mr. Foster is one of the best students in the University, one of whom the institution is justly proud. The first place was won in the Oratorical Contest by the representatives of the University of Virginia, who last year tied with Cornell University in an oratorical contest. A new regulation was made this year by the Southern Inter-State Association, granting to the man winning the second place a gold medal, and Mr. Foster is the first man to be awarded one of these medals. Mr. Foster's subject was Non-Partisan Politics.

An alumnus of Transylvania University has just been employed as assistant in the department of Latin in Transylvania for next year, Mr. E. W. Delcamp. Mr. Delcamp took his bachelor's degree from the University two years ago and during this year has been instructor in Latin here. At the coming commencement he will take the M. A. degree from Transylvania, and will graduate as first honor man from the Classical Course of the College of the Bible. Mr. Delcamp is an excellent teacher and a strong man, and the University feels herself fortunate in securing his services.

A. J. Henry, Secretary.

Bethany College Commencement

The sixty-eighth session of Bethany College closes with commencement exercises June 6 to 10.

Sunday morning, June 6, at 11:00 a. m., President Thomas E. Cramblet will deliver the baccalaureate sermon to the graduating class. At 7:30 in the evening, the annual sermon before the Christian Associations, will be delivered by E. P. Wise, pastor of the Central Christian Church, East Liverpool, Ohio.

On Monday, at 10:00 a. m., the last chapel service for the session will be held. At this service, following the custom of many years, the president and members of the faculty will each deliver short addresses to the students and visitors present. In the evening at 8:00 o'clock, the American and Neotrophian Literary Societies will hold their annual contest. This will be a contest in oratory, declamation, essay and debate. Tuesday, June 8, at 9:30 a. m., the annual field day exercises will be conducted. The Merchants of Wellsburg and Wheeling contribute to the victors in these athletic contests useful and attractive prizes. In the afternoon at 3:00 o'clock, there will be a base ball game between Franklin College and Bethany teams. At the same time the annual meeting of the board of trustees will be held in the new library building. Tuesday evening is given up to the reception given by President and Mrs. Cramblet at Pendleton Heights. This is a reception to the students, trustees, citizens and visitors, and is the social event of Commencement week.

On Wednesday, June 9, at 9:00 a. m., an adjourned meeting of the board of trustees will be held. At 2:30 p. m., class day exercises will be conducted by the graduates under the trees on the beautiful college campus. At 4:00 o'clock there will be a base ball game between the All Collegians of Pittsburg, and Bethany team. In the evening the concert by the music department in charge of Prof. J. C. Moos will be given. These annual concerts are among the most delightful features of Bethany commencement.

The annual commencement proper will be held On Thursday, June 10. There will be two sessions, one at 9:30 a. m., and another at 2:00 p. m. At the morning session, in addition to the saluditory and six orations delivered by as many members of the senior class, there will be an address delivered by Hon. Z. T. Vinson, of Huntington, W. Va. Mr. Vinson is a graduate of Bethany and one of the ablest lawyers in West Virginia. At the afternoon session there will be four orations by members of the graduating class, in addition to the valedictory. Dr. W. O. Thompson, president of Ohio State University, will deliver an address at the close of the exercises. The usual base ball contest between the alumni and Bethany's team will be played at 4:00 p. m. The exercises of the commencement season will close with the anniversary of the Adelphian Literary Society, on Thursday evening, at 8:00 o'clock.

The sixty-eighth session of Bethany College just closing has been one of the most satisfactory in every way in the long history of the college. The total number of graduates in all departments is forty-seven. Twenty-eight of these receive degrees in the academic department, four in the post graduate course, five in the music department, and ten in the normal department. Graduates in the normal department, by reason of the recent enactment of the legislature of West Virginia, are given first grade teachers' certificates, good throughout the state of West Virginia. This class is the largest that the institution has ever graduated. Fourteen of the graduates in this year's class have chosen the ministry of the gospel for their life work. Thirteen of this number have already accepted calls to fields of labor, in various parts of the country.

The seventh annual summer school of Bethany College, continuing six weeks, will begin on Tuesday, June 15. There is every indication that the attendance will be larger than in any previous year. In connection with the summer school, there will be held from July 7 to 21, a chautauqua and teacher training rally, a school of Bible-school methods, and the Ohio Valley Ministerial Institute. A number of the best lecturers and instructors of the brotherhood have been secured for these programs

All former students and friends of the institution are cordially invited to return for this commencement season. Our new interurban line gives us hourly service between Bethany, Wellsburg, Steubenville, Wheeling and other Ohio Valley cities. This Centennial year must witness many pilgrimages to our classic village. There is no more delightful season for a visit to historic Bethany "On the Banks of the Old Buffalo" than the month of June.

all of Brother Sweeney's questions. They are all interesting, though not all pertinent. In so far as they bear upon the nature and purpose of miracles as the New Testament records them, they are amply answered in what I have said.

I must repeat that Brother Sweeney's refusal to define the terms he uses surprises and disappoints me. I asked him to define a miracle. I asked him what he regarded as the value of Jesus' miracles today as evidences of his divine nature and purpose, in comparison with his character, his teaching and his program for men. I asked him also what he considered to be the present value of the miracles of Jesus as aids to Christian living. To these, Brother Sweeney says, "I have no intention of answering these questions." In the light of this statement, whose motive and significance Brother Sweeney must be left to determine, his closing quotation from the Book of Job, is naive and suggestive to a degree.

The Passing of J. H. Hardin

Rev. J. H. Hardin passed to his reward on Sunday, May 23, at his home in Kansas City, Mo. Mr. Hardin was superintendent of Bible School work in Missouri at the time of his death and had filled some of the most important positions in the Brotherhood. An administrator of affairs, he led the American Christian Missionary Society as its secretary; as preacher, he was pastor of several of the great churches of Missouri—Hannibal, Liberty and Mexico; an educator he served acceptably as president of Eureka College and Christian University, Canton, Mo. His life was a very kindly one, with all its labors, and he died in the love of a host of friends.

WITH THE WORKERS

A new church is to be erected at El Reno, Okla., during the summer.

F. D. Macy of Iowa, has been called to the church at Bartlesville, Okla.

C. C. Wilson late of Honolulu, has become pastor of the North Side Church, Cincinnati.

At Tulsa, Okla., where D. A. Wickizer is the minister, the church is worshipping in the basement of their new building.

It is said that there are eighteen churches in process of erection in western Oklahoma.

There were 161 additions to the church in Owensboro, Ky., in a recent meeting.

The Sixth District convention of Illinois meets at Rantoul, June 2 and 3.

H. H. Uterback has resigned at Estherville, Iowa, and become pastor of the church at Waco, Neb.

President Taft has consented to be present at the Pittsburg Convention to deliver an address.

At Drummond, Okla., where William Higgins is the minister a new house of worship is being erected.

J. Ross Miller, Marion, Ind., is available for work as singing evangelist during July and August.

Frank Thompson, pastor of the church at Cairo, Ill., writes that there have been twenty-one additions to the church there in the last seven weeks.

The church at Lake Charles, La., which has a parsonage and pays a salary of $1,000 per year, is without a pastor. Henry B. Kane is the correspondent.

The church at Fairview, Ill., graduated this year, nine from a class in teacher training. The address was delivered by the pastor, H. G. Burgess.

J. F. Green, who has begun work with the church at Marrietta, Ohio, is pushing things with vigor, and is winning the enthusiastic support of the entire membership.

J. H. Garrison, editor of the Christian Evangelist, gave the commencement address to the College of Liberal Arts, Transylvania University, June 10.

The Oklahoma Christian University closed its second year's work June 2. There were thirty graduates from all departments; six of these were given the A. B. degree and two the A. M.

There are frequent additions to the church at Fayette, Mo., where Andrew P. Johnson is the pastor. The Sunday-school has reached the highest attendance in the history of the church.

I. J. Spencer is reaching the people of Lexington, Ky., through a Thursday sermon which he prepares for each of the daily papers, which he calls "A Week Day Sermon for the Press."

An Ohio paper announces that the following churches of that state are searching for pastors: Orrville, Geneva, Coshocton, Ashland, Bowling Green, West Mansfield, Lisbon and Painesville.

In a short meeting with the church at Milan, Mo., where Mr. Roberts, a student at Canton, Mo., preaches, there were seven additions to the church. Preaching by R. S. Robertson.

Benjamin L. Smith, Cleveland, Ohio, has been called to the pastorate of the church at Salina, Kan., as successor to David H. Shields. Mr. Smith has not yet given his reply to the church. We would hope that he will accept.

A. W. Kokendoffer has completed his first year of work with the First Church, Sedalia, Mo. It has been a year of unusual success in the work of the church. Mr. Kokendoffer celebrated the occasion by an anniversary sermon, reviewing the year's work.

June 6 marks the beginning of the sixth year of service for J. E. Lynn with the First Church, Warren, Ohio. The pastor will preach an anniversary sermon. Mr. Lynn has been in Warren longer than any other pastor. Frequent changes in pastorates are not peculiar to the Disciples.

B. L. Wray, pastor of Budd Park Church, Kansas City, reports five added since last report, thirty since January 1. The Sunday-school has an attendance of over 300.

A very attractive invitation to the commencement exercises of McLean College, Hopkinsville, Ky., has been received by this office. The exercises were held May 22-27. There were nineteen graduates; seven receiving the A. B. degree, six the B. S., five the B. L. and one the A. M.

In the letter by George L. Peters, from southwest Missouri, note the offer of acceptance by the convention of the offer of Drury College to have the Christian churches of that part of the state, place and maintain in the college a professor of New Testament literature. This is a notable advance toward Christian union.

Careful preparation for the missionary offering was made this year by the church at Gibson City, Ill. All offerings were taken May 16. An interesting and novel feature of the plan was the publication of a leaflet announcing the apportionment of the church to the different interests and an explanation of the purpose to which the offering would be devoted.

Guy Hoover returned to his former church in Pullman, Ill., Sunday, May 23, where he delivered the annual sermon before the G. A. R., W. R. C. and and other patriotic bodies in the morning. The house was crowded to its full capacity. In the evening Mr. Hoover was likewise greeted by a large audience. Mr. Pearce, pastor of the West Pullman Church, supplied for Mr. Hoover at Tipton, Ind.

An event of unusual interest to the Disciples of Christ on the Pacific Coast and throughout the land, is the call of H. H. Guy, of Japan to the position of dean of the Berkeley Bible Seminary, Berkeley, Cal. Dean Guy is a graduate of the college of Liberal Arts and also of the College of the Bible of Drake University, receiving therefrom the degrees of A. B. and B. D. He later took post graduate work in Yale University, receiving the Ph. D. degree. Dean Guy's experience in Japan has given him especial fitness for the work. During the next year he will in addition to his other work teach the Bible to Japanese students in their native language.

For five months C. G. Brelos has been at work with the church at Galveston, Texas. Previously to his taking up the work the church had been without regular preaching for several months, with the usual result in lagging interest and discouragement. Now everything is taking on new life. They have just closed a ten days' rally in which they were assisted two evenings by Mr. Boynton, pastor at Huntsville, and one evening by J. B. Holmes, of Beaumont. Other evenings the preaching was by the pastor. There were fourteen accessions to the church. There is at present especial interest in the Sunday-school and the Christian Endeavor Society.

F. M. Rains dedicated the new church at Lincoln, Neb., May 16. The new building with its furnishings cost $32,000; it has fifteen separate class rooms; in the basement a Sunday-school room seating 650 persons; the main auditorium seats 800, and the gallery 300 additional; the furnishing of the church is thoroughly modern and of the best. This church has had a very interesting growth. It was organized January 24, 1869. Its first building was dedicated in 1889. The present site was purchased in 1901, and a chapel erected which served the church until it was wrecked last summer to make room for the present building. Among the preachers of the church are, J. M. Yearnshaw, D. R. Dungan, J. B. Johnson, J. Mad Williams, B. F. Bush, Robert E. Schwartz, C. L. Crowthers, R. H. Ingram, C. B. Newman, J. J. Morgan, H. J. Kerschsten, T. J. Thompson, N. S Haynes, and the present successful pastor, H H. Harmon. There is a present resident membership of 900, and an enrollment of 700 in the Sunday-school.

Books You Need

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing among the Disciples of Christ. You need every one of this splendid list.

OUR CENTENNIAL BOOK.

"Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union."--Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic for this our Centennial year. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Boston W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Retail price, $1.00. No one should allow the Centennial to pass without possessing this book.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind., a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possibly only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these churches are given their present form."

Every Disciple of Christ will be interested in getting from his own pen the teachings of Professor Willett. No fair man will consent to judge him on the basis of newspaper reports. These books should be in every one's possession just now.

ERRETT GATES' ILLUMINATING WORK.

"The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples."

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 35c. Paper binding, 25c.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, PA.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, MASS.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes:

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

JUDGE SCOFIELD'S FASCINATING TALE.

"Altar Stairs."

An ideal gift book. Beautifully bound and illustrated. Price, $1.20.

Address,

The New Christian Century Co.,

235 E. 40th St., Chicago.

WITH THE WORKERS

Charles E. McVay will sing in a tent meeting at Deer Creek, Ill., beginning June 6.

A $400 increase in salary has been voted Pastor Gordon by the church at Niles, Ohio.

The annual ministerial institute of northern Indiana, was held at Huntington, May 10-12.

E. E. Cowperthwaite goes from River Edge, N. J., to Billings, Mont., where he becomes pastor of the Christian Church.

Howard T. Cree tells us that under Miss Lemert the attendance at the Bible-school in Atlanta, Ga., has been trebled. A modern Bible-school building will likely be erected.

Andrew P. Johnson, minister of the First Church, Fayette, Mo., preached the "Baccalaureate sermon" for the high school, May 16, in the Methodist church.

S. T. Shore is doing a successful work at Hereford, Texas, where with a membership now numbering 220 they are beginning the erection of a $20,000 church building.

First Church, Springfield, Ill., received an omnibus offering for missions, the second Sunday in May amounting to over $1,000. It is hoped to reach at least $1,200.

The first Church, Joplin, Mo., is rejoicing over an offering of $690.09 for Home and Foreign Missions. This is an indicator of health and spirit. Under the leadership of F. F. Walters this church will grow into the largest things.

The Churdan, Iowa church is in a meeting with R. Tibbs Maxey. They have no church building and only a handful of Disciples. The Baptists have opened their meeting house for the meeting.

The church at Turth, Neb., is making fine progress under the labors of Harry G. Knowles, and is looking forward hopefully to a meeting to be conducted by Edward Clutter.

H. E. Stafford changes his address from Ft. Wayne, Ind., to Massillon, Ohio, where he has taken the pastorate of the church. Two confessions rejoiced him at his first service, May 23.

W. H. Waggoner has just held fine institutes on missions and teacher training in La Crosse, Bowen, Mt. Pleasant, Colma, Denver, Clayton, New Bedford, Dixon and Walnut, Ill., He says: "The interest is splendid and audiences good in spite of bad weather."

Dr. H. H. Guy, formerly missionary to Japan and president of Drake College there, was recently elected dean of the Bible Seminary of the University of California. He has accepted. Dr. Guy was graduated from Drake University later, receiving the Ph. D. degree from Yale University.

Robert Lord Cave, pastor of the West Side Church, San Francisco, expects to go into business there June 1, and not take another pastorate this year. It is announced that H. O. Breeden will succeed him at "West Side."

E. M. Todd, recently pastor at Manchester, N. H., has accepted a call to the First Church at Ft. Wayne, Ind., and has already begun his ministry there. We congratulate both the church and Brother Todd upon the beginnings of what we are sure will be a happy and prosperous pastorate.

Ray O. Miller, former pastor of the church in Ft. Wayne, Ind., is spending some time on the Pacific Coast visiting and traveling. Mr. Miller passed through Chicago last week and called at our office. Here is a well equipped preacher which some California church will likely capture in the next few months.

Arthur Stout of Artesia, N. M., writes: "During the last three months our church membership has increased sixty-five in numbers. We have given $410 to missions and shall raise $125 on Children's Day. Last month the Artesia church loaned me to Hagerman for a meeting of three weeks. This resulted in seven additions to the church, which had only fifteen members, and the liquidation of their $1,000 debt."

Telegrams

Monmouth, Ill., May 30.—Closed at Red Oak last Wednesday. Brother Nicol a grand workman in the Master's cause. The meeting was very successful. Stopped off here to renew old acquaintances with Brother Hughes and to encourage and stimulate the brethren on my way to Keysport, Ill., for meeting. Time all taken. The Lord be praised.—Thompson, The Egyptian.

Evansville, Ind., May 30.—Forty-five added today. 363 in thirteen days. Our company was invited here by Bethany and Central Christian Churches, a part of the members of the First Christian Church also co-operating. This city of eighty thousand has 287 saloons, three breweries. Our churches are not strong here, but we have some noble consecrated souls in Evansville and a bright day is dawning. Evans hall, the largest auditorium in the city, is filled nightly and converts have averaged twenty-eight per day. God giveth the increase.—Charles Reign Scoville.

Cincinnati, Ohio, May 29.—Gain from churches $1,630.18 last week. Total gain in church offerings to date $2,197.47. Larger churches yet to hear from. Urge churches to remit cash.—Ranshaw and Denton.

Chung King, West China, April 6.—Just a word to let you know I have reached this point in safety. Am leaving tomorrow and hope to get to Batang in ten more weeks if we make good time. (Left Nankin, February 19.) I am well and gaining weight on the trip. (Part of the weight is most likely dirt.) I am enjoying this wild life and am still glad I am headed for the interior. Will report again when I leave the river at Kiatang. Regards to everybody.—Z. T. Loftis.

The above interesting note just came from Dr. Z. T. Loftis, who is on his way to Tibet as a missionary of the Foreign Society. He left Nankin, China, on the 29th of February. He expects to reach Batang, his destination, about June 20. A four months' journey across China! The last eleven hundred miles he will travel by Chinese wheelbarrow and sedan chair. The last 500 miles is over the high mountain passes of West China. One of these passes is 16,500 feet high. On this last part of the journey his baggage will be carried on the backs of Yaks and Llamas. He joins Dr. and Mrs. Shelton and J. C. Ogden and wife at Batang. Our people have the most remote mission station in the world at Batang.

George L. Snively has just concluded a splendid series of evangelistic services with the church in Valdosta, Ga. He was assisted by Prof. William Leigh of Akron, Ohio, as soloist and chorus leader. The meeting lasted a little more than two weeks. There were seventeen additions, all adults. Eight of these were by letter, two from another church and seven by confession and baptism. On the last Sunday of the meeting Mr. Snively raised by subscription $1,345 with which to pay off the entire indebtedness of the church. The pastor R. W. Wallace writes: "The attendance was unusually good throughout the meeting. Frequently people had to be turned away for lack of room."

Marion Stevenson, national superintendent of Bible-schools, is conducting frequent larries and conferences in our large centers. On Sunday, May 9, he spoke to the Turtle Creek Church, Pittsburg, Pa., in the morning, and at the Bellmar Ave. Church, Pittsburg, at night. In the afternoon representatives of nearly all the Bible-schools of greater Pittsburg assembled at the First Church. A majority of the superintendents of the city with a very large number of teachers was present. The attendance at this rally was solicited by the adult Bible classes. Mr. Stevenson also attended the western Pennsylvania convention at Johnstown, Pa., and gave a number of devotional Bible readings, conferences upon Bible-school methods, and also presented the work of the National Christian Bible-School Association.

Professor Charles M. Sharp, of the Bible college of Missouri, who has been elected Dean for the next year, reports the prospects of that institution as very promising. He brings to his new position not only the teaching values which he has manifested there for two years past but as well a competent store of executive ability which will prove of value in the work of the college.

The "Vision Meeting" held by the Men's Association, First Church, Seattle, Wash., recently was very interesting. Talks were made by Gen. McIntyre on "Seattle After Ten Years, from the Viewpoint of the Old-timer," "Seattle After Ten Years, from the Viewpoint of a Newcomer," by Dr. Carney, "The Place of the Church in the City's Growth," by Rev. Joseph L. Garvin, "The First Christian Church After Ten Years," by Clifford Wiley.

East Orange, N. J.: 126 accessions since entering our new building November 29. 476 in Bible-school yesterday. We now have the largest school in our city. Mr. Carnegie has given us half the money for our new organ; we hope to install it this summer. A beautifully framed appreciation of our work; $300 increase in salary; two weeks (extra) vacation, and all expenses on a sea voyage to New Orleans—these are among the nice things our congregation has done for us recently. Z. T. Sweeney's ten day Institute did us great good. If your people need to be refreshed regarding our plea, call him. W. D. Cunningham visited us in January. He left $150 worth of missionary information and enthusiasm and tools that amount for his work in Tokio. His visit will help every missionary offering of the year. Let him talk to your people, he will do them good.—L. N. D. Wells.

A REBELLION
Food Demanded.

The human body will stand a lot of abuse but sometimes it will surely rebel and demand the proper food in place of the pasty, starchy, greasy stuffs on which it has been made sick.

Then is the time to feed Grape-Nuts, the most scientific and perfect food in the world.

A lady of Washington says: "Three years ago I was very ill with catarrh of the stomach and was given up to die by one doctor. I laid in bed four months and my stomach was so weak that I could not keep down medicine or hardly any kind of food and was so weak and emaciated after four months of this starvation that my daughter could easily lift me from bed and put me in my chair.

"But weak as my stomach was, it accepted and relished and digested Grape-Nuts without any difficulty the first time that wonderful food was tried.

"My doctor told me to eat Grape-Nuts, which were predigested, and although I felt certain I could not keep the food on my stomach I made the trial and it was a most complete success.

"I am now strong and in better health than for a great many years and am gradually growing still stronger. I rely on Grape-Nuts for most of the nourishment that I get. The results have certainly been wonderful in my case and prove that no stomach is so weak it will not digest Grape-Nuts.

"My baby got so fat from feeding on Grape-Nuts I was afraid I would have to stop giving the food to him, but I guess it is a healthy fat for his health is perfect."

"Look in pkgs. for the famous little book, "The Road to Wellville." "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

Centennial Bulletin

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

The Dearth of Preachers

The most notable utterance of the Presbyterian General Assembly at Denver was the address of their secretary of education with its crushing statement of the lack and keen analysis of the reasons for the shortage. Every other religious body in the world faces the same conditions, though all may not yet be thoroughly alive to their significance. We have a choice collection of proverbs on the human disposition that neglects providing a supply of bandages and linseed oil until after the Fourth of July, and leaves all of the school building without fire escapes until one of them is burned down.

We cannot pretend to be wiser than our neighbors in this matter, but we are more fortunate. Woefully short as we are of preachers, we are better supplied than our neighbors. This may be because we are younger. It may be because of the greater liberty in teaching which we allow. It may be because our prevalent teaching is truer to the Word of God. It may be because our members are poorer. In a measure it certainly is due to the considerable number of preachers that come to us from the denominations. However it is we must recognize the fact that in preparing preachers, as in training lions and tigers, you need to catch the subject young. If you have the parents it is all the better. The agitation of this year will not fill our pulpits next year, and will only begin to show results in four or five years.

This makes all the more imperative the universal observance in every church every year of at least one day devoted to the agitation of this question, and the call for ministerial volunteers. If it was neglected May 30, let some other suitable day be used.

The Source and the Channel of Supply.

We must forever look to the church and the home, the minister and the Bible-school, for recruits to the ministry. Unless they carefully and prayerfully set before the boys the duty and the privilege of preaching the gospel, the supply of preachers will inevitably fail. But the choice of the ministry as a life calling, or the acceptance of the call to preach, must be followed by thorough preparation. For this we look to the college. Not to the State University, not to the Roman Catholic, Presbyterian or Methodist College, but to our own colleges intimately associated, and absolutely identified with our churches. So the call for a thousand volunteers to the ministry necessitates the call for additional endowment for the colleges in which the preachers must be trained.

The Representative College.

Every institution of learning among us has its centennial endowment aim more or less widely published, and more or less vigorously pursued. Among them all Bethany stands unique, and is recognized by them as well as by those whom might be considered disinterested as having a preëminent claim upon the hearts and purses of all who are engaged in the Restoration Movement. The statesmanlike plea of the greatest men of affairs among us is, that we must give Bethany a half million dollars of additional endowment. Her constant service to young men and young women who are not destined for the ministry fully warrants such support. Her historic place and influence in the development and advancement of the cause adds Centennial emphasis to the call. The representative character of the institution which has furnished teachers for all our schools, preachers for all our states, and missionaries for all our fields, as well as cultured Christian men and women for all sections of our land, makes Bethany's call in the Centennial year the call of Christian education in general. To disregard the appeal made now in behalf of Bethany is to deny the whole education propaganda.

Leading Gifts.

The first quarter of the proposed half million is half provided; $25,000 of it is pledged by the man who made the proposition, $25,000 has been given by United States Senator George T. Oliver of Pittsburg. $12,000 or $13,000 has been subscribed in smaller sums. We are hopefully expecting an early announcement of other large gifts. But let us not wait while we expect, but let every one in his own place do what he can. With the matter fairly presented, and the situation fully recognized, it seems scarcely possible that there is one Disciple in a million who will allow the Centennial to pass without identifying himself, by a gift of at least $1.00 with the great college which Alexander Campbell established for the advancement of primitive Christianity. Don't wait to be solicited, but write today to Pres. T. E. Cramblet, Bethany, W. Va., or to Dr. W. T. Moore whose address for a while will be at Butler College, Indianapolis.

The Greater Children's Day.

The June number of the Missionary Review of the World contains an article on the "Missionary Scudders" which should prove an inspiration as well as a rebuke to every Christian family in America. Dr. John Scudder was the first medical missionary to go out from this continent. He embarked with his wife in 1819 for Ceylon under the auspices of the Board of Foreign Missions of the Reformed Church in America. Just at that time there was no other medical missionary at work in all the world. Their home on the field was blessed with many children, and the constant prayer was, that these might all be missionaries. The answer to the prayer gave seven men and two women to missions in Japan and India. The same purpose prevailed in the homes of the second generation, and fifteen grandchildren have entered the missionary service. In addition to these, three of the grandsons are ministers of the gospel in the United States, and one son and one grandson died while in college preparing for the mission field.

Compared with such absolute devotion to the great commission of our Lord, how inadequate appear the largest gifts of money. Put into your Children's Day service, and into the preparations that go before that service, constant thought and prayer for missionary volunteers. This will not discourage, but will stimulate gifts of money. If we can have a thousand volunteers for missionary service at home and abroad, there will be no difficulty whatever about securing a Children's Day offering of $100,000 for the lands beyond the seas.

Pittsburg News

A whirlwind campaign for the financial support of the Centennial is being planned for a week in June. The ministers in and around Pittsburg are assisting the business men in visiting the large business concerns of the city.

A. H. Jordan of New Castle read a paper on "Christian Socialism" at the Monday Ministers' Meeting which provoked considerable discussion.

The best report of the week came from the Bible-schools. Knoxville led off with 458, in attendance, followed by Bellevue with 344, and McKeesport with 336.

The Carnegie Church has a baseball team, and is playing with five other teams in the town with considerable promise of being the winning team. A Bethany Bible-class has been formed with fifty as its aim before organization. W. R. Errett is the superintendent.

An outing has been planned by the association for June 12. The ministers and their friends will visit the site of the old Brush Run Church, the place of the baptism of the Campbells, and other points of historic interest connected with the first days of our movement.

The next meeting will be held at Wilkinsburg. This is the joint meeting of the association and the C. W. B. M. auxiliaries. It promises to be a delightful affair.

O. H. Philips.

Young People's Missionary Conference

It is hoped that many of our people will attend one of the conferences of the Young People's Missionary Movement to be held this summer. These conferences are as follows:

Whitby, Ontario, Canada, July 2 to 9.

Lake Geneva, Wis., July 2 to 11.

Asheville, N. C., July 2 to 11.

Silver Bay, Lake George, N. Y., July 23 to August 1.

Sunday-school and Missions Conference, Silver Bay, Lake George, N. Y., July 15 to 22.

Here is a rare opportunity to combine a delightful vacation with a rich spiritual and intellectual feast. These conferences are brief training courses for missionary leadership in the local congregation. The rates are reasonable.

Write H. A. Denton, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, or Stephen J. Corey, Box 884 Cincinnati.

In February, '08, Rev. Edgar DeWitt Jones, of Bloomington, gave our Founders' Day Address. This spring he gave before the Men's Club of the church, his lecture on the "Religion of Abraham Lincoln." This is a substantial contribution to the Lincoln literature of the Centenary Celebration of this year, 1909.

On the evening of Arbor Day he again delighted the entire community—pupils of the Public Schools, students of the College and citizens of the town—in his "Evening with the Poets of the Plain People." He is a sympathetic interpreter of such poets as Frank L. Stanton, Sam Walter Foss, Ruth McEnery Stuart, James Whitcomb Riley, and Eugene Field. He not only entertains but what is vastly more important, instructs. The audience is not bored with any of the agonies of elocution, but is charmed by the simple presentation of the best thought of the poets that know the way to the hearts of the common people. Mr. Jones is a welcome visitor to Eureka.

R. E. Hieronymus.

OVER THE FENCE

Neighbor Says Something.

The front yard fence is a famous council place on pleasant days. Maybe to chat with some one along the street, or for friendly gossip with next door neighbor. Sometimes it is only small talk but other times neighbor has something really good to offer.

An old resident of Baird, Texas, got some mighty good advice this way once.

He says:

"Drinking coffee left me nearly dead with dyspepsia, kidney disease and bowel trouble, with constant pains in my stomach, back and side, and so weak I could scarcely walk.

"One day I was chatting with one of my neighbors about my trouble and told her I believed coffee hurt me. Neighbor said she knew lots of people to whom coffee was poison and she pleaded with me to quit it and give Postum a trial. I did not take her advice right away but tried a change of climate which did not do me any good. Then I dropped coffee and took up Postum.

"My improvement began immediately and I got better every day I used Postum.

"My bowels became regular and in two weeks all my pains were gone. Now I am well and strong and can eat anything I want to without distress. All of this is due to my having quit coffee, and to the use of Postum regularly.

"My son, who was troubled with indigestion, thought that if Postum helped me so, it might help him. It did, too, and he is now well and strong again.

"We like Postum as well as we ever liked the coffee and use it altogether in my family in place of coffee and all keep well." "There's a Reason." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human interest.

About People

—President Joseph F. Smith, head of the Mormon Church, is also president of the beet sugar factories in Utah, and in a speech in the senate a few days ago Senator Clay of Georgia charged that he fixes the price of beets against the farmers and for the factories. The senator also declared that President Smith receives a salary of $20,000 a year from the factories.

—George Meredith, the noted English author, who has just died was born in Hampshire, England, in 1828. His first book, a volume of poems appeared in 1851. He acted as correspondent for the London Mail during Garibaldi's struggle for independence in Italy in 1886. Marriage misfits, strange honeymoons, and various queer marital developments, which figure so strongly in Meredith's novels, gave his books a large circulation with the widening of the discussion of the divorce problem in the last twenty years. Four years ago the aged author, then seventy-seven years old, startled the world with his advocacy of trial marriages.

—King Manuel of Portugal has bestowed upon Queen Amelie, widow of King Carlos, the decorations of three orders for the heroism displayed by her majesty on the occasion of the assassinations of her husband and son in February of 1908. These orders are the Order of Christ, the Order of Santiago, and the military Order of Saint Benoit d'Aviz.

—Lieut. Gen. Anatole H. Stoessel and Rear Admiral Nebgatoff have been released from the fortress of St. Peter and St. Paul by order of Emperor Nicholas. The health of both men has been gravely affected by their confinement. Gen. Stoessel was found guilty by courtmartial of surrendering the fortress of Port Arthur to the Japanese, and was serving a sentence of ten years' imprisonment.

Revivalism and the Church's Character

Does Popular Revivalistic Method Make a Church that Can Do What it is Meant to Do?

In our study of the successful revival we have been striving to keep in mind constantly the true criterion of evangelistic success. This we have established to be the welfare of the Kingdom of God. Not in numbers of conversions, nor in an emotional stirring up of the community, nor in the building up of the church as an institution are we to find the test of success, for each of these must itself be tested and measured by its significance for the Kingdom of God.

Concerning the converts it must be asked, What were they converted to? Concerning the emotional excitement it must be asked, What is it all about? Concerning the church's upbuilding it remains to be determined to what extent that church's success as an institution will advance the Kingdom of God to which it is related as means to end.

If this particular church exists apart from the community, insulated within the community, an imperium in imperio, obviously practical Christian men whe are seeking first of all the Kingdom of God will take little interest in its welfare.

If the church in question makes sectarians of its new accessions, if it develops a clannish consciousness in them, instead of a social consciousness, if it narrows their vision of the world instead of broadening it, all would agree with us that such a church's success would not be a matter greatly to rejoice in.

If, for example, an anti-organ, anti-missionary church received five hundred accessions to its membership as the result of a revival, we, for our part, would not regard the event as an unmixed good. Certainly it would not have the significance for the Kingdom of God as that many additions to a church flaming with missionary zeal would have.

It is an utter misreading of our words to make them mean that we object to numbers. We pray for numbers. Likewise we are not opposing entnusiasm. No great thing can be done without enthusiasm, and we are not able to see how a soul can be truly turned from the power of Satan to God without experiencing great excitement. Neither are we discounting the value of the church. It is the "pillar and support of the truth"; without it the Kingdom of God would perish.

Nor yet does our re-examination of revivalistic methods and results imply our wholesale condemnation of the evangelism of our own and other brotherhoods. We believe in evangelists. And we devoutly wish to see their calling reclaimed from the disrepute into which it has fallen among thoughtful moral leaders.

Not many will question the statement that our present day evangelism visits the churches with a mixture of good and evil results. Some wise minds are even questioning whether the evils of popular evangelism are not so serious as to amount to a scandal. No less an authority than an evangelist himself used this word in our presence recently in discussing the subject.

The truth is that our evangelism needs reforming. There will be differences as to how serious are the faults that need to be corrected; some will consider them incidental, others will regard them as of the essence of the evangelistic method. What concerns us is not to measure the gravity of the faults but to establish a test, by means of which these faults may be seen as faults and corrected.

This test we have seen is not numbers nor enthusiasm nor institutional success. We make ourselves liable to all sorts of self-deceptions and illusions when we measure our works by these tests. By them Rome would justify herself, and Christian Science and Mormonism and Socialism and every kind of doctrine and institution.

Quantitative success is not the church's concern: that is God's concern: He gives the increase.

The one thing the church is not responsible for is quantity of results.

The one thing the church is responsible for is quality of work.

Every minister of Christ, pastor or evangelist, should thoroughly absorb the principle in Paul's chapter about building the Temple of God. "Let every man take heed how he buildeth thereupon"—is the apostle's injunction. The method and the spirit of one's work are the important considerations for the workman.

With this in mind, in order to save our discussion from the charge of being merely academic we suggested last week a number of concrete questions which an earnest evangelist who takes as the test of his work the welfare of the Kingdom of God will ask his own soul. Those questions considered the effect of the evangelistic meeting upon the local church and community.

They all lead up to this question which concerns the effect of evangelistic method upon the character of the church in general—the brotherhood as a whole and the church catholic:

Does the church built up by typical revivalistic methods, or largely influenced by them, realize the full possibilities of Christianity either in individual character or in social effectiveness?

This is a difficult question for evangelist or pastor to weigh seriously. It is difficult for the pastor, because the problems of his local church are so urgent and immediate that they eclipse the more remote consequences of his methods. His office-bearers—practical men—judge the success of his pastorate by numbers of additions, size of congregation, improvement of church property, decrease of debt and so forth. In comparison with these immediate, concrete values a consideration of whether his work is realizing the possibilities of Christianity seems remote and thin.

It is difficult for the evangelist to consider such a question because he is constantly in the electric atmosphere of intense human feeling and numerical success. Standing inside a typical revival one can hardly imagine anything else more important. Only as one sees it in perspective, in its relation to the Kingdom of God, do its inadequacy, its irrelevancies, its illusion and its harmful tendencies appear.

It would be a boon to our present day evangelism and would prove a blessing to the church catholic if our evangelists could get their conscience's consent to stop their work for a season and go into retreat for study and prayer. Away from the tumult and the shouting, far from the clatter of revivalistic machinery, with open minds, desirous of measuring their success by no standard save that of the welfare of the Kingdom of God in personal character and social progress—there let our evangelists read and discuss the great books of the great teachers who are expressing and creating the spiritual consciousness of our times. Let them also re-examine the method of Jesus the Master Evangelist, and, in the light of his method and the results he regarded as worth-while, let them search their hearts with this question:

Does our evangelism build up a church which has the point of view or the power of realizing the possibilities of the Christianity of Christ?

They might come back with a method and an aim that would revolutionize our churches in the conceptions of office-bearers, pastors and editors!

We have in mind no such assembly as the so-called "Conferences on Evangelism" set on the platform of a summer assembly where merely evangelistic methods are discussed. The true problems of evangelism lie deeper than the devising of tricks for getting results. The whole aim and conception of evangelism, assumed without challenge underneath these discussions of methods, must be searchingly re-examined.

Next week we shall ourselves consider this question, whether Christianity can adequately realize itself through the present day evangelistic method.

The Trend of Events

THE FIGHT ON THE GREAT WHITE PLAGUE

The Fifth Annual Meeting of the Association for the Study and Prevention of Tuberculosis was held in Washington in May. It reports established during the year eighty-six hospitals and sanatoriums, eighty-five dispensaries, and 136 new associations. There are now a total of 290 associations organized to promote the fight and 298 hospitals and sanatoriums and 222 dispensaries working in the daily task of helping the poor victims of this dread disease. The National Association urges that 75,000 new beds be provided for the segregation of the worst cases. They cost but $1.25 per day apiece.

ALDRICH'S REVISION OF THE TARIFF

All parties agreed in the recent presidential campaign that the time had come for a downward revision of the tariff. By the power of some unseen hand of modern political organization the senate bill is the work of Senator Aldrich, representative of the trust in the upper house of our congress. Mr. Aldrich does not argue for a revision downward. Here are some results of his revision as published by himself on the basis of ad valorem duties; upwards—chemicals, oils, paints, sugar, molasses, agricultural products, cotton manufactures, flax, hemp, pulp paper, books; downwards—earthenware, glassware, wood manufactures, metal manufactures, tobacco. In the total the revision is a raise of 4 per cent over the present schedule. Will Mr. Aldrich or Mr. Taft prevail?

ALFALFA BREAD

It is reported, but not vouched for, that a Creighton College Club of Scientific Students has demonstrated the feasability of making flour out of the upper leaves and stems of Alfalfa clover and that this flour makes delicious bread and pastry. If this be so Alfalfa may be not only King of the Plains, but Queen of the Kitchens. The report states that the stems and leaves are carefully selected from all weeds or foreign seeds that may be in the clover, thoroughly dried, ground and bleached, resulting in a creamy flour. This is then made up much as is wheat flour and can be used for bread, muffins, cakes, mush and other palatables and is said to be exceedingly light and easily digested. The cost is not estimated to be much under that of wheat flour.

THE REAL REASON WOMEN CANNOT VOTE

Lord Cromer, much heralded master of imperialism and monitor of all that is aristocratic, has given the real reason women cannot vote. His Imperial Lordship's frankness is at least refreshing. He does not veil his reason behind pious or charitable excuses. He says with plain speech that she should not vote simply because she is not a man. For the same reason that he would put the property in the hands of the white and the work upon the shoulders of the Fellahin in Egypt—because he is not a white-man. The Pope enforces the reason of Egypt's white master and does it with consistency since he is the great living master of all that represents the medieval. He says "After creating man, God created woman and determined her mission, namely, that of being man's companion, helpmeet and consolation. It is a mistake, therefore, to maintain that woman's rights are the same as man's. Woman, created as man's companion, must so remain, under the power of love and affection, but always under his power."

HOME BUILDER AND SPECULATOR

Uncle Sam's great irrigating projects are the wonder and admiration of the world. Our Uncle is doing it for the sake of the home-builder. But see how the speculator beats him in his well meant enterprise. Work is now begun on the Elephant Butte dam in New Mexico. It will cost $40,000,000 and the land benefited will be assessed $40 per acre to cover this outlay. This the farmer will pay in ten annual installments of $4 per acre. Now Uncle Sam will allow no one man to obtain water for more than 160 acres after the dam is completed. But while the dam is being built and before it began building speculators bought up some 90 per cent of the land to be benefitted or procured options on it from the Mexican owners. Today they are asking $50 per acre for it from those who will become bona-fide home-builders. They will not ask for water rights or farm it, but the man who does must first pay them.

MILLIONS IN WHEAT

The Patten wheat deal is consumated and the great broker retires from the game with millions profit. Doubtless he will further enhance his name as a great philanthropist with the lucre and go down in denominational annals as one of the most benevolent of the brethren. Secretary of Agriculture Wilson says his deal put wheat forty cents above the normal price. This has been no boon to the farmer if indeed one could admit that an artificial price could be called a boon to any class of producers. The price went up after the farmer had disposed of most of his crop so he got little benefit from it. The speculator got the benefit of the artificial forcing up of the price. Prof. Jno. Lee Coulter illustrates how this happens by the example of 1896. The farmers of the northwest marketed in August at 51 cents. A few months later the speculator was selling to the miller for $1.62 per bushel. The bread eating working man and his children paid the difference into the pockets of the speculator. The money of such men may not be tainted, but the man who defends such practices certainly is.

THE CONGO LIBEL CASES

Wm. Morrison and W. H. Shepherd, two American missionaries in the Congo Free State who have furnished damaging evidence against the free-booting rubber monopolies of King Leopold, have been sued before the courts of the Free State for libel. One wonders what sort of a verdict can be expected by a court of that government, but the report of the Belgian Commission furnishes some hope that the whole matter will not be whitewashed. It will be remembered that the Commission sent out to justify the crafty king returned to condemn. Mr. Shepherd and others have doubtless been told many extravagant stories by the natives in their rude ignorance of the laws of evidence and their burning hate of their persecutors. But that all the stories of atrocity are manufactured the kings own Commission found not true. Were they all untrue the expropriation of the land would be crime enough.

THE JANUS FACE OF REFORM

Good men everywhere are pleading for the break up of hard and fast party lines. The independent voter is the hope of reform. Now appears the Janus face of independence, the Mr. Hyde of our benovelent Dr. Jekyl. It is bi-partizanship as opposed to non-partizanship. It consists in the worst elements of both parties combining against the good of either. The major example of this was afforded by the Illinois legislature in the electing, by a bi-partizan combination of the worst elements of both parties at Springfield, of Wm. Lorimer to the United States Senate. Led by Lee O'Niel Brown, the Democrats gave him as many votes as did those of his own party and no honest man doubts regarding the motives that prompted it. In Oregon the people chose a true and tried man of the minority party for the senate and he was elected by virtue of the independent vote of the people. In Illinois a ward boss and "prince of wire-pullers" was elected by an unholy bi-partizan combination of misrepresentatives of the people.

TITHING THE MINT AND ANISE OF THE LAW

By the nature of law the kernel must be separated from the husk sometimes in judicial decisions. Form is a very essential part of legal procedure, but form always tends to crush out spirit and the great tribunals are often no exception to the old legalists in this regard. A case in hand is the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States interpreting the Hepburn Railroad Rate Law. The famous Commodities Clause of this law was the kernel of it. It made it impossible for a railroad to own a great commodity, such as the Reading's ownership of anthracite, in such a manner as to give it all advantage over competitors and constitute it a monopoly. The Court rules that the law is good in form i. e., no railroad can formally own an anthracite field, but the same men can organize themselves into a separate corporation and own that same anthracite field and do business just as before and the railroad corporation can hold all the stock of the separate corporation. Thus the only effect of the law is to compel the company to organize its coal business into a separate corporation. All the old evils remain. The people get the husk of form.

the anthracite monopoly the kernel of profit. As usual Justice Harlan dissented. Harlan is invariably for the people.

A ROOSEVELTIAN IDEA ADOPTED

Colorado, though with both a Democratic legislature and governor, has adopted one of the ideas advocated by ex-President Roosevelt in one of his messages, and thus gives it the first test. It has passed a law making it a crime to make any private contribution to an election fund and appropriating a sum equal to twenty-five cents for each voter, said fund to be paid from the public treasury and divided between the various political parties according to the number of votes it registered for governor at the last election. Those who distribute these funds for the parties will be required to give bonds and one-half the contribution will go to the county chairmen, pro-rated according to the number of votes cast for each party in each county. The candidates themselves may put up cash, but it must be limited by sworn statement to 40 per cent of the first year's salary of the office for which he is a candidate. Corporations that make a contribution will be severely dealt with if the law is enforced. The aim of the law is certainly wholesome. It will put on end to bribery, slush funds, the hiring of hordes of "workers," corporate influence through contributions, and most of the ills contingent upon money at election time. To prevent the politicians spending money if they desire to corrupt the ballot will hardly be entirely effected even by this excellent law however. It can be collected in extra-official ways and distributed by private workers. But it will help discourage the practice and will make it easy for clean candidates to conduct more effective campaigns. Again it will put the independent candidate at a disadvantage because he will have no funds aside from his own contributions.

A COLLEGE BROUGHT TO YOUR DOORS

Massachusetts leads in practically all social legislation and in practical efforts to socialize public effort. Her latest undertaking, not yet adopted, but in a fair way to be, is that of a people's college. Mr. Edmund D. Barbour is the chief promoter of the idea and will guarantee a fund of $3,000,000 for the project when a workable plan is presented. The idea is to send teachers to various parts of the state and have them give instruction in municipal buildings and other places that can be provided without much expense, thus bringing instruction to the very doors of the people. There will be night instruction and everything done to make learning possible to all who desire it, but who have not the time or the means to go to the ordinary college. The heads of the various colleges and universities in the state, together with other educators, will constitute a general board of advisers and determine prerequisites for the gaining of degrees. This will at least insure against the lowering of academic standards. Would it not be a wiser philanthropy to give millions for this sort of a college than to a great university where but few, and a considerable proportion of those able to pay their own way, receive the benefits?

EDITORIAL

An interesting little pamphlet has been prepared by Mrs. Ella S. Stewart, President of the Illinois Equal Suffrage Association, entitled "Northwestern University and Woman's Suffrage." This pamphlet contains the opinions of a large number of the members of the faculty of that institution. Not all of these opinions are favorable, but the total value of the document is very great as showing the tendencies of thought on this subject among modern educators. An admirable appendix furnishes indication of the results of woman's suffrage activities in those states where the system prevails.

A recent paragraph was quoted from Professor Albion W. Small in an editorial in the British Weekly to the effect that the Americans are the most unhappy people in the world because they are the most prosperous. The effect of the quotation as used was to entirely misinterpret Professor Small's sentiments, and in writing of it to a friend he says: "It is astonishing how one's reputation can go round the world as a pessimist because of one's most direct efforts made to interpret experience in terms of optimism. It is astonishing that any of us can keep from being pessimists with that kind of newspaper treatment."

Dr. Charles Hastings Dodd, pastor of the Eutah Place Baptist Church, Baltimore, Maryland, who presented the magnificent paper at the Bloomington Congress on the union of Baptists and Disciples is to start on a visit to the Pacific coast where he is to supply the pulpit of Dr. Robert Burdette at Los Angeles in July and to preach at the Long Beach Chautauqua on the first Sunday in August. On his return to the East it may be possible for him to preach in some of our churches. We believe that he has already promised Mr. Idleman of the Central Church in Des Moines a service. It would be a rich experience for any of our churches to secure Dr. Dodd who has done so much to interpret the spirit of union with the Disciples to his brethren of the Baptist church. He has partially promised to occupy the pulpit at Memorial Church of Christ in this city on his way through Chicago.

The Anti-Saloon League is making extensive preparations for its biennial convention to be held in Chicago, December 6-9. An attractive program is being prepared. During the evenings of the conference week there will be from twenty-five to thirty mass-meetings throughout the city and especially in the densely populated districts of the city where temperance meetings are seldom held. On Friday afternoon there will be a parade in which every state in the union will be represented with flags, banners, maps, etc., showing the extent of the progress made in temperance reform in each state in the past two years. Sunday, December 5, is to be made an outside field day with representatives of the League in the pulpits of Chicago. On Monday there will probably be a union preachers' meeting under the direction of the Federal Council of Churches, at which the theme will be that of the work of the Anti-Saloon League.

In his talk to Chicago men the other evening Dr. Royal J. Dye told an incident of the meeting at Bolenge which Professor Frederick Starr attended. Professor Starr is the well known anthropologist and was traveling and studying through that part of Africa where our mission is located. At the close of the service when the communion was reached Dr. Starr explained that he was not a communicant, but would like to stay if it would not be regarded as an embarrassment to the missionaries to have a white man present who could not partake of the emblems. Being assured that his presence was heartily welcomed he remained. Dr. Dye asked one of the black men to lead in returning thanks for loaf and cup. After the customary words of the prayer were spoken the black man, in his own language, not understood by the distinguished scholar, prayed God to bless their visitor, "and grant that he may see something in us that will recommend Thee." Not until last week did Dr. Dye tell Professor Starr of the prayer, and he did it with such deft and delicate sympathy as touched the heart not only of the Christian men present, but of the scholar as well.

There is something heartening in the thought that the goal of foreign missionary effort is to render such effort superfluous. The communication from the China Centenary Missionary Conference printed elsewhere in this issue presents a view of the situation in that country which ought to kindle the imagination of the Christian world. We are not working in the dark, they say. Vast as the work is that is to be done in China, there is a limit. Send us 3,200 men and 1,600 women evangelists and these workers with those already in the field will call out from heathenism enough converts to equip 150,000 native evangelists in a few years. Christianity in China would then be self-supporting. The church would then have discharged her obligation to evangelize that great people. China would then be contributing out of the rich treasure of its own Christian experience an interpretation that would enrich the Christian experience of the world. The communication from the China conference has this value that it measures for us the size of the enterprise upon which the church has embarked. Rev. Frank Garrett, one of the signers of the appeal, represents the Disciples of Christ.

A man by the name of Bolce is writing three articles in the Cosmopolitan magazine which have set a lot of people talking. He assumes to "expose" the doctrines of representative teachers in the great universities of the land—the sociologists, the political economists and the theologians. The outside world has no idea how revolutionary are the teachings of such men as Professor Woodrow Wilson, of Princeton, William James and Barrett Wendell, of Harvard, E. A. Ross of the University of Wisconsin, Shailer Mathews of Chicago and dozens of others whom he names and promises to name. They are "blasting at the Rock of Ages," he says. They "reduce the Ten Commandments to a syllabus." They make out that our fathers fought the Revolutionary war for principles that were pure fictions, the Declaration of Independence being woven out of the impossible and now obsolete philosophy of Rousseau. These and such like teachings are charged to our universities. Some people hail these articles with smug "I told you so's." Others are outraged at the vicious misrepresentation that characterizes them. Still others accept the author's thesis and stand horrified at his amazing revelations. Some believe the author is a thoroughly modern man himself, but is writing to provoke a discussion. We have a reason for believing that he is nothing of the sort. This is our reason: If he knew his business he would be able to make out a much stronger case than he does. He has a big subject. Think of it: The Revolution Wrought By Modern Scientific Method—in every department of human thinking! He treats it with outrageous inadequacy. It is too big for him. So he plays smart with the men who represent the movement, clipping sentences from their contexts and often making a man say the very opposite of that which he did say. No, the trouble with this man Bolce's "revolution" is that it isn't a big enough one to fit the facts. The real revolution is more radical and significant than this skimmer dreams.

In his page devoted to Correspondence on the Religious Life, Mr. Campbell recently made the statement that there would no doubt remain after the discussion over Christian Science had subsided, "a residue of truth." This phrase discloses a point of view which every man of broad sympathies and open mind would do well to cultivate. Those opponents of Christian Science like the author of "Christian Science in the Light of Holy Scripture" are furnishing an excellent example of how not to do it. To assume that one has demolished this new cult when he has quoted scripture texts against it is to commit the same fallacy as did the scribes who thought they had disposed of Jesus and his work when they showed him to be going contrary to their books and traditions. There are only two questions that need concern us as students of this strange religious phenomenon. First, What are the facts about it? and, second, can these facts be explained without turning our intellect upside down as Christian Science demands? As to the facts, no doubt the claims put forward by devotees are greatly exaggerated. But that many who suffer with a certain class of diseases are being healed admits of no doubt. So far nothing like trustworthy evidence has been offered that malignant diseases like cancer and tuberculosis have been cured. Although claims are made for the cure of even these it is more than likely that a mistaken diagnosis lies at the basis of these claims. As to explanation, happily psychology is offering a rational way of accounting for the phenomena without resorting to the outlandish ideas of "Science and Health." The Emmanuel movement faces in the right direction. Concerning it, the only question we feel like urging is whether or not that kind of business is the natural function of the church, or would we do better to leave it to physicians. However that question may be answered it is certain that already a considerable "residue of truth" is being deposited both in the ministry and in medicine, truth that will vitalize both callngs.

The Greatness of the Old Testament

If the New Testament is the Christian Odyssey, the sublime record of the soul's home-coming after long wanderings, not less is the Old Testament the Iliad of the race, the epic of the long and not unsuccessful struggle against the triple-walled stronghold whose conquest alone could end the strife. In the one the hero journeys far on many seas, hears the seven voices of temptation, tarries in the lotus isles of pleasure, beholds the horrors wrought on his companions by the necromancy of sin, rouses himself at last to the supreme task, braves the storm, the shipwreck and the fight, goes down even to the deeps of death, and comes home to love and glory like a king returning from his wars. In the other the field is full of fighting figures, the air is rent with shouting, the noise of battle lingers all day long among the mountains by the western sea, and the eye looks upon waving banners, charging squadrons, the flashing armor of the warriors and the garments dipped in blood. The New Testament is the story of the soul's achievement of freedom and of life through the power of the Highest. The Old Testament has not discovered the individual as yet, but concerns itself with the nation in its struggle for self-realization, expansion and knowledge. It is the earlier section of the volume which records the story of the world's spiritual education. Its utterances are preliminary, tentative, partial. Its morality is not final, its ideals are confused, its heroes are men of passion and fierce zeal. In its vivid narratives beasts at first are slaying men. It is only after many days that man begins to slay the beast.

The Old Testament is the total surviving literature of the Hebrew people during the classic period. The writings are gathered into the collection as we know it with little regard for chronological sequence or even external relationship. Our common arrangement of the books or pamphlets is but one of several in use at one time or another among the people to whom they first came, and is not necessarily the best of these. These thirty-nine tracts are by no means the total literary product of the ancient Hebrews, for they constantly refer to others which have perished. Nor are they all original compositions in their present form, for not a few of them give clear evidence of an interesting literary history prior to their entrance into the canon. As they stand they are exceedingly various in tone and theme. They include historical sermons, religious and ethical exhortations, national institutes, the prayers and praises of the faithful sayings of the wise, meditations on the problems of experience, priestly chronicles, genealogical lists, journals of reformers, hero stories from the past, religious interpretations of national tradition and mythology, prophetic forecasts of national and Messianic hopes, and apocalyptic figures of comfort and warning.

Yet in spite of this variety, in which all parts have not the same value, and in spite of the many voices that speak, and no two of them with quite the same message or the same insistence, there is a singular and impressive unity in this complex of writings. There are different levels of ethical demand, progressive epochs of religious instruction, advancing degrees of spiritual urgency; but the motive is identical and the direction unvarying. In the Old Testament there is a sense of some things found in no other ancient literature. It was not that other nations lacked religious interest. No people of that world were without gods. But Israel dealt with God, and came to a consciousness of his reality, unity and moral nature possessed by no other race. It is not that God was the Father of Israel alone, or concerned himself with one national experience, in forgetfulness of the rest, for God has never left himself without witness among any people. But in that history there was a realization of his presence and purpose as in no other. For this reason Israel's writings, such at least as have come into our possession, are pervaded by a unique sense of awareness, responsibility and urgency, which for want of a better name we call inspiration. But that quality is not merely resident in the documents. It belongs to that experience behind them, in which God was perceived to be moving as in no other history. The Hebrew religion occupies its unique place in the progress of the spiritual life through the inner experiences of that marvelous succession of men whose hearts and hopes and lonely steadfast faith were fixed on God, and who spoke for him because they had spoken with him. On all the horizon of pre-Christian days the Old Testament is the mountain peak which rises through many levels of spiritual discernment to that height of excellence and beauty from which one has visions of the eternal, which are the most prized possessions of all our moral being; an altitude "from which a soul, if it ascend on a clear day, may catch sight of the hills where its life arose, and at least a suggestion of the sea to which it shall go in the aftertime."

For this reason the Old Testament must ever hold the highest place among the sacred literatures of early times. It was the Bible of the Jewish people. Around it and the temple which wellnigh shared its sanctity in their eyes, they threw themselves like a wall of fire to repel all sacrilegious and defiling approach. To Jesus it was the Scripture, the writing whose hopes and forecasts found fulfilment in himself. It was his earliest study and his constant companion. On its great utterances he nourished his soul. From its arsenal he drew his weapons to beat back the onset of temptation. With its great spirits, the prophets, he lived in close companionship, and in the Psalms he found refreshment as from a well in the desert. While he used it with a sense of mastery that did not hesitate to revise its standards of conduct and replace its injunctions with loftier imperatives, yet he found in it the means of arousal, instruction and consolation. It was to him like rivers of water in a dry place, and as the shadow of a great rock in a weary land.

It is not strange that the early Christians, following the example of the Lord, should have held the Old Testament in highest reverence. It was to them the "sacred writings," the only literature which they could deem divinely given and authoritative. Around it there had gathered a host of other writings, histories, philosophies, apologies, hymns and apocalypses. But while these were popular and revered, it was the Old Testament which drew to itself the adoring veneration of the faithful. Even the writings of the New Testament as they gradually took form were not held to be so sacred as the books of the Old. These later writings were as yet too new to be held in the same regard as the prophets, the psalms and the law. They were rather the writings of the friends of Jesus than Holy Scripture. It required time for the church to assess rightly the values of that body of writings which was forming from day to day. But the Jewish Scriptures were an honored and prized possession, all the more precious that the Christians perceived them to be "gravida Christi," pregnant with that Messiah who in their own times had come to birth. It was upon this ground of the high authority of the Old Testament in the thought of the Jewish race that the earliest defenders of Christianity made their confident appeal to the law and the prophets. No argument could be more convincing than one drawn from the sacred books. And even the employment of the faulty methods of the Jewish schools or the allegorical interpretations so highly prized among the scribes impaired in no regard the value of such appeals. To the Jews, the first Christians, themselves Jews, became Jewish in their plea, that they might win their brethren to Christ. Upon the whole question of the regard in which the first Christians held the Old Testament the words of Paul are classic and final. "Every Scripture inspired of God is profitable for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness."

Shall Pastors Know Something about Art?

By T. Carl Whitmer

Supposed omniscience is too mild a word for the doers of good. Professor Jack, of All Trades University, is an idler and a specialist in comparison with those who live at (what used to be) the sign of the White Cravat.

Theology forms but a tenth of a "parson's" duties. He calls the attention of the sexton to gas leaks and mends them in his absence. He graphites the joints in the organ and quiets the lost-soul groans of the water motor. Incidentally—or, chronically—he draws on everything from painting to trolley cars to illustrate moralizings more clearly. All the similes of all arts and crafts lie (in several senses) at his disposal. He reads the language of souls and sculpture with varying success. He builds churches with architecture and ventilation slightly mixed. Perchance he uses ragtime paintings for his windows, which may explain some "platitudes in stained glass attitudes."

Minister Not Trained to Meet the Situation.

In other words, although a minister must concern himself with church decoration, he seldom knows much of ecclesiastical symbols and less of stuffs; although he finds himself obliged to supervise the building plans of a church, he does not know the difference between a gargoyle and a clerestory; although in the frequent absence of skilled musicians, he has to put his hand to the plow, he is very uncertain as to the quality of hymns, not often knowing gospel hymns from worthy chorales, fugues from exercises, etc.

That is, his training takes little account of those parts of his work which frequently fall to his supervision, in spite of their really requiring specialists to properly execute.

But if necessity for the use of knowledge of church decoration and architecture come seldom; not so with the music. The minister in eight cases out of ten is required to exercise judgment (and sometimes his throat!) in musical matters. His seminary training—according to the accounts of a statistician and my own experience—gives him little help in denominations outside of the Episcopal and Roman Catholic.

Beauty Not Necessarily Expensive.

One of the prime fallacies in the attitude of laymen towards beauty is that it is necessarily expensive. Undoubtedly beauty may be expensive; but so is ugliness. Some of the most hideous perpetrations in European and American church architecture represent colossal expenditures, infinitely greater than chaste solutions of the same problem. It is aside from the question, especially when there is considered the permanency of that which is good and lovely.

Then, the manifold details of ventilation, lighting, etc., are solvable matters aesthetically. The whole history of architecture—that is to say, beautiful construction—is wrapped up with the problems of human comfort. There is nothing fundamentally inimical between beauty and utility, although the unimaginative would have us believe there is. All the ugly excrescences from flies to sewerage have been the subject of aesthetic attention. No specifications are worthy of acceptance which represent necessities as normally and compulsorily distasteful to the eye.

Or, applied to windows, a good basic principle (expressed negatively) is that the worst thing in the eyes of the artist is for a window not to look like a window. The aesthetic bases of stained glass have been fairly well established. When there is the suggestion of its being a painting or, worse, a copy of a painting: that is its lowest plane. A window is a space for light and air and should preserve its individuality. It has its idiom and cannot be translated literally. In other words, windows are decorative spaces and should not masquerade as post cards.

Good Music Need Not Be Difficult.

Then, the problem of good music. It is not a matter of difficult music. There are stacks of splendid calibre on the shelves of the publishers which are as simple as can be written in any grade of quality. The impoverishment of church music in certain quarters has been due to causes similar to those producing bad architecture, chief of which is—not expense, but proper preliminary supervision. And so to the end of the aesthetic chapter which has been running into phases demanding specific treatment, better treated separately.

The average—and above the average—minister fails on aesthetic ground principally because he fails to grasp the vital difference between the definite, clear-cut, all apparent realism which is the common practice of sermonizers and the suggestive, veiled and "undesirous pedagogy" of Art. Art functions on a different plane and to expect it to formulate itself in building, windows and music with the finality and thud of a dogma is to compel it to change its method of approach; to compel it to translate poorly instead of pulsate idiomatically. There are emanations from an art product which fail to function when it is not pure aesthetic.

Misleading Books On Art.

The modern preacher has books in his library which confirm his probably inartistic views. The numerous "Messages of Pictures and Music" are to his book shelves what an out-of-date book on theology would be as an aid to my general culture. They scarcely form a basis for art appreciation.

If the speaker in the pulpit insists on referring to music and painting it should unquestionably be done with a modern attitude. The ancient philosophers thought they could voice every scientific, theological and aesthetic view. The moderns are becoming more modest—I mean more restricted in their omniscience!

It is a poor vocabulary and an unimaginative personality which serve up inaccurate aesthetic principles for the sake of driving home a truth. A truth whose artistic, scientific and other ramifications are not worth the trouble to study, is not worth much in the final effect. From the viewpoint of the professional sermon hearer I take it that bad art, bad theology, bad law, bad sociology and bad grammar are almost certain to be equally ineffectual in their ultimate averaged tendencies. Art can teach, but it teaches best in its own way; not as this that and the other man wants it.

Suggestion for Reading.

I am always loth to suggest (unasked) books which will be of assistance. However, the book, "Religio Pictoris," by Helen Bigelow Merriam (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) and the magazine "Christian Art" (Richard Badger, Boston) will furnish the proper "attitude" and materials for courageous and "necessitous" clergymen. The magazine considers every possible ecclesiastical predicament; the book prepares the virgin mind to properly assimilate aesthetic or aesthetico-moral views. Some grazing in these fields will probably prevent the well-intentioned minister from uttering prayerful stupidities such as the following which I heard from clerical lips three weeks ago: "O Lord, grant that these singers may forget (!) their artistry, and sing to the glory of God."

Views of Life

By George A. Campbell

Vital Versus Sectarian Belief

In reviewing Joseph Compton Rickett's book, "Origins and Faith," Principal Forsyth begins by thus contrasting the minister and the layman.

"A book like this from a layman has a different significance from a like work by a responsible teacher in the Church, and it calls for different treatment. It is symptomatic rather than authoritative. The minister of a church cannot divest himself of his position, or forget that in turning to the public he does not ride as a free lance or speak as a mere inquirer. He is the public representative of the Gospel and the Church, and he must suspend his judgment on truth, however rational, which appears to make impossible the God whose minister he is. But the case of the layman is different. He can and should be more free with his individual impressions, guesses, and questions than one with the pastoral, apostolic, or representative lien upon him. The personal equation may count for more, with a consequent vivacity, and even piquancy, of interest. He speaks for himself alone. And yet, in another sense, not. He is indicative, if he is not representative. He reveals the thoughts of many hearts. He opens up what from the pulpit is so hidden—the frame of mind in those pews that care to read and think on such matters, and yet do not go about it in the minister's trained and expert way. From this documentary point of view the book is of great value."

This is interesting. The learned Principal thinks the layman is more human than the minister. The latter must not unbend too much. He must remember his official capacity. His laughter must not be unconfined. He cannot be a commentator on life, for he is a proclaimer of a theory of life. He is not an onlooker, he is a guide to all who will accept his word.

Limitations of Belief.

There is some truth in this view of the minister. All belief imposes its limitations.

Every acceptance of a positive is a denial of the opposing negative.

Hence it is not surprising that ministers are by many intellectual men considered uninteresting. Their minds are closed. They have accepted a creed. Every minister doubtless has had conversation with men, that went well till the discovery was made that they talked to a minister, when suddenly there was a felt coldness. They had pigeonholed the dominie. They measured the reach of his free intellect. To them he ceased to be human, and became official, priestly.

Some time since I was on an elevated car going to the city when I saw opposite me a neighbor with whom I had never spoken. Feeling neighborly on that particular morning I went over and joined him in conversation. As soon as I told him I was a minister of the Christian church a great barrier was erected between him and me. He thought he knew at once all that I believed. He measured all my emotions and imaginations with mathematical precision.

Not a Man but a Campbellite.

To him I was no longer a man, I was a despised Campbellite. "Yes," he said, "I know all you stand for, you think all that is necessary to salvation is to get the people under the water, nothing else amounts to a row of pins. I have heard your preachers in Ohio preach their baptismal regeneration not more than once." My apologies to the Ohio brethren for quoting my Chicago neighbor!

I tried to explain that he must have been misinformed; but I did not succeed. The next morning I saw him again on the car. This time he sought me out, not, I fear, because of neighborly feeling; but because he was moved by sectarian loyalty. He began, "After talking with you I went to see Mr. ————, who knew lots of your people in Ohio and Kentucky and he said 'of course, water baptism is all they believe.'" Apologies also to Kentucky! I did not convince him.

Called to Proclaim His Faith.

He was one of the Brethren, sometimes nicknamed "Plymouth" Brethren. He was called to proclaim his faith both in season and out of season. We were both human beings. Both believed in God and in Christ. Both in the immortality of the soul. But our prejudices, sectarian prejudices, kept us from considering life on the basis of our common humanity.

He has since buried his wife. I wonder if in his hour of grief he would have accepted my sympathy. His view of just how the dead are going to be rewarded might have prevented him.

How can ministers proclaim what they believe and still be on sympathetic meeting terms with every man, no matter what his creed. There is a way. The minister may meet people occasionally like my neighbor who will close all approaches to his real soul; but the minister can at least have a cosmopolitan heart.

Man Before Creed.

Man must be placed before creed. Regard your neighbor's life rather than his theories. Don't argue him down; but love him up. Converts are not made by argument; they are made by sympathetic interpretation. The preacher is at best only the feeble interpreter of conscience, death, God and all His mighty silent agencies. The universe is too vast to be an abiding home for presumptuous sectarians. The minister can well afford to stress that which binds men together, and be somewhat suspicious of that which separates them. He should be slow to classify men by denominations. You do not know a man when you have said he is a Campbellite or a Calvinist. Every man is an individual with fears that look hellward and hopes that reach to heaven. The emotions of men are not sectarian. The common denominator is God in man. Human nature, no matter how labeled, is the same the world over. My neighbor and I disagreed about the labels. We didn't open the jar and taste the fruit.

Publishers' Labels as Sectarian Signs.

Often have I picked up books and seeing the publisher's name I have thrown them down unread. When the sectarian label is very prominent I know that the author's soul has not been blown upon by the pure winds of God. "Battle Creek" suggests to me a musty controversy. Figuring out religion does not appeal to me. I prefer the untutored cry of a simple human soul. I had almost written that I prefer mistakes in religion to mathematical calculations. I suppose the recent earthquake shock will produce a crop of prophets who will fix dates for the end of the world.

The bigness and the mystery of God's universe ought to make us humble. The intellect of the Christian ought never to be quarrelsomely assertive. Only the inner spirit can be positive in a kingly way.

Value in Preacher's Moods.

The preacher, while refusing to be cast down by his moods, can well afford to be made brotherly by them. For instance, it would be a strange minister who was never tempted by the mood of doubt. All the noblest and greatest saints have been. It is not therefore becoming for any minister to berate the doubter any more than to berate the sick. Let him remember his own mood of doubt; and be thus bound to his kind. Let him be more positive, if he please, but kindly too.

A Minister in Doubt.

The other day as I lunched with one of our out of town ministers he related to me the death of a very dear friend; and how that although he had before proclaimed the resurrection of the dead over and over again and had no doubt as to his belief in it, now in the face of his great sorrow his faith was weak and unsupporting. He wondered if she was not like a rose that bloomed and died and would never bloom again. Poor man, he thought belief was learned out of books in college. He thought it was conclusions from propositions in logic. He thought it was picked up as lovers go hand in hand along a flowery path. He thought it could be proved. He thought that when the youth said "I believe," faith had gained a permanent victory. The preacher he regarded as the defender of faith.

Creedal Faith and Vital Faith.

Now he is learning that all this was the creedal faith, the sectarian faith, the faith of the reason. Vital faith comes by the agony of pain. It is found among the thorns of life, often when the soul wrings its hands in hopeless darkness, faith in its sustaining power is found. The way up to God is not through an easy creed; but through the bitter experiences common to all men. Some misinterpret these and thus miss the way; nevertheless they are the real teachers. They are not sectarian. They are as universal as the sunshine. Men may and should be Christians without being bigots. They should be positive without being provoking. They should have convictions without being contentions. The way to the Christian goal is to cultivate vital faith rather than creedal dogma.

Dr. Tyler and Gipsy Smith—A Side-light

Editor Century: I have read with interest your article relating an interview with Gipsy Smith. Many are puzzled to know how our smiling, genial B. B. Tyler could administer his biting criticism on the great work of Gipsy Smith. I admire Bro. Tyler. He has but few equals in our brotherhood when it comes to wielding effective influence over other religious bodies.

I think I can account in part for his criticism of Gipsy Smith. On his return from the World's Sunday-school Convention at Rome, Bro. Tyler made a triumphal tour of the Christian churches in England. He and Sister Tyler spent several days with the Southampton church. Bro. Tyler spoke for us three times on Sunday. On Monday afternoon he heard a fine address at a Congregational church by Sylvester Horne of Whitefields, London. Monday evening a special rally was held at East Street Wesleyan Church, at which Samuel Chadwick of Leeds and Gipsy Smith, spoke. Gipsy Smith had just returned from an evangelistic tour in America, worn out in body and with a husky voice. I got a seat on the platform for Bro. Tyler. Mr. Chadwick spoke first, delivering a very strong sermon sparkling with many original thoughts. Bro. Tyler was carried away with Chadwick's brilliant style, and when Gipsy Smith followed, laboring under these unfortunate disadvantages, Bro. Tyler became absolutely disgusted with the far-famed Gipsy. I must believe this first impression had something to do with Bro. Tyler's criticism.

Bro. Tyler attended the Thursday services at the City Temple, London, and was well received by R. J. Campbell, the pastor. He subscribed for the Christian Commonwealth, edited by Albert Dawson, one of Mr. Campbell's deacons. It is practically the organ of one congregation and does not express the sentiments of any part of the representative Free Churches. I am surprised that Bro. Tyler quoted it as authority on the subject in question.

I do not offer this as criticism, but as an explanation in part of Bro. Tyler's criticism of Gipsy Smith. Respectfully, Gainesville, Texas. Ernest C. Mobley.

The Evangelistic Temper of the Disciples

In accounting for the success of the Disciples of Christ, first consideration should be given to their evangelistic temper. In this they have been distinguished from all other religious peoples. Not that others have lacked it, but that they have not possessed it in the measure or the form in which the Disciples have possessed it.

The Disciples have put evangelism in the forefront of all their activity—their public worship, their preaching, their training for the ministry, and their theological reflection. Their peculiar doctrines all center around the process of conversion, whether it be their peculiar doctrine of faith, or of baptism, or the Holy Spirit. Their theology is an evangelistic theology, in the sense that it has all grown out of the evangelistic question "What must I do to be saved?"

Their Theology Evangelistic.

The Disciples have no peculiar doctrine of God, or of Christ, or of the Trinity, or of Scripture, or of Man, or of Sin, or of Retribution; on all these they share the views of evangelical orthodoxy. But they do have a peculiar doctrine of Conversion. All other doctrines may be learnedly discussed in his presence, and a Disciple will either go to sleep or look out of the window; but let the discussion turn upon any phase of the doctrine of Conversion and he will immediately sit up straight and pay attention. He has some very pronounced and clear-cut views on this doctrine which come warm from a recently held "protracted meeting," or from the regular Sunday services of his church.

Every public preaching service held by the Disciples involves all the theology they have interest in or concern for, if it has been true to the century-old traditions of their pulpits, in closing every sermon with an "invitation" to the unconverted to "come forward." That is the unmistakable mark of a Disciple meeting. It is not necessary that a preacher be present or that a meeting be held on Sunday. It may be in the Sunday-school, or Young People's prayer meeting, or the mid-week prayer meeting, or merely the communion service on Sunday. An elder or the leader of the meeting counts it entirely appropriate at any meeting to give an opportunity for public confession of faith in Christ. No meeting is too formal and none too informal for this solemn appeal. It is seldom forgotten.

A Dry Baptistry Unpardonable.

Thus it appears how unavoidable the evangelistic temper and habit become in churches of the Disciples. It is the taken-for-granted end and aim of all preaching, and the primary business of the church to bring men to the acceptance of Christ. If a church goes very long without "having additions" something is felt to be seriously wrong. The "dry baptistry" is the unpardonable sin among the Disciples, so deep-seated has the evangelistic conscience grown during a century. No wonder their churches have grown in numbers. The wonder would have been if they had not grown. Every church conceives itself to be a recruiting agency, and every minister a recruiting officer. This constant appeal to men to turn to Christ must inevitably, no matter how poorly executed, bear some fruit. It bears home to every one that hears it, at least for the moment, the claim which religious impulse and moral duty lay upon every life, and brings to an issue before the soul the solemn responsibility of decision, for or against Jesus Christ. Such a method of preaching and closing a service is bound to get results. In the practice of the Disciples it has demonstrated its value and efficiency.

Origin of Our Evangelism.

This evangelistic temper entered very early into the movement. The impulse did not come from the Campbells, though they fostered and defended it. Neither did they use it to any notable extent in their personal ministries. They had formed their homiletic habits long before it was introduced to their attention.

The early years of the nineteenth century mark the period of the so-called "Second Great Awakening" in America. Bacon, in his history of American Christianity says: "The closing years of the eighteenth century show the lowest low-water mark of the lowest ebb-tide of spiritual life in the history of the American church. The demoralization of army life, the fury of political factions, the catch-penny materialist morality of Franklin, the philosophic Deism of men like Jefferson, and the popular ribaldry of Tom Paine, had wrought together with other untoward influences, to bring about a condition of things which to the eye of little faith seemed almost desperate."

Second Great Awakening.

Out of such conditions sprang the Second Great Awakening, led by the McGee Brothers and James McGready, in Tennessee and Kentucky. It was a sermon preached by James McGready that led to the religious awakening of Barton W. Stone, and later, when the scene of evangelistic activity shifted to the west, Stone became an important leader in it as a minister in the Presbyterian Church. Revivals sprang up all through New England, especially affecting the colleges, which had become centers of a proud and boastful infidelity.

A revival visited Yale in 1802, in which seventy-five out of 230 students professed conversion. In 1808 Dartmouth College was similarly visited, and thirty students professed conversion. In 1805 occurred at Williams College one of the most remarkable revivals. Among the students at that time reached was Samuel J. Mills, who became a leader of a band of students calling themselves "Brethren." They organized a society "to effect in the persons of its members a mission or missions to the heathen."

Walter Scott.

The Campbells came to America in 1807-9 in this atmosphere of religious revival. Their movement does not show traces of this influence, however, until 1827. The man who is universally credited with its introduction was Walter Scott. He first formed the acquaintance of the Campbells in 1821, and from that time onward was intimately associated with them in their work. He cooperated in the establishment of the Christian Baptist in 1823; and to its early numbers made literary contributions which disclose his deep interest in the place of Christ, and the doctrine of his Messiahship, in the faith and preaching of the present day. With other ministers he developed what he called the "Ancient Gospel," which was simply the primitive method of the apostles in proclaiming Christianity to the unconverted and unbelieving.

When he was made evangelist of the Mahoning Association of Ohio, in 1827, he was ready to put his primitive evangelistic program into operation. Associated with him were several ministers who had come under the influence of B. W. Stone and his work in Kentucky. They brought with them the spirit of evangelism caught from Stone, and passed it on to Scott and the younger Baptist ministry.

John Smith.

Sufficient recognition has never been made of the creative evangelistic influence of John Smith, especially in Kentucky. He likewise owed his fervid evangelism to the Great Awakening in Tennessee. He entered the Baptist ministry and came under the teaching of the Campbells in the early days of the Christian Baptist. As Scott had fused his evangelism with the reformatory doctrines of the Campbells, so also did Smith; and as the one gave the Campbellian movement its evangelistic temper in Ohio, so also did the other in Kentucky. Born as he was out of the same religious revival as Stone, he was providentially prepared to lead in the coalescence of the followers of Stone and Campbell.

Barton W. Stone.

The final evangelistic influence came from the great evangelist himself—Barton W. Stone. He had made and sent out many an evangelist who joined forces with Campbell, before the two great leaders themselves met and discussed their differences and agreements. Here again Campbell, as the stronger personality and leader, overcame, and Stone, after acknowledging his debt to Campbell, looked with favor upon the union of the two peoples, and finally gave his influence to the united body.

Thus the links connecting the Disciples with the Second Great Awakening, were numerous and direct, most of all that Stone, himself one of its notable leaders and figures, gave himself with the larger section of his followers to the united movement. The Disciples originated in an age of religious revival in a section of the country most deeply affected by it, and had among their founders men who graduated out of the prevailing school of evangelism. All this has made them incurably evangelistic; it is born in the blood. They had great evangelists for fathers and mothers, and adopted evangelists into their family as brothers and sisters, and for two generations have been raising up evangelistic children. They have always believed in large ecclesiastical families, have striven for them, and have consequently grown to be a great family.

An Appeal for Evangelistic Workers in China

The China Centenary Missionary Conference, held in Shanghai from April 25 to May 8, 1907, in considering the problem of the evangelization of the Chinese empire, came to the unanimous conclusion that the time is now ripe for such a vigorous forward movement as will give to every inhabitant of China an acquaintance with the way of salvation. To give effect to this a representative committee was appointed with instructions to issue a statement, appealing to the Christian churches of our home lands for the men and women needed for this gigantic undertaking.

This committee has made every effort to secure the most accurate information from the representatives of the various missions in all the provinces and dependencies of China. And having given our most prayerful and thoughtful consideration to all the information received we now issue this appeal in accordance with the resolution of the conference. We beg the home societies to consider carefully our estimate of the number and the quality of the additional workers required.

Naturally the work of evangelizing China must be done chiefly by the Chinese themselves, and for this we have made ample allowance in our estimate, but in order that the work be directed efficiently a large number of foreign evangelists will be required. There are needed men and women filled with the spirit of evangelism who are eminently qualified to inspire a following, and to organize and to lead the Chinese evangelists. We who know this evangelistic work most intimately realize that the need for such men and women is imperative. We therefore urge the importance of sending to China for this work only those who have the above qualifications.

No one can question the importance of the work done by those engaged in the medical, educational, literary and philanthropic branches of our great missionary enterprise: but we would impress upon the home churches the fact that the time has come when direct evangelism must be given the first place. Less than one half of the whole missionary staff in China is now engaged in this direct evangelistic work, and even this proportion, in itself far too small, is due mainly to the importance which the China Inland Mission places upon evangelistic as compared with institutional work. Out of 678 members this mission has 560 in direct evangelistic work; while, according to the most reliable statistics to which we have had access, of the 1758 missionaries of all other societies less than 600 are engaged in this work. Owing to different methods of reckoning in the various missions the wives of missionaries (1,035) are not included in any of the above figures, though nearly all of the wives do more or less missionary work. To add the number of wives would not alter the ratio.

We estimate, that in addition to the foreign evangelistis now at work, 3,200 men and 1,600 women, specially qualified as leaders and organizers are needed. If this force can be secured such an emphasis will be laid upon the importance of evangelism as will call forth a band of Chinese workers somewhat commensurate with the needs of the field, and it may reasonably be expected that within a few years these leaders would be coöperating with 150,000 Chinese evangelists.

We therefore urge the home societies to ascertain what proportion of this number of additional workers each should provide, and further to take such action as will ensure these additional workers being on the field within the next ten years.

We have the command of Christ and the energizing power of the Holy Spirit; it now remains only to obey the one, yield to the other, and consecrate the church's abundant resources to God. Then every inhabitant of China shall have an acquaintance with the way of salvation.

The Emmanuel Movement

By Professor O. L. Lyon

Since the Emmanuel Movement is rather new a definition may be first in order. It is a religio-medical movement—a system of healing functional diseases by suggestion. It is a demonstration of the power of mind over matter. It seeks to develop the entire man preparing him to live up to the utmost of his possibilities here.

Man is held to be a unit, an entity, although being dual in his nature. Mind being the chief part, the kind of body one has depends largely upon the kind of mind in that body.

Need of Such a Movement.

It is claimed that the church is not reproducing the life with which it started. At first, it was an enormous spiritual force changing the life, making new creatures in Christ Jesus, giving a deep abiding real faith. This should be so now, for spiritual truth is not affected by time—it is an abiding reality. The church in the time of Christ and the apostles ministered to both physical and spiritual ailments of man. Christ was ready to meet the needs of his fellowman in other lines than purely spiritual. The church has let the healing side of the gospel pass into almost total unbelief, but has retained some faith in spiritual regeneration.

Then, too, it is claimed that most diseases are mental in their nature and can best be treated by mental suggestion. Another fact too must be noted, nervous disorders are rapidly increasing in the United States. Two hundred and fifty thousand such cases exist just now—a number all out of proportion to what it was a century ago. The leading causes of this vast increase are a breakdown of religious faith, growing artificiality of our social system, mad rush for wealth, frivolity, use of stimulants and narcotics, lack of self control from overwork and culpable self indulgence.

Methods and Principles of the Movement.

No patient is taken for treatment unless a doctor has first made a complete diagnosis of the case and pronounced it a functional disease. Then by the principle of suggestion and operating through faith the mind is put in tune, is made hopeful and expectant. Mental strain is relieved and a relaxed state of mind is produced which favors a cure. Those things that uplift and delight are made to play upon the soul and these act as a powerful tonic. Aim and interest are put into the life, and we all know that these are great requisites to health. Anger, fear, jealousy and that demon, worry, those destroyers of the body, are eradicated. They affect the heart, lungs, digestion, enfeebling us and robbing us of sleep. These robbers of life's energies are chased away by the sunshine of hope and cheer. If we would all live up to the qui vive of our God-given energies, we should have little sickness.

The great principle of the Emmanuel Movement is suggestion, or the power of ideas over us. Suggestion puts determination into a flagging will, nerving one to the ultimate of his energies to throw off disease. If the suggestion comes from one of authority, it inspires confidence which acteth like a medicine. The suggestion must have something of authority about it to do good—the more authority the better to inspire faith.

These suggestions act upon the subconscious mind. Here it may be well to say a word about the subconscious mind. Just its exact limits perhaps no one knows or ever will know, for how can one know the unknown, the subconscious. It is held to be the chief source of the body's as well as the mind's power—the strong force running both. It has in it powers making for health on proper suggestion.

The value of these suggestions depends upon the faith one has in them, and the persistency of their repetition. It takes time as well as faith to bring about a cure.

Value of Suggestion.

Suggestion must not be taken as uncanny in its nature. We see its power every day. The child gets hurt, and a kiss cures it. She is naughty, a suggestion diverts the mind and all is sunshine again. We are kept awake at night by unpleasant thoughts. Better ones are suggested and we fall asleep. In fact our wakeful states depend quite largely upon the suggestions we make to our minds.

The value of patent medicines depends almost entirely upon suggestion. Almost anything can be made a go in medicine if the public is bombarded enough. Big ads, big claims excite big cures.

Another phase of suggestion is in surgery where the doctor prepares his patient chiefly by suggestion. All, too, are familiar with the little dose suggestion of homeopathy and the big dose of the allopath.

Habit which holds us as with log chains is the result of suggestion, and if bad, may be cured by suggestion. The mind has a tendency to act in a way in which it has already acted. This basal principle of habit is explained by the physiological psychologist as gullies in the brain of which he knows nothing. But whatever its explanation, the force of habit is tremendous. The habits of alcoholism, morphine, cocaine, sexual perversion, monstrous and terrible thought, are tyrants worse than Nero ever was. They are so terrible as to drive one almost to belief in fatalism or determinism. These are treated successfully by suggestion as unnumbered cases attest. Mere resistance to these habits as New Year's resolutions which the gods are said to smile at will not do. There must be both negative and positive work—a banishing of the evil and a putting a good in its place. Jesus says, "Resist not evil, but overcome evil with good." You remember in the parable where an evil spirit was driven out of man. Later the hungry devil came back to view his old home and finding it swept and garnished but empty, he went in, taking with him seven worse devils than himself. Suppose he had found a guard of righteousness there to resist he would have passed on. So with these unfortunates who in some cases have no more will than a falling stone, the doctor has a heart-to-heart talk with them, inspiring them to banish the infernal enemy from their midst and invite into his place a love of the true, the beautiful and the good. No suggestion is made but what the doctor thinks can be realized. He tells the patient that he can and will banish the demon, that he will hate his very appearance and that he will love the good, that a normal appetite will return to him, makes him expect it, inspires him with confidence, puts new life into him, makes him feel the old sin is dying within him and the new life is dawning. Who will say that such treatment is not good? Doctor Worcester says he has success with 75 per cent of his cases in this way.

With children he has great success in giving them suggestions while asleep. He explains it all to their mothers and has them make the same suggestions. Children become addicted to habits, from lack of parental training and thus become accursed to themselves.

The field of suggestion is wider than we think. Heredity and environment are but forms of suggestion. Since they make us about what we are, we see how powerful suggestion is. The patient naturally suggests to himself what heredity and environment point to.

Some Things that May be Helped by Autosuggestion.

Hypochondria, hysteria, functional disturbances of digestion, mild insomnia, certain forms of neuralgic headaches, melancholy, irritability of temper, perverse self will, vicious habits, stage fright and many others. Certainly if an idea has caused these states, a good idea may eradicate them, as has been demonstrated in thousands of instances. Of course, the organ must not be structurally diseased. If so, no suggestion will cure it.

"The education of the will," says Emerson, "is the object of our existence." One of the best means of educating it is by autosuggestion, for this is concentration on one idea. The new power that one feels springing up in him in Christian Science is the development of the autosuggestive power. To be effective, whatever is desired must be repeated to himself confidently but not strainedly. Furthermore, autosuggestion must be persistent and systematic.

Faith and Prayer.

These are two more principles employed in the Emmanuel Movement. Faith without works is as dead in medicine as it is in religion. It is an active faith that is advocated. According to Paul's definition, faith makes the invisible world real to us. Convinces us that things of the spirit world are not fancies but ultimate realities. This was the working definition of the church for the first two centuries according to Tertullian, Celsus and others. They lived during a part of this time and knew that the healing side of the gospel was much practiced. The new faith was made a reality. If this faith had not been lost the many healing cults, partially fakes in their nature, would not have arisen. Faith once had a heroism about it. We hear of it being able to remove mountains. Why not mountains of despair in distempered souls?

Is there a law of prayer in the universe? Would God have emphasized prayer so much and yet not have it among his laws? We are told that "men ought always to pray." "Whatsoever things ye desire when ye pray believe that ye receive them and ye shall have them." This means that prayer is a reality. "The prayer of faith shall save the sick." The elders are exhorted to pray over the sick. Prayer certainly is the best medicine for insomnia. Try it and see. The trouble lies in lack of faith or inability to believe.

Emmanuel Movement Versus Christian Science.

1. Christian Science is culpable, being guilty of the sin of omission. Fanatic faith rules out the doctor and often times lets the patient die. Yet it inculcates unselfishness, self-reliance, a certain degree of altruism which are good. It also banishes the worst ghost that ever haunted human life and that is fear. The Emmanuel Movement makes an amateur doctor out of a preacher, who knows little about medicine or anatomy. He performs psychic cures and fills the mind with beautiful thought. The Emmanuelist is not guilty of the sin of omission of the Christian Scientist, for he co-operates with the doctor.

2. According to Christian Science nature or the world of matter has no reality. The Emmanuelist gives to nature reality. Christian Science does not recognize the reality of the body, while the Emmanuel Movement does and also recognizes the relation between mind and body.

Christ did not come in the flesh according to Christian Science. The Emmanuel Movement has no such heterodoxy. If Christian Science is right in respect to their doctrine of matter, I might sit in my room and raise $1.40 wheat and also the cattle on a thousand hills. The Emmanuel Movement denies their philosophy in toto, yet adopts some of their mental methods.

3. Christian Science makes God a principle and not a personality. Think of a principle having a son. They deny personality to God. Emmanuel Movement does not.

4. Christian Science teaches that Christ did not die for our sins, thus denying the atonement. "When the disciples learned that Christ had not died," says Mrs. Eddy. Emmanuel Movement does not deny the atonement.

5. According to Christian Science food gives neither strength nor weakness. Why eat then? When we have faith enough we need not eat, for food is not real. This makes God a huge joker, for why then would he have made us such a lengthy alimentary canal with such elaborate connections? Emmanuel Movement has no such profound wisdom as this!

6. Christian Science teaches that man neither dies nor lives, but simply passes on. The Emmanuel Movement affirms that man both lives and dies.

7. Christian Science says the Bible is a sealed book and needs interpretation while the Emmanuel Movement denies the Bible to be a sealed book.

8. Christian Science cures both functional and organic diseases so they say. Emmanuel Movement, only functional diseases.

Results.

The founders of the Emmanuel Movement claim that they help 75 per cent of the patients taken. It is spreading and attracting a great deal of attention. Prominent men are looking it up. Bishop Fallows and Dr. McDonald are finding it very effective in the cure of functional diseases. Hundreds of cases are cited which need not be given here. Perhaps over half of the diseases known are of mental origin and can best be treated by suggestion.

The fact that there are now a million and a half in the healing cult shows what remarkable growth they are making. They cannot be pooh-poohed away. Make fun of them all you please and it is like throwing pebbles into the ocean to stop the rising tide. They have some good things about them which should be recognized and utilized. The good they have in them may be had without wrecking one's faith in Christ as is the case in Christian Science. When one accepts Christ he accepts all truth, for Christ says, "I am the truth." Wherever truth is found in the universe it may be accepted by one whose creed is Christ. There is no real truth not embraced in Christ. Thus one may hold to his faith which is dearer than life to him and yet accept bits of helpful truth here and there as he finds them.

The greatest danger is that the movement will go into quackery. To be a good practitioner one should be well versed in both normal and abnormal psychology. He should also be wise, discreet, sympathetic and not a scheming reverend. If hypnotism is not used properly, it is harmful to the mind, inducing instability and inviting disease. The movement, though, is so much in its infancy that one can hardly tell what its full grown strength will be.

Forward on Our Knees!

By I. N. McCash.

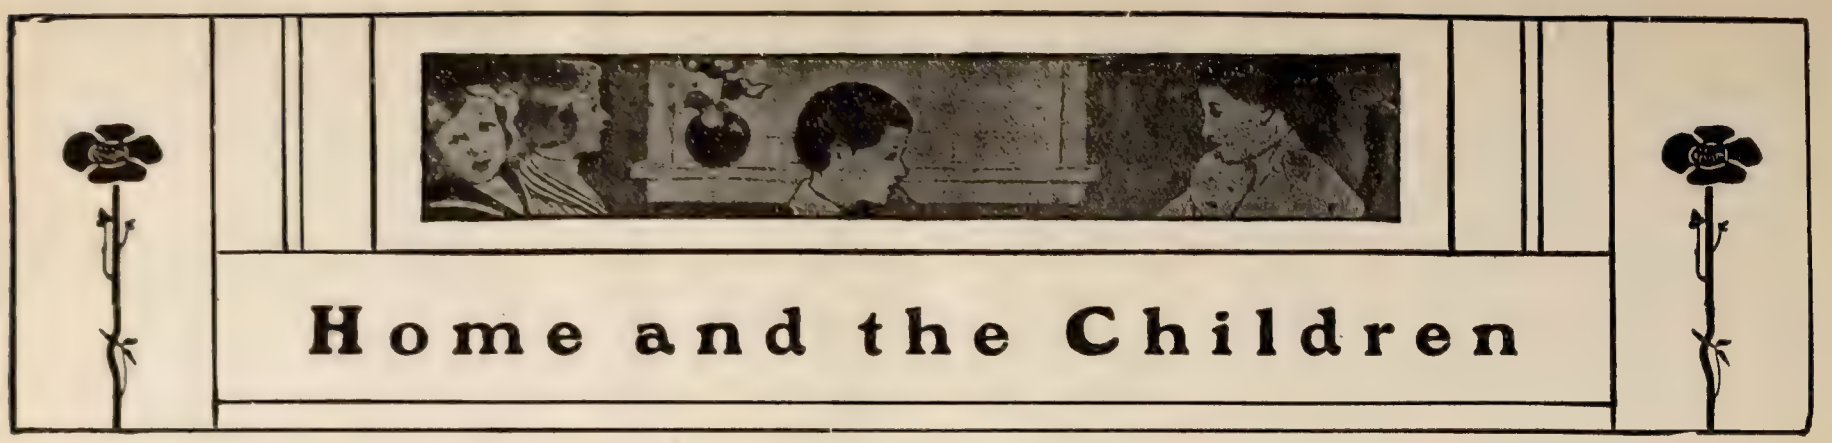
The Centennial aims of the Brotherhood have been stated in our papers, from pulpits and convention platforms till the Disciples of Christ are awake.

They are looking about for means and devising methods whereby those aims may be actualized. To wish each aim less attention and support, we would not. We could not neglect any of them and be free from misuse of time and abuse of opportunity. However, one of the departments of the church work seems to be forgotten or neglected in this year of anointing. All the sons of Jesus are in review except one—the ruddy-faced lad, the future king of Israel, caring for his father's flocks, alone with the Shepherd of his soul. Call him! Anoint him!

In reviewing the list of aims for our one-hundredth year, I fail to find the Prayer-meeting among the favored sons. It is mentioned, only. Would it be out of place to remind ourselves that preceding Pentecost the Disciples "with one accord continued steadfastly in prayer with the women—and with the brethren." On to Pittsburg is the cry! But how? On our knees. Such advance would be permanent.

The Scala Sacra climbed by thousands annually, at Rome, has only an image at the top. But Pittsburg is to be an upper chamber, a rendezvous for those expectant of greater things in the kingdom of God, after the convention, than modern times have yet seen. No veiled mystery is looked for; but spiritual power, renewed zeal, holy enthusiasm and enlarged vision await us. We need a deeper sense of obligation to a sin-oppressed world, a fuller confidence in our equipment to save men and a bolder faith to undertake conquests. These call us to devout, steadfast prayer in all the congregation that their struggles and achievements may be "sanctified by the word of God and prayer."

Isaac Errett said: "There can be no restoration of primitive Christianity that does not restore this prayerful spirit which makes it holy ground wherever the Christian lives a temple of God wherever a pure heart presents its offerings, and a holy sacrifice wherever a true life shows forth the praises of Him who hath called us out of darkness into his marvelous light." Charles Hadden Spurgeon when asked to explain his success, said: "Knee-Work, Knee-Work."



If success of the movement to restore Christianity to power, requires "Knee-Work," why not begin to double the attendance of the prayer-meeting? Why not try to have every member of the Church at the mid-week prayer service? Why not make the four months preceding the Convention, devotional and soul-nourishing through a quickened Prayer-meeting?

Waiting upon God by congregations will prepare the whole church to receive its increase of power and to use, to His glory, its prestige of a completed century of church history. Why not have our resourceful centennial secretary, or some one especially appointed, prepare subjects and a Prayer-meeting campaign to begin with July and continue till convention?

From the slender minaret over every mosque in Mohammedan lands, five times each day the muezzin calls: "God is good! God is great!—come ye to prayer." Every Moslem hears and obeys. Can we do less as Disciples of a Master whose life was prayer and who taught us how to pray?

"As Good As Gold"

The day that I was five years old
I thought I'd be as good as gold.
I promised mother, as I stood there,
All dressed up, on a parlor chair,
That I would do my very best
To act as well as I was dressed.

She told me when my party came
To think of others in the game,
To let my visitors go first,
To take the smallest piece and worst,
And see that others had enough,
And not be greedy, cross, or rough.

But I forgot it once or twice,
And then my manners were not nice,
So when they'd gone she shook her head;
"As good as silver," mother said.
But—when I grow to six years old,
I know I'll be "as good as gold."

Girls In Story Books

It was midsummer; lilies and pansies were drooping in the hot sunshine. Over in the field, the men in shirt sleeves and big straw hats were raking the hay and hundreds of insects sang their shrill songs.

Dorothy Wilbur and Ruth Lee sat in the hammock upon the vine-shaded piazza. They had planned to run over to the meadow and ride home on the load of hay by-and-by; just now there seemed to be nothing to do.

"It is too hot to play croquet or take a walk. What would be fun?" wondered Ruth.

"Oh, I know!" said Dorothy, who was always full of splendid next things, "let's 'tell pictures' like a girl I am reading about. I will tell the story of some girl in a book and you must guess her name."

"That is splendid!" agreed Ruth.

"It was a stormy day," began Dorothy, "and a very lonely girl sat in an old-fashioned parlor all ready to cry. She was an orphan about fourteen years old and had come to live with two old aunts. One aunt made her pretty doll's dresses, the other allowed her to eat all the dainties she chose; but in spite of their petting she was unhappy.

"Suddenly, she heard a new kind of bird; it sounded like a mocking-bird and seemed to be in the kitchen. She could not wait to go around, so she crept through the slide and sat down upon the broad shelf upon the other side. A servant girl was imitating the birds while she scrubbed the floor with soap-suds. She could whistle and twitter just like robins, swallows and thrushes.

"The servant told her that she had been found on the poor-house steps when she was a baby and had always worked hard.

"Then the lonely girl told her troubles; she had lost her parents; the uncle who was to be her guardian was a stranger; she had too many aunts and all her cousins were boys."

Ruth's eyes twinkled. "Go on, please," she urged as Dorothy paused.

"There was a strange noise. The servant thought it was thunder, but the other girl saw a red cart and ponies pass the window and she jumped down crying, 'It's a circus!'

"She found it was only her cousins come to get acquainted. She went into the parlor and there were seven boys! They all had light hair and blue eyes and wore Scotch plaids, and they all bowed saying, 'How do you do, cousin?' Now you must know the girl's name."

"Yes," laughed Ruth, "she was one of the 'Eight Cousins,' and her name was Rose Campbell."

"And the other was Phoebe," continued Dorothy. "And those boys—there was Archie the Chief, Prince Charlie, Bookworm Mac, Steve the Dandy, Will, Geordie and little Jamie who asked if Rose had any candy.

"Do you remember how the boys teased Rose about 'the circus'? They wrapped her up in their coats because she had a cold, took her out to the barn and entertained her in fine style. Then they all stayed to supper. Rose enjoyed them immensely but she told her aunts that she liked Phoebe best.

"Then Uncle Alec came and brought her a lovely box of things and fixed her a beautiful room. Once they all camped out on Campbell's Island. Oh, I think 'Eight Cousins' and 'Rose in Bloom' are Miss Alcott's best books! Now it is your turn."

"Well," began Ruth, "I am thinking of a little girl about eight years old, whose mother was dead. She didn't remember her father but had always lived with her grandfather. There were several aunts and uncles who were also children and they all had a very cross governess. If anything happened she would always blame this little girl. And something always did happen. One boy would hit her elbow and spoil her writing, or pull her curls so she couldn't learn her lessons. Then she would have to stay at home while the others went to ride. She was very good and never would pay them back nor tell tales.

"She had an old negro 'mammy' who loved her dearly. By-and-by her father came home, but he was stern and strict. He wouldn't let her have meat or warm biscuit for supper and only milk to drink. She couldn't read a book nor eat candy without his permission.

"One night he made her sit on the piano stool until she fainted because she wouldn't play waltz music on Sunday. Sometimes he tied her hands or put her to bed in the daytime because he thought she had been naughty when she really had not.

"One of the boys made blots on every page of her copy book, but her father found out the truth that time for a wonder, and Master Arthur got a good whipping. Enna was just horrid, too. A lady named Miss Rose and Mr. Travilla, her father's friend, were good to the little girl though, and once in a while her father seemed to love her."

"And her name was Elsie Dinsmore," guessed Dorothy. "But in Elsie's girlhood it all comes right. Her father is fine after he marries Miss Rose and Elsie has all the lovely things that any girl could want."

"There goes the hay-cart for a load!" cried Ruth.

"Then we can't tell today about Miss Drinkwater's girls," said Dorothy. "There are so many lovely ones to choose from—just the kind of girls we would love to have move into Brentwood and join our Brownie Club."

"Tell me their names."

"Oh, there's Marjorie West and her sister Linnet; Marigold and Tansy, only their real names were Helen and Louise Henderson. (Helen had red hair, so her father named her Marigold, and little Louise was always picking bitter tansy.) Then there's Leah Ritchie and Sarah Field, Electa, Leila Provost, Mollie, Tessa Wadsworth and her sister Dinah, Elizabeth Marsten who loved golden-rod and used to cry when she was a child because with all her thousands of dollars she was not rich enough to buy all the golden-rod; Isabel, Lydia, Shar Burbank and Judith Mackenzie—she was the girl who used to tell her mother 'pictures.' Yes, and Pheann—her real name was Phoebe Ann. All those girls are splendid!"

"And I never read about one of them," confessed Ruth. "I must get some of Miss Drinkwater's books from the library."

"Of course you must," agreed Dorothy. "Why, Ruth, you don't know what you have missed!"

Then they hurried away to the fragrant hay fields where Grandpa Lee was tossing the big hay-cocks upon the wagon.—The Advance.

Spring Twilight

Singing in the rain, robin?
  Rippling out so fast
All thy flute-like notes, as if
  This singing were thy last!

After sundown, too, robin?
  Though the fields are dim,
And the trees grow dark and still,
  Dripping from leaf and limb.

'Tis heart-broken music—
  That sweet, faltering strain,—
Like a mingled memory,
  Half ecstacy, half pain.

Surely thus to sing, robin,
  Thou must have in sight
Beautiful skies behind the shower,
  And dawn beyond the night.

Would thy faith were mine, robin!
  Then, though night were long,
All its silent hours would melt
  Their sorrow into song.

—Surrounded by her children and grandchildren, Mrs. Julia Ward Howe quietly celebrated her ninetieth birthday at her Beacon street home, Boston, last week. Despite her advanced age, the famous writer is in full possession of her faculties and mental keenness and still manifests great interest in all the great public questions of the day.

The Old Rose Dress

By Susan Hubbard Martin

She had wanted it for fifteen years, ever since Johnny was a baby. There was, however, no chance in the following five years, when three more children were born. But she had always wanted it—always. She did not like the sober well wearing colors she was obliged to wear in her station of life. True, she went nowhere nor did she meet many people, but all that made no difference. She wanted that dress for herself, for that world of color and beauty and roseate hues in which she dwelt half her time.

When the cares came thickest, when discouragements pressed heaviest, when Jim grew despondent, she did not give way to it. Instead, she literally forced her way through avalanches of work that would have overwhelmed a less brave woman, planning in it all that old rose dress. Oftentimes, when wearied to exhaustion, she would go away from the scene of bread making or washing or scrubbing, or whatever it happened to be, and climbing the steep, bare steps, she would go up to the attic. There, enthroned on an old soap box, she dreamed her dreams, built her air castles, and thought of that beautiful dress. She knew just how she would make it, for she was an expert with her needle. There should be soft, delicate frills of lace, full, generous folds of the goods and there should be nothing sensible or serviceable about it. It should be a poem, a delight and she should put it on and wear it and lo, the old Waitstill in the ugly old serviceable dress would vanish and a new being would step forth, a veritable queen. She had no place to wear it, of course. What woman has, on a farm with four children and an overworked husband. But she could look at it, and shake it out and feast her soul on its rich coloring and then, she could fold it away reverently until the next time. It should be the bright gleam in her life. The one thing beautiful, that was really hers.

Waitstill Humphrey was thirty-seven by now. Upon her were the indelible marks that must ever accompany a hard life. The shoulders had a droop, the hands were toil worn, the ends of the fingers rough, about her temples, the glorious chestnut hair was turning white. There were fine lines about the beautiful eyes. But in spite of them and her hard working days, she was one of those women whose cup of hope is always full. Children loved her, so did older people, so did the aged ones. Her husband thought there was no one like her. If she lacked a little in the stern, practical sense that the women in that part of the world possessed, she more than made up for it in her sweet, gay spirit that saw joy in everything. She would not be bowed down by discouragements or hardships—or by her environments.

When autumn came, she took her children and they scoured the woods for autumn leaves and bitter sweet. When Christmas came, she was always foremost in the festivities though they might boast of nothing better than apples, home made candy and nuts.

On Saint Valentine's day she baked the children cookies in the shape of little hearts in memory of the amorous Saint. On St. Patrick's day she always had a bit of green for them. On the Fourth of July, they had their annual picnic. She was never dull, never moody. She took the children through entrancing vistas of her own thoughts peopled with all sorts of delightful events. Things always happened at just the right time and everything always ended happily.

She patched the old clothes, did the family washing, scrubbed her floors with the same spirit, never allowing the fact of her poverty to oppress her. Sometime, things were going to be beautiful. Jim would be more prosperous and she could have that rose colored dress. To one who looked upon things in the cold light of reason, it was not likely that there would be any great change. Jim would still plod on—the farm would yield but a scanty living, there would always be plenty of hard work. But with the eyes of love and hope, she ever saw a rainbow.

Then one day, after long intervals of scrimping and saving and self denying, she found upon going to the old blue sugar bowl that there was enough, really enough, for the first time in fifteen years to buy that old rose dress. No one knew she had it, not even Jim understood the thwarted longing in her soul for one dress that was not ugly. That she needed table clothes and stockings and gingham, that fact she shut her eyes to. Surely in fifteen years she was justified in the indulgence of one great desire.

She hitched the horse to the buggy herself that morning. Jim was busy in the field. "I'm going to town," she announced at breakfast.

"Wait till Saturday and I'll go with you," Jim had said.

"No," she replied. "I must go today."

"Yes, we've some beautiful old rose dress patterns," replied the clerk in answer to her question. "Let me show them to you." He took them down, exhibiting them to the best advantage. The color mounted to Waitstill Humphrey's cheek. At last she had come into her own. She touched the goods as if they were living things. The bright, beautiful colors that meant so much to her.

"I'll take a dress from this," she said at last. Her voice trembled.

"It's lovely, isn't it?" she added. "Yes, some people are very fond of old rose. I am myself," answered the clerk. "Its especially beautiful for children. I suppose you are buying this for yours?"

Waitstill Humphrey flushed.

"No," she answered slowly. "No, it is not for them." She took it home, that soft, wonderful roll of exquisite color and wrapping it in tissue paper, she laid it in her dresser drawer.

But it really seemed that with the possession of it ill luck began. The next day Jim fell off the roof and broke three ribs, besides fracturing a bone in his wrist. Johnny stumbled and cut his forehead open on a sharp rock and it had to be sewed up. Two of the children took a low fever. The days wore on, Jim did not make a speedy recovery—neither did the others. Winter was coming on, because of it the children needed warm underwear, the smallest girl had to have some gingham dresses and—there was no money.

And then in the gray of an autumn morning when she was building a fire in the kitchen alone, it came to Waitstill Humphrey that, after all, that dress of old rose must be given up. The practical side of her nature for the first time asserted itself. With stern, sad eyes she saw things as they were. There were no rose colored dreams—there was to be no rose hued dress. A woman on a rocky farm with an injured husband and sick children had better be planning for flannels and ginghams and shoes.

She came into the room one morning where Jim lay. "Dear," she said, bending to kiss him, "can you spare me for a while? I'm going to town."

Jim nodded. "Don't be longer than you can help," he added.

"I won't. Johnny will look after the children." She stood and looked down at the helpless figure. There were quick tears in her eyes.

"Jim," she said, "I've been a poor sort of wife, haven't I? I've been lacking in practical things. I haven't realized as I should all the hard places we've gone through, what it means to face life and its trials."

Jim took her hand. "You've been the dearest wife ever," he cried, "and as for the hard places, owing to you, there haven't been any. Don't ever reproach yourself, Waitstill. I see no fault in you."

So she drove away through the keen, sharp wind, the three miles to town. She went straight to the clerk she had bought the goods of in the first place. She did not notice standing at the same counter a young girl in a trim tailored suit and wide hat. With her was a stout white haired gentleman, her father, evidently. They seemed to be waiting for some one. "I've brought this dress pattern back," she began, her voice trembling a little. "I—— I find I don't need it after all. We've had sickness—my husband had a fall and is in bed yet. I would like very much to exchange it for some underwear and stockings and gingham. It isn't hurt. I've kept it just as it was when you handed it to me."

The clerk looked at it. "You've kept it so long," he said finally, "that——" The tears sprang to the tired eyes.

"Oh," she cried, "I ought never, never to have gotten it."

The girl stood by. She could not help hearing. The tall figure with the beautiful, weary eyes fascinated her.

"Well," said the clerk, "I'll see—— but——"

The girl followed him down the aisle, touching him on the arm.

"Exchange it," she said in a low voice. "If there's any difficulty, I'll take the dress myself. She looks to be in trouble."

She went back to Waitstill, standing there still—in patient sadness. "Didn't you like your dress?" she said gently in a sweet voice.

Waitstill turned. "Like it," she cried. "Why, I've dreamed of a dress like that for over fifteen years." She looked again into the girlish face framed in its bonny hair.

"You look so kind, surely I may tell you about it," she added. "You see, after I'd saved up the money and gotten it, Jim, my husband, fell, breaking three of his ribs and a bone in the wrist, then the children took sick. My conscience scourged me terribly to think I had spent all that money on myself when they needed things. It didn't matter if I never had done it before—I had used the money. Oh, what will I do if they won't take it back?"

"They will," replied the girl very gently.

The clerk came back. "It's all right," he answered briefly, with a look at the girl. "You can select your articles in place of it." The next day Waitstill went about her work without her usual elastic spirit. The burden of the day was heavy. They were poor, things would be about as they had been, and there would never be any old rose dress for her. She would grow old and bent and there would always be the longing. There was a

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XIX.

The Face at the Window.

It was a hot morning when Sergeant Stimson and Corporal Payne rode towards the railroad across the prairie. The grassy levels rolled away before them, white and parched, into the blue distance, where willow grove and straggling bluff floated on the dazzling horizon, and the fibrous dust rose in little puffs beneath the horses' feet, until Stimson pulled his beast up in the shadow of the birches by the bridge, and looked back towards Silverdale. There, wooden homesteads girt about with barns and granaries rose from the whitened waste, and behind some of them stretched great belts of wheat. Then the Sergeant, understanding the faith of the men who had sown that splendid grain, nodded, for he was old and wise, and had seen many adverse seasons, and the slackness that comes, when hope has gone, to beaten men.

"They will reap this year—a handful of cents on every bushel," he said. "A fine gentleman is Colonel Barrington, but some of them will be thankful there's a better head than the one he has, at Silverdale."

"Yes, sir," said Corporal Payne, who wore the double chevrons for the first time, and surmised that his companion's observations were not without their purpose.

Stinson glanced at the bridge. "Good work," he said. "It will save them dollars on every load they haul in. A gambler built it! Do they teach men to use the ax in Montana saloons?"

The corporal smiled, and waited for what he felt would come. He was no longer the hot-blooded lad who had come out from the old country, for he had felt the bonds of discipline, and been taught restraint and silence on the lonely marches of the prairie.

"I have," he said tentatively, "fancied there was something a little unusual about the thing."

Stimson nodded, but his next observation was apparently quite unconnected with the topic. "You were a raw colt when I got you, Payne, and the bit galled you now and then, but you had good hands on a bridle, and somebody who knew his business had taught you to sit a horse in the old country. Still, you were not as handy with brush and fork at stable duty."

The bronze seemed to deepen in the corporal's face, but it was turned steadily towards his officer. "Sir," he said, "has that anything to do with what you were speaking of?"

Stimson laughed softly. "That depends, my lad. Now, I've taught you to ride straight, and to hold your tongue. I've asked you no questions, but I've eyes in my head, and it's not without a purpose you've been made corporal. You're the kind they give commissions to, now and then—and your folks in the old country never raised you for a police trooper."

"Can you tell me how to win one?" asked the corporal, and Stimson noticed the little gleam in his eyes.

"There's one road to advancement, and you know where to find the trooper's duty laid down plain," he said, with a dry smile. "Now, you saw Lance Courthorne once or twice back there in Alberta?"

"Yes, sir, but never close to."

"And you knew farmer Winston?"

Payne appeared thoughtful. "Of course I met him a few times on the prairie, always on horseback with his big hat on, but Winston is dead—that is, I heard him break through the ice."

The men's eyes met for a moment, and Stimson smiled curiously. "There is," he said, "still a warrant out for him. Now, you know where I am going, and, while I am away, you will watch Courthorne and his homestead. If anything curious happens there, you will let me know. The new man has instructions to find you any duty that will suit you."

The corporal looked at his officer steadily, and again there was comprehension in his eyes. Then he nodded. "Yes, sir. I have wondered whether, if Shannon could have spoken another word that night, it would have been Winston the warrant was issued for."

Stimson raised a restraining hand. "My lad," he said dryly, "the police trooper who gets advancement is the one that carries out his orders and never questions them, until he can show that they are wrong. Then he uses a good deal of discretion. Now you know your duty?"

"Yes, sir," said Payne, and Stimson, shaking his bridle, cantered off across the prairie.

Then, seeing no need to waste time, the corporal rode towards Courthorne's homestead, and found its owner stripping a binder. Pieces of the machine lay all around him, and from the fashion in which he handled them it was evident that he was capable of doing what the other men at Silverdale left to the mechanic at the settlement. Payne wondered, as he watched him, who had taught the gambler to use spanner and file.

"I will not trouble you if you are busy, Mr. Courthorne, but if you would give me the returns the Bureau ask for, it would save me riding round again," he said.

"I'm afraid I can't," said Winston. "You see, I haven't had the papers."

"Trooper Bacon told me he had given them to you."

"I don't seem to remember it," said Winston.

Payne laughed. "One forgets things when he is busy. Still, you had them—because you signed for them."

Winston looked up suddenly, and in another moment smiled, but he was a trifle too late, for Payne had seen his astonishment, and that he was now on guard.

"Well," he said, "I haven't got them now. Send me a duplicate. You have, no doubt, some extra forms at the outpost.

Payne decided that the man had never had the document, but he was too clever to ask any questions or offer explanations that might involve him. It was evident he knew that somebody had personated him, and the fact sent a little thrill through the corporal; he was at least on the trail.

"I'll bring you one round the next time I'm in the neighborhood," he said, and Winston sat still with the spanner lying idle in his hand when he rode away.

He realized that Courthorne had taken the papers, and his face grew anxious as well as grim. The harvest was almost ready now, and a little while would see it in. Then his work would be over, but he had of late felt a growing fear lest something, that would prevent its accomplishment, might happen in the meanwhile. Then almost fiercely he resumed the stripping of the machine.

An hour or two later Dane rode up, and sat still in his saddle looking down on Winston with a curious smile on his face.

"I was down at the settlement, and found a curious story going round," he said. "Of course, it had its humorous aspect, but I don't know that the thing was quite discreet. You see, Barrington has once or twice had to put a stern check on the indulgence in playfulness of that kind by some of the younger men, and you are becoming an influence at Silverdale."

"You naturally believed what you heard. It was in keeping with what you have seen of me?"

Dane's eyes twinkled. "I didn't want to, and I must admit that it isn't. Still, a good many of you quiet men are addicted to occasionally astonishing your friends, and I can't help a fancy that you could do that kind of thing as well as most folks, if it pleased you. In fact, there was an artistic finish to the climax that suggested your usual thoroughness."

"It did?" said Winston grimly, remembering his recent visitor and one or two of Courthorne's Albertan escapades. "Still, as I'm afraid I haven't the dramatic instinct, do you mind telling me how?"

Dane laughed. "Well, it is probable there are other men who would have kissed the girl, but I don't know that it would have occurred to them to smash a decanter on the irate lover's head."

Winston felt his fingers tingle for a grip on Courthorne's throat. "And that's what I've been doing lately? You, of course, concluded that after conducting myself in an exemplary fashion in an astonishing time it was a trifling lapse?"

"Well," said Dane, "as I admitted, it appeared somewhat out of your usual line, but when I heard that a man from the settlement had been ejected with violence from your homestead, what could one believe?"

"Colonel Barrington told you that!"

"No," said Dane, "you know he didn't. Still, he had a hired man riding a horse he'd bought, and I believe—though it is not my affair—Maud Barrington was there. Now, of course, one feels diffident about anything that may appear like preaching, but you see, a good many of us are following you, and I wouldn't like you to have many little lapses of that kind while I'm backing you. You and I have done with these frivolities some time ago, but there are lads here they might appeal to. I should be pleased if you could deny the story."

Winston's face was grim. "I'm afraid it would not suit me to do as much just now," he said. "Still, between you and I, do you believe it likely that I would do anything like that." Dane laughed softly.

Winston nodded. "You must make the best of that, but the others may believe exactly what they please. It will be a favor to me if you remember it."

Dane smiled curiously. "Then I think it is enough for me, and you will overlook my presumption. Courthorne, I wonder now and then when I shall altogether understand you!"

"The time will come," said Winston dryly, to hide what he felt, for his comrade's simple avowal had been wonderfully eloquent. Then Dane touched his horse with his heel and rode away.

It was two or three weeks later when Winston, being requested to do so, drove over to attend one of the assemblies at Silverdale Grange. It was dark when he reached the house, for the nights were drawing in, but because of the temperature few of the great oil lamps were lighted, and the windows were open wide. Somebody had just finished singing when he walked into the big general room, and he would have preferred another moment to make his entrance, but distained to wait. He, however, felt a momentary warmth in his face when Miss Barrington, stately as when he had first seen her in her rustling silk and ancient laces, came forward to greet him with her usual graciousness. He knew that every eye was upon them, and guessed why she had done so much.

What she said was of no moment, but the fact that she had received him without sign of coldness was eloquent, and the man bent very respectfully over the little white hand. Then he stood straight and square for a moment and met her eyes.

"Madam," he said, "I shall know whom to come to when I want a friend."

Afterwards he drifted towards a group of married farmers and their wives, who, except for that open warranty, might have been less cordial to him, and presently, though he was never quite sure how it came about, found himself standing beside Maud Barrington. She smiled at him, and then glanced towards one of the open windows, outside which one or two of the older men were sitting.

"The room is very hot," said Winston tentatively.

"Yes," said the girl. "I fancy it would be cooler in the hall."

They passed out together into the shadowy hall, but a little gleam of light from the doorway behind them rested on Maud Barrington as she sat down. She looked inquiringly at the man as though in wait for something.

"It is distinctly cooler here," he said.

Maud Barrington laughed impatiently. "It is," she said.

"Well," said Winston, with a smile, "I will try again. Wheat has made another advance lately."

The girl turned towards him with a little sparkle in her eyes. Winston saw it, and the faint shimmer of the pearls upon the whiteness of her neck, and then moved his head so that he looked out upon the dusky prairie.

"Pshaw!" she said. "You know why you were brought here to-night."

Winston admired her courage, but did not turn around, for there were times when he feared his will might fail him. "I fancy I know why your aunt was so gracious to me. Do you know that her confidence almost hurts me?"

"Then why don't you vindicate it and yourself? Dane would be your mouthpiece, and two or three words would be sufficient."

Winston made no answer for a space. Somebody was singing in the room behind them, and through the open window he could see the stars in the soft indigo above the great sweep of prairie. He noticed them vacantly and took a curious impersonal interest in the two dim figures standing close together outside the window. One was a young English lad, and the other a girl in a long white dress. What they were doing there was no concern of his, but any trifle that diverted his attention a moment was welcome in that time of strain, for he had felt of late that exposure was close at hand, and was fiercely anxious to finish his work before it came. Maud Barrington's finances must be made secure before he left Silverdale, and he must remain at any cost until the wheat was sold.

Then he turned slowly towards her. "It is not your aunt's confidence that hurts me the most."

The girl looked at him steadily, the color a trifle plainer in her face, which she would not turn from the light, and a growing wonder in her eyes.

"Lance," she said, "we both know that it is not misplaced. Still, your impassiveness does not please us."

Winston groaned inwardly and the swollen veins showed on his forhead. His companion had leaned forward a little so that she could see him, and one shoulder almost touched his own. The perfume of her hair was in his nostrils, and when he remembered how cold she had once been to him, a longing that was stronger than the humiliation that came with it grew almost overwhelming. Still, because of her very trust in him, there was a wrong he could not do, and it dawned on him that a means of placing himself beyond further temptation was opening to him. Maud Barrington, he knew, would have scanty sympathy with an intrigue of the kind Courthorne's recent adventure pointed to.

"You mean, why do I not deny what you have no doubt heard?" he said. "What could one gain by that if you had heard the truth?"

Maud Barrington laughed softly. "Isn't the question useless?"

"No," said Winston, a trifle hoarsely now.

The girl touched his arm almost imperiously as he turned his head again.

"Lance," she said. "Men of your kind need not deal in subterfuge. The wheat and the bridge you built speak for you."

"Still," persisted Winston, and the girl checked him with a smile.

"I fancy you are wasting time," she said. "Now, I wonder whether, when you were in England, you ever saw a play founded on an incident in the life of a once famous actor. At the time it rather appealed to me. The hero, with a chivalric purpose assumed various shortcomings he had really no sympathy with—but while there is, of course, no similiarity beyond the generous impulse, between the cases—he did not do it clumsily. It is, however, a trifle difficult to understand what purpose you could have, and one cannot help fancying that you owe a little to Silverdale and yourself."

It was a somewhat daring parallel, for Winston, who dare not look at his companion and saw that he had failed, knew the play.

"Isn't the subject a trifle difficult?' he asked.

"Then," said Maud Barrington, "we will end it. Still, you promised that I should understand—a good deal—when the time came."

Winston nodded gravely. "You shall," he said.

Then, somewhat to his embarrassment, the two figures moved further across the window, and as they were silhoutted against the blue duskiness, he saw that there was an arm about the waist of the girl's white dress. He became sensible that Maud Barrington saw it too, and then that, perhaps to save the situation, she was smiling. The two figures, however, vanished, and a minute later a young girl in a long white dress came in, and stood still, apparently dismayed when she saw Maud Barrington. She did not notice Winston, who sat further in the shadow. He, however, saw her face suddenly crimson.

"Have you been here long?" she asked.

"Yes," said Maud Barrington, with a significant glance towards the window. "At least ten minutes. I am sorry, but I really couldn't help it. It was very hot in the other room, and Allender was singing."

"Then," said the girl, with a little tremor in her voice, "you will not tell?"

"No," said Maud Barrington. "But you must not do it again."

The girl stooped swiftly and kissed her, then recoiled with a gasp when she saw the man, but Maud Barrington laughed.

"I think," she said, "I can answer for Mr. Courthorne's silence. Still, when I have an opportunity, I am going to lecture you."

Winston turned with a twinkle he could not quite repress in his eyes, and with a flutter of her dress the girl whisked away.

"I'm afraid this makes me an accessory, but I can only neglect my manifest duty, which would be to warn her mother," said Maud Barrington.

"Is it a duty?" asked Winston, feeling that the further he drifted away from the previous topic the better it would be for him.

"Some people would fancy so," said his companion. "Lily will have a good deal of money, by and by, and she is very young. Atterly has nothing but an unprofitable farm; but he is an honest lad, and I know she is very fond of him."

"And would that count against the dollars?"

Maud Barrington laughed a little. "Yes," she said quietly. "I think it would if the girl is wise. Even now such things do happen, but I fancy it is time I went back again."

She moved away, but Winston stayed where he was until the lad came in.

"Hello, Courthorne!" he said. "Did you notice anybody pass the window a little while ago?"

"You are the first one to come in through it," said Winston. "The kind of things you wear admit of climbing."

The lad glanced at him with a trace of embarrassment.

"I don't quite understand you, but I meant a man," he said. "He was walking curiously, as if he was half-asleep, but he slipped round the corner of the building and I lost him."

Winston laughed. "There's a want of finish in the tale, but you needn't worry about me. I didn't see a man."

"There is rather less wisdom than usual in your remarks to-night, but I tell you I saw him," said the lad.

He passed on, and a minute later there was a cry from the inner room. "It's there again! Can't you see the face at the window?"

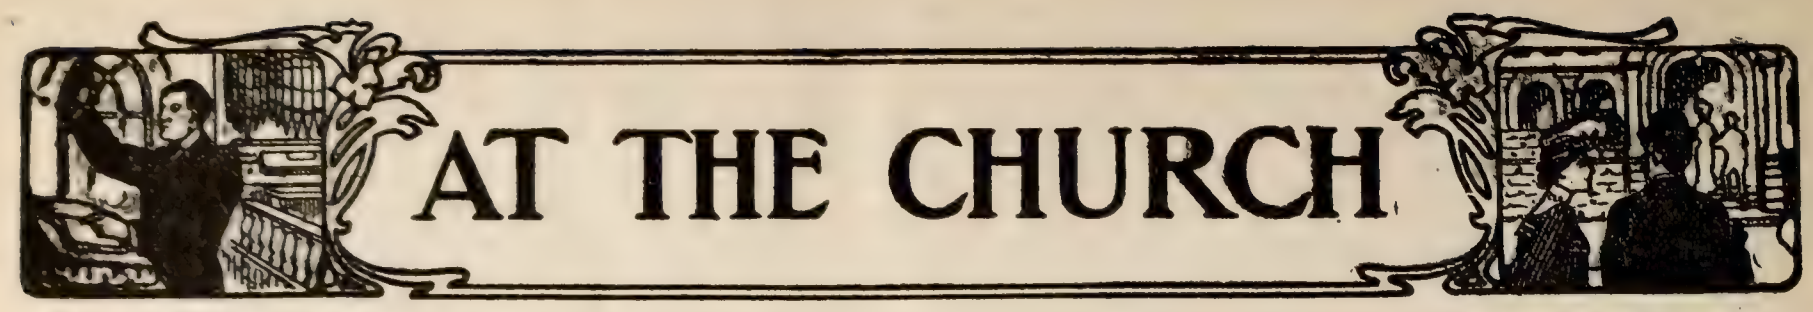
Winston was in the larger room next moment, and saw, as a startled girl had evidently done, a face that showed distorted and white to ghastliness through the window. He also recognized it, and running back through the hall was outside in another few seconds. Courthorne was leaning against one of the casements as though faint with a weakness or pain, and collapsed when Winston dragged him backwards into the shadow. He had scarcely laid him down when the window was opened, and Colonel Barrington's shoulders showed black against the light.

"Come outside alone, sir," said Winston.

Barrington did so, and Winston stood so that no light fell on the pallid face in the grass. "It's a man I have dealings with," he said. "He has evidently ridden out from the settlement and fallen from his horse."

"Why should he fall?" asked the Colonel.

"Exhausted from his hard ride."



"I was, however, on the point of going, and if you will tell your hired man to get my wagon, I'll take him away."

"Yes," said Barrington. "Unless you think the man is badly hurt, that would be best, but we'll keep him if you like."

"No, sir. I couldn't trouble you," said Winston hastily.

Five minutes later he and the hired man

The Gospel of Faith

The lessons of the first quarter were concerned with beginnings of Christianity at Jerusalem and in the widening circles of Palestine evangelism. This quarter has been devoted to the extension of the gospel to the new territory in which the Gentile life was the important element. There were three periods in the history of apostolic Christianity; first, the one in which the gospel was preached only to the Jews and was interpreted in terms of Jewish custom and thought. The center of that influence was Jerusalem and the most prominent apostle representative of that activity was Peter, although James, the Lord's brother, though not an apostle, would perhaps be a fairer type of Jewish Christian. The second phase of Christianity was Gentile. It was not a different gospel, but the application of the same truth to a different type of mind. When Christianity passed into the regions of heathen life, it adjusted itself to the new conditions and showed itself equally effective in dealing with the new character. The center of this fresh impulse was Antioch, which may be called the second capital of Christianity; and the leading representative of Gentile Christianity is the Apostle Paul. The third phase followed the conflict and reconciliation of Jewish and Gentile modes of thought, and may be called Universal Christianity, represented in the later history of the first century in the region of Ephesus, and in the purpose and writings of the Apostle John.

The Two Sections of Acts.

It is to the beginnings of Paul's career as an apostle to the Gentiles that we are brought in the studies of this quarter. The book of Acts is divided, at the close of Chapter 12, into two radically different sections. The first concerns the activities of Peter in the region of Jewish Christianity. The second is occupied with the Apostle Paul and the world of heathen life into which he carried the new faith. And yet certain chapters of the first section are devoted in part to the beginnings of the broader mission, and with these we commence our studies of the present series.

I. The Work of Peter.

We may divide the lessons of this quarter into four sections. The first includes two lessons, devoted respectively to the experiences of Peter at the home of the Gentile soldier, Cornelius, in the Roman city Caesarea; and the narrative of Peter's imprisonment and release at Jerusalem. It is unnecessary to review these narratives in detail. The struggle by which the Apostle Peter was brought to consent at all to enter the unclean precincts of Gentile life and to become finally the champion of the right of the Gentiles to accept Christianity on the ground of faith in the Master rather than of obedience to Jewish ceremonies, is admirably set forth in the tenth chapter of Acts. It was no easy thing for one who had been reared in the seclusion of Jewish influence to face the necessity of conceding equal rights to the heathen. And yet the experiences of Peter in Caesarea taught him that in God's sight no man was to be counted as common or unclean, and that Jew and Gentile alike require the redemptive ministry of Jesus and the reorganization of character which his leadership involves in order that they may be recipients of the new life he bestows. In his imprisonment at Jerusalem Peter nobly endured the hardships which early Christianity brought so commonly upon the disciples and of which the Saviour had warned them. The immediate return of Peter to his own company and to the activities of his apostolic work upon his release from prison is an admirable illustration of the unquenchable enthusiasm of the early Christians who counted no pains, sufferings, or losses as of any significance in comparison with the joy of their testimony to Jesus.

II. Beginnings of Gentile Christianity.

The second section deals with the beginnings of Gentile Christianity in the conversion of Saul and the founding of the Church in Antioch. It was significant that the man who was to do more than any other to make successful the Gentile form of Christianity was reared in the very heart of the Jewish community and was trained in the strictest of its requirements. From this arcanum of Judaism Saul of Tarsus came forth to become the champion and defender of that liberty which the gospel confers upon all men. His conversion was the result not merely of the appearance of and strange interview with the risen Lord on the way to Damascus, but of all the accumulated impressions made upon Saul by his Jewish training, his debates with Stephen, the persecution against the church of which he had been the leader, and the journey to extend his inquisition to the wider territories of Damascus.

Soon after his conversion and his retirement to Arabia he returned for a brief itme to Jerusalem and then departed for his old home in Tarsus, from which place he was called later on by Barnabas to become his co-laborer in the Christian work. The church in Antioch was founded by refugees from Jerusalem thrust out by the persecution Saul had waged against the church. It was composed of both Jews and Gentiles and it was its success and widening influence which led Barnabas, the apostolic delegate from the mother church, to seek a colleague whom he found in the person of Saul of Tarsus. The success of their work in the city on the fruitful and happy epochs in the life of Paul. fruitful and happy epochs in the life of Paul.

III. The First Mission of Paul.

The third section of our series of studies is concerned with the first missionary journey. The church at Antioch became convinced that it had no right to keep all of its evangelistic force at home, and this conviction issued in the call of the Spirit to send forth two of its ministers, Barnabas and Saul, into the regions beyond. They first visited the island of Cyprus, which had been Barnabas' former home, accompanied by John Mark, who had come with them from Jerusalem on their return from a private journey bearing alms to the impoverished disciples. But John left them at the time of their arrival on the mainland of Asia Minor from Cyprus, and they were compelled to go on into the interior alone. At Antioch of Pisidia in the highlands a church was organized after some weeks of active campaigning. Driven from this point they journeyed on to Iconium, and from there to Lystra where Paul was stoned after healing a cripple at the gates of the city. In these Galatian cities they succeeded in establishing churches, and then after extending their mission to Derbe, they returned along the very pathway they had come, retraced their steps to visit the newly organized churches, and thus made their way back to Antioch.

IV. The Gospel of Faith.

The fourth section of our studies relates to the gospel of faith. Lesson eight tells the story of the consultation at Jerusalem in which the principle of liberty for the Gentiles was vindicated. They were to be received not upon their obedience to the law of Moses but upon their faith in Jesus Christ. The three lessons that follow relate to the details of Christian life based upon this great principle of faith as the saving quality in character. James was the most conspicuous figure at the consultation in Jerusalem. From the epistle which he left to the church two lessons are taken—one on the necessity of bringing forth the fruits of faith in character; the other upon the wise restraint of speech. The practical values of the epistle of James are apparent upon the most superficial reading. It is not a doctrinal document but one of intensely valuable character as setting forth the necessity of embodying the Christian faith in every-day life. The last lesson is taken from the book of Hebrews and deals with that glorious list of faithful men in the Old Testament who, in spite of distress and hardship, maintained their faith in God and were victorious through that conquering quality.

PRAYER MEETING

THE CHRISTIAN FAMILY

Topic, June 16. Eph. 5:22; 6:9.

Is the Christian family in the process of extinction? Alarmists would have us believe that it is. The statistics of divorce, they say, show that the family institution is in hopeless confusion and rapidly disintegrating. To the alarmists Professor Albion W. Small replied before the American Sociological Society: "The American family is out of gear in two strata, in both of which pretty much everything else is out of gear. On the one hand is the stratum of the over-wealthed, over-leisured, over-stimulated, under-worked, under-controlled. Nothing in their condition is normal. Nothing is right. Only miracles could save this stratum from rot. Its families show the taint, and what else could be expected? On the other hand is the stratum of the over-worked, under-fed, under-housed, under-clothed, under-hygiened, physically and morally, underleisured, understimulated except by the elemental desires. Nothing in their lot is right. Nothing in their lot could be good enough to hold its own against the swamping bad. The family suffers in the general evil. It is as absurd to accuse the family institution on that evidence as it would be to denounce the atmosphere in general because the air this stratum has to breathe is foul. If we deduct the collapsed families in these two strata, where they must be regarded more as effects than as causes, and confine ourselves to the families that are in relatively normal conditions, the great mass of families in the industrious middle stratum of our society, the family is not breaking down. I do not mean to question the statistics of divorce, I mean first, that when we subtract the divorces that occur in the upper and lower non-social strata, and divide the number remaining by the number of families in the substantial middle stratum, the percentage of divorces is higher than it ought to be, but far below the rate which decryers of the family would have us infer; and I mean, second, that the actual divorces in that stratum constitute no such case against the family institution as the same decryers want us to believe."

Removing the Obstacles.

Dr. Small refers to conditions in which it is impossible for the family to maintain itself. The sensible thing for the church to do is to study these conditions and lend its assistance in every wisely planned attack upon them. It is easy enough to denounce the evils of divorce in conventions, synods, and conferences. It is quite another matter to search out and remove the causes of divorce. Rules of the church and laws of the state have their uses, but there is something more fundamental without which rules and laws are worth less than the paper on which they are written. The over-worked and under-fed cannot acquire the virtues necessary for the right kind of home life. They do not know what a Christian home should be. The idle rich cannot have good character and therefore they cannot build Christian homes. The temptations of idleness are too strong for the resisting power of any man. The Lord taught his disciples to pray, "Lead us not into temptation." He evidently expects us to remove temptation from the way of others.

The Spirit of the Family.

The home is the place for the development of character. Hence the men and the women who enter the marriage relation for money considerations are despicable creatures. They sell their birthright for a mess of pottage. A man who cannot support a family ought not to marry and a woman is doing right when she refuses to become the wife of a financially incompetent man. But affection that risks poverty is as high as the heavens above the sordid spirit that looks for dollars first and for character last. Every human interest should be discussed with intelligence and sympathy in the family circle. Gossip will have no place where the subjects discussed are those that expand the mind and the heart. Good cooking is essential to health and a man is a fool if he knowingly marries a woman ignorant of what human beings should eat, but the home is more than a boarding house. The scriptures command the children to obey their parents; they also command that the children be treated right by parents. Boys and girls are not implements to be used in increasing the size of the farm and the bank deposits; they have worth in themselves and it is this that should be brought to perfection in the family. They have a right to be taught in the home how to live as the children of God.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

TOPIC FOR JUNE 13.

The Noble Life of Frances Willard. Prov. 31:10, 17-20, 25, 26, 29-31.

"Unless there is a predominating and overmastering purpose to which all the accessories and incidents of life contribute, the character will be weak, irresolute, uncertain. This is just what Jesus Christ is for, to impart to us a predominant motive of character, that shall be the highest, the most lasting, and the most beneficent, to replace indefiniteness, by clearness, and aimless reverie by resolute aim."

Long ago I copied these words of Frances E. Willard in my Bible, my interest in her life having been fostered by a godly mother and later by her thrilling address in the old Battery D Armory, at the Chicago Endeavor Convention in 1888. Since then I have found many choice, epigrammatic sentences in her writings. You will be amply repaid in reading her life by Anna A. Gordon.

Frances Willard had a noble and godly ancestry. Blood will tell. Much of her childhood was spent out of doors. She had the best of training of the schools. She knew how to economize—for three months she had but 50 cents spending money, a gift from a farm hand, Irish Mike. Her father would not permit her to read novels, a command she obeyed until her eighteenth birthday when she began reading Ivanhoe. The wisdom of her father's command she later recognized and acknowledged how much she owed to "the firm hand that held her impetuous nature from a too early knowledge of the unreal world of romance."

When a young girl Frances gave her life to God. The reality of that dedication was early proved. Like Whittier she advised young people, if they wished to grow, to espouse an unpopular reform. She knew what that meant. After very successful teaching, she was offered a very fine position at $2,400 per year, and at the same time the presidency of the Chicago W. C. T. U., at that time weak and poor. She chose the latter and her life work began! In carrying it on, in those earlier years, she was often hungry, often maligned, often misunderstood, but never discouraged.

Miss Willard was one of the pioneers in public work by women. Her oft-expressed rule was, "Womanliness first—afterword what you will." She justly felt that home protection was woman's work. To her it was not a work which eliminated the home or made it secondary—it exalted and upheld it. In her own case she felt, as Lady Henry Somerset has said, that "her life was the property of humanity." The splendid principles outlined in Proverbs 31 were not wanting in her life.

We have from her pen a famous resolution, adopted at Cleveland, in 1874, which is a classic expression of the purpose which must control all who fight for God and man: "We will, trusting in him who is Prince of Peace, meet argument with argument, misjudgment with patience, denunciation with kindness, and all our difficulties and dangers with prayer."

Here are some great lessons from the noble life of Frances E. Willard:

An illustration of the close relation which should exist between daughter and mother;

The result of loyalty to great though unpopular convictions;

The enlargement and blessing of the life which truly sacrifices, itself for a holy cause;

The opportunity of womanhood in furthering moral reforms;

The necessary place of religion in balancing and inspiring service.

whirr. Something went by the window like a flash. It was an automobile and it was stopping at the gate. A young girl sprang out and came up the walk. It was the girl of yesterday.

Waitstill went to the door. In an instant her troubles were thrust aside. That sweet, young face—how glad she was to see it again. They both smiled at each other.

"Come in," cried Waitstill. But the girl shook her head. She held a package in her hands. Then she spoke. "Will you forgive me?" she said, "but I couldn't bear to think of you—giving up your dress. I've brought it back, and I had some lace and ribbon and things put in to help make it, just as I would if it were going to be mine. No, don't thank me. It's such a joy to me to give it back. You ought to have it. It suits you somehow—the color, I mean. I'm glad I happened to be the one to do it. We're just passing through, father and I—we leave here tonight." Waitstill stood there. Her beautiful lips quivered.

"And you," she cried softly. "You—you are giving me back my old rose dress. Oh, I've wanted it so. I could scarcely give it up. The world hasn't looked the same since. I've just been heartsick."

"But now you're going to make it up and wear it and be happy in it," said the girl brightly. "We may never meet again, but I shall never forget you. Good-bye." But Waitstill had suddenly taken the slight young figure in her arms. "Good-bye," she said solemnly. "What is it the Bible says——"

"The Lord bless thee and keep thee. The Lord make His face shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee. The Lord lift up His countenance upon thee and give thee peace."

The next moment the automobile flashed by and out of sight. But in Waitstill's toil-hardened hands was the visible evidence of its appearing. The world was not gray, after all. She had come into her own again.

hoisted Courthorne into the wagon and packed some hay about him, while, soon after the rattle of wheels sank into the silence of the prairie, the girl Maud Barrington had spoken to rejoined her companion.

"Could Courthorne have seen you coming in?" he asked.

"Yes," said the girl blushing. "He did."

"Then it can't be helped, and, after all, Courthorne wouldn't talk, even if he wasn't what he is," said the lad. "You don't know why, and I'm not going to tell you, but it wouldn't become him."

"You don't mean Maud Barrington?" asked his companion.

"No," said the lad with a laugh. "Courthorne is not like me. He has no sense. It's quite another kind of girl, you see."

Chicago Secretary Reports Observations Down State.

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

It has been the duty of the Chicago secretary to visit the district conventions in Illinois recently. Abingdon, Pontiac, Taylorville and Rantoul have been visited in turn and the conditions in these great sections of the state studied. It is no small privilege to be able to ride all over the state of Illinois. The grand old state cannot fail to impress the visitor with its wonderful resources, its kindly people and its interest in the things that make for the coming of the kingdom.

We were not making the trip as a stranger. We first came into the faith in a central Illinois church. We attended the Illinois college of the Disciples. All of our pastorates had been in Illinois. We were going back home to see how things would look after the sojourn in the far country of a great city. The prodigal was graciously received. We laughed again at the humor of this good people who never get overserious about life and who never miss the chance for a hearty laugh.

Prosperity of Illinois Disciples.

If there is any doubt of the strength of the Disciples in Illinois, it will all be dissipated by such a trip. Everywhere we have great church buildings. Pastor Moore in Abingdon preaches to over three hundred people every Sunday morning. Not over three of our churches in Chicago out of the twenty-two have such audiences. The talk of new buildings is in the air everywhere. With buildings already that would make our Chicago churches envious, they want better places, and it is right that they should build for the coming generations and speaking through splendid architecture voice their devotion to our common faith.

We were impressed, however, that some of our problems were their problems. We have mourned for years over the meager attendance at our second district conventions in Chicago. We do well in Chicago in proportion to our membership. The business of the great third district was done by twelve preachers who made the motions and about two dozen sisters who voted them through. We were unable to learn of any business men who had left business to come in to counsel over the affairs of the kingdom.

In the conventions, they are now sounding everywhere the need of closer co-operation in the affairs of the church. This is a happy reaction from the tendency of a few years ago. A few years ago the districts began to say, We will spend our missionary money closer to home, and they withheld a portion to work in districts where the church already possessed the field. The districts, however, soon reaped a harvest from this sentiment that had not been anticipated. The county organizations began to insist on missionary money being used simply in the county and it was not a far jump from that for a church to decide that the township was a proper boundary for missionary expansion. This shut off missionary vision. One "missionary" convention we attended this year, had many fine addresses on the conserving of the interests of the local church already existing but nothing about the real missionary field of the state, such as the mining towns, the great cities and the townships without any Sunday-school.

Heresy Down State.

Chicago will be surprised to learn that there is much heresy down state. While our orthodoxy has always been of the simon-pure brand yet the pure-food inspectors of the brotherhood have had somewhat to say about us. We wonder what they would say if they had been traveling with us on this trip! We were horrified to learn that one of our churches had been employing a Methodist minister as pastor, though he was in full fellowship with his conference. We trust the Chicago brethren will deal in Christian spirit with this departure from the faith! We have some excellent places around town where heretics could be burned but we must meet heresy with a steadfast appeal to the traditions of the church! Seriously, we enjoyed the heresies we found down state. Why should a church that boasts of liberty, and which believes it is catholic enough to furnish a home for all truth, not hear a minister of another religious body for a year? In the case we speak of, the minister was converted instead of the church and is now a staunch Disciple, but if once in a while the church made some changes, it would only prove our hospitality to all new truth. We found sociological heresies rampant which we have fought in Chicago. Men have lost all fear of the Inquisition and talk freely about evolution and everything else. While we feel awfully old-fashioned in our views since coming back to Chicago, we have a great feeling of satisfaction that officers and leaders of the down-state churches are free and are thinking to much purpose.

Back to the Old College.

After attending a night session of the state Sunday-school convention at Peoria, where there were sixteen hundred delegates from out of the city, and hearing a fine practical address from a Christian business man and a lot of illogical and oratorical defense of the faith from a Chicago preacher, we proceeded to the old college town, Eureka. We had not been back in many years. We had not expected to meet any that we knew. The faculty was different almost to a man. But we did find a student that was there eleven years ago. It was a tribute to his persistence in the great ideal. The ancient guild of sign-painters and decoraters, to which we confess a guilty relationship in the days gone by, is still in active existence and the college belfry has new class dates inscribed to take the place of those we risked our lives to inscribe in days gone by. There were new swains to wander off to the shady side of the campus to tell the old, old story to an audience of one. All the romance of forgotten years came over us. When we spoke in chapel and the applause was such as would greet Bryan or Henry Ward Beecher, we remembered how we used to encourage speakers to go beyond their time that the professor in the succeeding hour might not find out that a social engagement the night before had prevented our doing the usual stunt on Anabasis. The college has about the attendance it had ten years ago. It is much the same in every way. Long live our alma mater!

Chicago Mission Problem Symbolized in Pontiac.

We proceeded from here to Pontiac. We found many of our Chicago citizens in the large institution to the south of town. Of the eight hundred inmates of the Reformatory, we were told the majority came from Chicago. Thus we are not able to run away from the greatest missionary problem of the state of Illinois, the redemption of the city. The convention was held in the splendid new brick church which has been erected by this congregation that was not so long ago the child of the Illinois Christian Missionary Society. Were we envious as we worshipped in that church? At least we felt that the gospel ought to be given the same chance in Chicago. We spoke on the city problem here. We found the audience deeply interested in the problem of the great city and more preachers told us of Disciples gone to the great city than have spoken on this subject all year. We are to return to this district to tell the story of our city's need in the churches.

We have been much heartened by the trip. We fight our battles in Chicago supported by a great and sympathetic brotherhood. Theological disputation will no longer obscure the great human problems of our age. The brethren of the state are as liberal in spirit as are we. Both of us see that the real problem of the church lies in the field of the ethical and social.

Chicago Sends Missionary to Africa

Dr. Royal J. Dye has been in Chicago. He brought to pass here the same kind of events that characterize his visits to every city. Missionary enthusiasm was kindled in the churches where he spoke. Especial interest was created in the work in the Congo country. And money was raised for the great cause. Chicago, itself a mission field of vast and crying need, joyously responded to the call of the far away mission field, thus sharing in the same spirit of merciful giving of which she is herself the beneficiary. Dr. Dye had spoken in Englewood, Irving Park and Jackson Boulevard churches. But the climax of his visit came on Tuesday, June 1. That afternoon one hundred and fifty women gathered in the Englewood Church to hear Mrs. Dye and that evening about seventy-five men came together in W. R. Faddis' restaurant downtown to hear Dr. Dye. Professor Willett spoke first, followed by Professor Frederick Starr, the famed anthropologist, whose remarkable testimony to Dr. Dye's mission work is well known. The fervor, the abandon and the graciousness with which the scholar spoke of the missionary was convincing and, to many, surprising. Rev. A. W. Taylor, who was presiding, called on Mr. Guy Sarvis, an African traveler and erstwhile missionary to India, who proved to be an entertaining and informing speaker. Then Dr. Dye himself spoke, telling the story of the conversion of almost the entire town of Bolenge, where their mission is located. His dramatic account of the conversion of the chief of a neighboring village enthralled the attention of every man. The eagerness, the enthusiasm, the statesman-like grasp of a statesman's enterprise appealed to the intelligence and feeling of his hearers.

When C. G. Kindred got up he said we wanted to raise $1,000 then and there to send a companion missionary back with Dr. Dye to reënforce those already working there. The thousand dollars was raised. The missionary has been selected in the person of a Mr. Smith, who graduates this week from Bethany College. Our purpose to give extended space to Dr. Dye and his work next week is our reason for making no more elaborate report of this, to Chicago Disciples, most significant event.

Chicago Church Notes

A number of outside gifts have been sent in to help the Evanston church in its building enterprise. The Sunday-school is starting out to raise a mile of pennies for the building enterprise.

The city board is planning some important enlargement of its work. The conviction is growing that the society must amend its charter that it may help in the erection of church buildings when this is necessary.

No pastor has been called yet to succeed Parker Stockdale at the Jackson Boulevard Church.

Northwestern Indiana Notes

When C. J. Sharpe took charge of the work at Hammond a few years ago it seemed almost hopeless. But he has infused new life into it. will soon have a handsome, commodious building and altogether is gathering the elements of a strong church. He is the secretary of our Lake district and under his direction a number of congregations have been organized.

Gary is certain to be one of the big cities of America. It is a wonder city in its development. On this account it is a matter of deep regret that we do not have the financial resources to begin the work commensurate with the importance of the place. One dollar invested now would mean more than fifty in a few years. We have a congregation of fine people, but they are woefully handicapped by the lack of a suitable building. All the denominations are getting good plants. With more means we could take the lead and become a powerful factor in the making of a great city.

The writer delivered the address to the graduates of the North Manchester High School, May 27. This is a flourishing little city of 3,500, where we ought to have a congregation. I heard E. T. Daugherty of Wabash, in the same county, and he has been secured to deliver the Decoration Day address.

I am to speak at the Michigan convention June 10 in the interests of the National Benevolent Association. It does not seem to be generally known that the Benevolent Association conducts a hospital in Valparaiso that is rendering a service to suffering humanity that ought to command the interest of our entire brotherhood. It has a splendid corps of physicians and surgeons both from Chicago and Valparaiso, and being in practically a suburb of Chicago, has many advantages over the hospitals in the big, dusty, noisy city.

We are sorry to learn that our neighboring county of La Porte was carried by the saloon forces yesterday. So far, the liquor interests have carried but nine counties, while the temperance people have carried almost sixty, and elections are being held every week. Our own county, Porter, votes next week and we are busy night and day and expect to carry it by a handsome majority.

In Porter County is located the big University of Valparaiso, the largest in America in point of attendance, with over 6,000 students enrolled last year, 185 members in the faculty, twenty-four departments and a million dollars invested in buildings. Pres. H. B. Brown and many of the faculty are members of the Christian church and a great number of students from forty nations attend our services.

R. E. Snodgrass is doing a most excellent work at Michigan City. He recently held a meeting with eighty additions and is leading in an effort for a building.

I know of an opening for an energetic, capable man who can work for $850.00 per year and parsonage in one of the big and growing centers in this Chicago-Lake district. If a young man of determination can be secured he can do a similar work to that of Bro. Sharpe of Hammond.

I have been teaching a training class for preachers at the University for the past two years. The attendance has ranged from 50 to 105. All the smaller churches and many school houses in all the county round about have been supplied with capable men, men whom the brotherhood will be pleased to honor in coming years.

Valparaiso, Ind. Bruce Brown.

Echoes of the Gospel of the Helping Hand

General Secretary Mohorter is doing pioneer work for the Benevolent Association. He attended the convention of the New Mexico churches, held at El Paso, May 29 to June 2.

Marion Stevenson, National Bible School Superintendent, delivered the address for the Cleveland Christian Orphanage and the Benevolent Association at the Ohio Convention at Elyria.

The speakers for our organized benevolent work at the Missouri convention are Mrs. T. R. Ayars, Mrs. Oreon E. Scott, and Mr. J. W. Perry. This makes a strong trio. The children from the Orphans' Home and the Babies' Home will be introduced.

The Christian Orphans' Home has the largest family in its history. The family number 166 children besides the necessary helpers. Still others just as worthy are clamoring for admittance. This heavy draft is being made upon the sympathies of the Home notwithstanding the fact that children are being placed in family homes every day. The need is great and distressing. Nearly all these children are brought in by mothers left without support and their natural supporter. They beg for temporary aid, at least, in the name of the tender Christ. This home needs and deserves the aid of every disciple of Christ.

Dr. Wilkes, of St. Louis, deserves to be numbered among the benefactors of the race. He takes care of the great family of the Christian Orphans' Home. He answers every call, day or night, and does it all for love. He is a member of the Baptist church. He recently remarked that "Christian love knows no denominational lines. It is a joy to work for suffering humanity in the name of Christ."

The Association is preparing a complete set of stereopticon slides setting forth the work from the beginning. It is the aim to present the work of each of its institutions. The presentation of the work in this way will furnish a delightfully instructive entertainment.

Plans have been completed for the erection of a new building for the Colorado Christian Home at Denver. This home now occupies a rented house. It is doing a most commendable work. It is the only benevolent institution of our people in the great Rocky Mountain country. This new building is one of the Association's Centennial Aims. J. E. Pickett, of the Highlands Church, is chairman of the home board of managers. Help secure the $10,000 needed for this worthy enterprise.

The Christian Church has no hospitals worthy of the name. It has had two very small institutions for years. Thev have done very creditable work as far as they have gone. The time has come for something worth while in the name of the Great Physician. The Central Executive Board of the Association has decided to erect a building in St. Louis for general hospital purposes. The first section of this building will cost not less than $30,000. It is hoped that this will mark the beginning of a work for the physically sick that will prove a credit to a great people pleading for a return to the spirit and practice of primitive Christianity. This new undertaking is worthy of the support of the entire brotherhood.

After nine years of residence at 903 Aubert Ave. the headquarters of The National Benevolent Association have been removed to 2955 Euclid Ave. The new offices are located in one of the dormitories of the new building erected for the Christian Orphans' Home. The friends of the Association will find the latch string always out at the new residence as it was at the old. They are most cordially invited to call. They should remember the address, 2955 Euclid Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

W. H. Inlow and wife, who for three years have served the Juliette Fowler Home at Grand Prairie, Tex., have resigned. Mr. and Mrs. Inlow were most valuable workers. They were especially well adapted to the care of the children. Here is a fine opportunity for some Christian man and woman, husband and wife, to enter into the most practical Christian service. No greater field of usefulness presents itself than the care and oversight of a large family of orphans and other unfortunate children. Such work is most truly missionary. It takes rare skill and Christian patience to train these unfortunate young people for valuable service for country and for Christ. Those who are interested should write the National Benevolent Association, 2955 Euclid Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

E. T. C. Bennett, who for a number of years represented our Benevolent Associations in Pennsylvania and the East, has recently changed his field of activity to Indiana. Bro. Bennet deserves a most cordial welcome from all the churches in Hoosierdom for his own sake and the sake of the ministry which he represents.

Mr. J. W. Perry, president of the Association, has recently been elected president of the National Bank of Commerce, Kansas City, Mo. Mr. Perry's change of residence will not lessen his interest in the beneficent work of the church. He will remain the head of the Association.

The list of Life Lines continues to grow. Union Ave. and Hamilton Ave., St. Louis; First Church, Sedalia, Mo.; Centralia, Mo.; East Liverpool, O.; First Church, Omaha, Nebr.; Shelbina, Mo.; Clarksville, Mo.; and Maryville, Mo., are numbered among the early life lines this year. One hundred dollars is sufficient to support a member of the family under the care of the National Benevolent Association. The church and Bible-school that furnishes this support in a true sense offers a life line to one of the world's unfortunates.

The Easter offering of the Union Ave. Church, St. Louis, was nearly $800. This church supports no less than three living links in the mission field. In the midst of its great missionary activities it does not forget the widow and the orphan in the homeland in their affection.

Southwest Missouri

A few notes from this section may be of interest, for everything is moving in these parts.

The Third District Convention was held at Neosho, May 3-6. It was a good one, the program was high grade. Besides local talent C. H. Chilton, J. H. Hardin, T. A. Abbott, G. W. Muckley and Geo. B. Ranshaw were there. They brought with them great addresses which inspired our workers. The last public work of Bro. Hardin, I believe, was in this convention. A good man has gone. We loved him. His place will be hard to fill.

Things were done at this convention which mean much to our work in this South-West country. Drury College, which is an institution of high standing located in this city, had made our people a most generous offer. It is a growing and prosperous college, formerly Congregational, but now undenominational, only Christian. It has an endowment of $446.000.00, grounds and buildings worth $517,000.00, making a plant worth nearly a million dollars. It had 496 students in all departments this year. It has twenty-four members of the faculty. Through its broad minded president, Dr. J. H. George, we were offered the privilege of placing in this this school a Bible Professorship. The man we place will be received as a members of the faculty, be placed on the Carnegie Foundation, have perfect liberty in his teaching, and all work done in his department to receive credit looking to diploma. He, of course, must be up to the standard of the rest of the faculty in scholarship. The churches in convention assembled unanimously accepted the proposition and we hoped that we can have the plan in operation by September. This will meet a long-felt need in this section. The Convention also decided to give more attention to some needy and neglected counties lying along the southern border of the state by placing an evangelist in their field.

Bro. F. F. Walters is getting hold of things at the First Church in Joplin. Professor Held, as leader of music, has joined him. Brother Held is from Oberlin.

Bro. D. W. Moore is building a $45,000.00 church building at Carthage. Bro. J. R. Blunt of Marionville takes the South Joplin church. He will make things go in that end of the city. Bro. Geo. L. Peters is pushing the work at the Central in this city, and Bro. N. M. Ragland is succeeding nicely at the First Church. The South Street Church, of which the writer is pastor, will soon begin the construction of a building costing, when finished and furnished, $40,000.00. The much needed building revival has evidently come to this section. Neosho and Aurora built good modern buildings last year. This year the Central at Joplin, the church at Carthage, the South St. at Springfield, and Ozark will build.

Bro. Joseph Gaylor, the bishop-evangelist of this section, is wide awake and busy with things pertaining to the Kingdom. J. H. Jones and W. M. Mundell are doing good work as evangelists in the needy fields. The outlook is full of promise. F. L. Moffett.

Fourth District (Ill.) Convention

The fourth district convention was held at Pontiac, May 26-28. Owing to the State Sunday-school Convention at Peoria the same week the attendance was not as large as usual. But this was not due to negligence on the part of the board, but to the fact that the time for the state convention was very recently changed.

The C. W. B. M. session was attended almost entirely by the ladies, but those present were more than repaid by the instructive matter presented them.

The Bible study periods were in charge of Prof. Silas Jones of Eureka, who brought forth practical and helpful lessons on righteousness, justice, rejoicing and liberty from Isaiah, Micah, Romans and Galatians respectively.

J. W. Camp of Eureka in the President's Address dealt with the needs and opportunities of the work, and expressed the pious hope that District Evangelist will be put in the field this next year. Rochester Irwin, wrestling with the "Problems of Country and Village Church," spoke of some characteristics of the country man and the means of best dealing with him. He said that there is no greater opportunity to lose a life and yet find it than in such fields. The convention sermon was preached by N. H. Robertson of Colfax on the theme "This Man." It was an able and well polished effort.

In the afternoon R. B. Doane of Streator, on the "Comparative Value of Various Missionary Activities," after dealing with their positive value, said that there is no comparative except as we have systematized them for the good of the work. A. J. Scroggin spoke on "Saloon vs. Church." He said that these are the representatives of evil and good, and that there is war between them. The church fights well, wins one victory and then—quits. He plead for greater interest and activity, looking to the spring primaries. A resolution was passed, endorsing the work of the anti-saloon league. R. E. Hieronymous, President of Eureka College, spoke of the value of religious education, and plead for Eureka on account of the men she has and is sending out. A resolution was also passed endorsing the campaign for enlargement that is being conducted by H. H. Peters, field secretary of the college, who told, at the close of the President's address, of the definite work already accomplished and that is yet to be done.

Thursday evening was taken up with the address of State Secretary J. Fred Jones on "Making Good," in which he met the requirements of his subject. He showed how the Disciples have made good in their plea for union, in education, in benevolence and in missions, dealing concretely with the state and district work.

Friday morning O. F. Jordan of Evanston spoke on the "Chicago Problem." He dealt with Chicago's greatness, both for good and evil, and said that if the rest of the state don't take Chicago the worst Chicago will take the state. There is lots of money in Chicago, but very little is available for the Lord's work. H. H. Peters, State Supt. of Christian Endeavor, spoke of the permanence of this work, its relation to the church and plans for its development. The program closed with a Bible School Conference. L. R. Thomas of Eureka, speaking of the "Man Behind the School," said he must get rid of evil in high places, start a real prayer-meeting, and then organize his Bible classes. F. L. Starbuck, one of Eureka's ministerial students, spoke on the "Bible School Our Opportunity." He plead for efforts to crystalize our teaching in service.

After reports of the committees the Convention adjourned to meet next year at Pekin, J. C. Lappin, Armington, was elected president; A. T. Shaw, Pontiac, vice president, and C. W. Ross, Cooksville, secretary, for the next year.

Chas. W. Ross, Sec'y.

Cooksville, Ill.

Sunday-school Contest Closed

The contest between the First Christian Church Bible School, Omaha and the Beatrice and Lincoln Christian Church Bible Schools which began the first Sunday in February and closed the last Sunday in May was spirited and enthusiastic. Omaha wins with a handsome majority. The contest was based on percentage of officers and teachers present, increase over average attendance last year, and increase over average offering last year.

Omaha conducted a Red and Blue contest in which the Blues were victorious, and a May Rally as follows:

May 9th .....Mothers' Day.
May 16th .....Babies' Day.
May 23rd ...Boys'. and Girls' Day.
May 30th .....Grand Rally Day.

Seven hundred postal card invitations with coupons for each Sunday were mailed the first week in May, and seven hundred postal cards with a beautiful picture of the First Christian Church were mailed previous to Grand Rally Day, resulting in a total attendance on May 30 of 620, and an offering of $600.00 with more to hear from.

In the Junior Bible Class (mixed adults) Brother Kersey, teacher there were 102 present, offering $90.00.

The primary department, under the direction of Mrs. Jay DeJarnette, Superintendent has greatly increased in interest and attendance and will soon have to seek larger quarters. A Cradle Roll department has been added and a Home Department brewing.

These splendid results have been very gratifying to our officers, teachers and our peerless leader, Brother J. M. Kersey, Minister.

William A. DeBord, Superintendent.

City Union Work in Greater New York

Report for Six Months ending May 1, 1909.

The following fields have been investigated by J. L. Darsie in his work as City Evangelist: Ridgewood Heights, Brooklyn; Richmond Hill, Long Island; Edgewater, New Jersey; Palisades, New Jersey; Leonia Heights, New Jersey, and Staten Island, New York.

Ridgewood Heights.

As a result of the investigation at Ridgewood Heights, Brooklyn, the committee has established a mission under the leadership of J. L. Darsie, and a report of this mission on May 1 shows thirty-five enrolled in Sunday-school, with preaching services held on Sunday. This mission meets in rented quarters on the second floor of a frame building, and serves members who formerly lived in the vicinity of the Greenpoint Church. It would seem desirable to secure a meeting place on the first floor of a rented building in the near future.

Flatbush.

The work in Flatbush under the leadership of Mr. Walter S. Rounds shows considerable progress and reports on May 1 a church membership of 105; the Bible School enrollment is 120; the Young People's Society, twenty-five; Women's Work, forty-nine; Men's Club, twenty-nine. A special meeting was held in April under the leadership of John G. Slayter, resulting in seven additions to the membership. For this meeting $136 were raised in the field.

Greenpoint.

The work at the Greenpoint Church in the 17th Ward of Brooklyn has continued under the leadership of Mr. Joseph Keevil. The total membership on May 1 was 240; the enrollment in the Bible School was 241. The institutional work carried on by this church shows a sewing class of sixty-nine members enrolled, an athletic club with thirty members, and a Jewish mission meeting weekly with an average attendance of twenty-one persons per week. This mission is an attempt to interest the non-church going Jews in the community. A Jewish missionary is employed at a salary of $30 per month. Tracts and circulars are distributed, and visits are made by the missionary. The work is seriously handicapped by lack of proper accommodations, which we hope will soon to be remedied.

During the month of April Mr. Keevil was absent on a trip through the Southern States in the interest of the American Christian Missionary Society.

The building committee in charge of raising the funds for the new building in Greenpoint has been granted a loan from the church extension board amounting to $7,000. The collection of additional funds for this purpose is progressing slowly. The Building Committee expects to arrange, shortly, for the erection of a part of the new building.

Russian Work.

Your committee has investigated the Russian situation in New York City, as requested by the A. C. M. S., and reports as follows:

A school has been conducted in the rooms of the Young Men's Institute, 222 Bowery. In this school there is a class for the teaching of English, with an average attendance of twenty-five men. Eighteen sessions of this class have been held. Another class for the teaching of penmanship is conducted, with an average attendance of eighteen men. We find that there are five different groups of Russian Christians in New York, and the largest of these meets in a church basement reading room on Second street. The leader of this group is John Johnson. The next largest group meets on Suffolk street, under the leadership of Nickolas Motin. Our Russian school enrolls pupils from each group, including the leaders.

It would seem to the committee that for the present, the best method of handling this situation would be the extension, as rapidly as possible, of classes in English and penmanship, and when these Russians become more familiar with American institutions and customs the organization of Missions may then be attempted. The committee is fortunate in having the co-operation of an Immigration Secretary of Y. M. C. A. at Ellis Island, Mr. Julian Zelchenko, a young Russian who has also acted as secretary for the Russian school.

The establishment in rented quarters of a Russian Christian Home seems desirable. This Home could be used on Sundays for a meeting place for the congregation, and on week nights for the Russian school. It is hoped that such a common meeting place will attract the separated groups of Russians into a strong united work. This home could also shelter the immigrant as he leaves Ellis Island in search of employment. Part of such a building could be occupied by the leader, and ought to be located east of the Bowery in the neighborhood of Spring street.

Two Hundred Men, $100 Each

At the last meeting of the Board of Trustees of The American Christian Missionary Society the secretaries were instructed to make an endeavor to induce two hundred Christian business men to make a special gift of $100.00 each to Home Missions before the October Convention. Knowing something of the intelligence and spirit of many men of affairs in our churches I am warranted in believing that this appeal will not be ignored. I am confident that the pastors of nearly all our churches appreciate the supreme importance of evangelizing America; that they are familiar with the contribution to this end made by our Home Society, and that they see the larger work that would be hers if provided with the necessary funds. This being true, they will heartily coöperate with our secretaries in presenting the claims of this great work to the business men in their respective fields of labor, thus assuring a general response to this worthy appeal. When we remember that a very large percentage of our churches owe their birth or escape from an early death to Home Missions, the great value of this work and our indebtedness to it become apparent. The President of The Foreign Christian Missionary Society in one of his recent addresses, indicated the importance in the work done by The American Christian Missionary Society when he said, that were the Society represented by him to eleminate from its treasury the contributions of churches helped by the Home Society, it would have to close its doors.

If only a few of the many letters coming to our secretaries from needy fields, revealing the great opportunities for establishing strong churches, were read in our churches next Sunday morning, I am sure that money would pour into our treasury that more of these fields might be entered. Our business as Christians is to evangelize the world and "He does most to Christianize the world and hasten the coming of the Kingdom, who does most to make thoroughly Christian the United States."

The Disciples of Christ tnd the Federal Council

The recent Federal council of Churches of Christ in America, which met in Philadelphia in December, 1908, called the attention of the world, as never before, to the growing spirit of Christian unity among all the children of God, and the increasing dissatisfaction with the present divisions among those who, as Protestants, acknowledge the supreme authority of our Lord Jesus Christ, and the sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures as a rule of faith and practice for Christians.

The brethren who attended the Council as representatives of the Disciples of Christ, listened with joy and gratitude to the constant expression, from the platform and in the committee reports, of the very sentiments of Christian union that have echoed from our own pulpits for the past century. It is manifest that we are on the eve of a great movement for the unification of the scattered followers of Christ, and that this Federation will prove an efficient factor in bringing about the result.

It is readily seen that such a work as the Federal Council has mapped out, reaching to every part of our own country, and extending its influence into the most distant fields of the church's activity, requires the use of no small sum of money; although its business has been, and will be carried on with the utmost possible economy. The necessary means ought to be placed at once in the hands of the Executive Committee, that they may proceed to carry out the plans of the Council for the four years for which they have been elected.

The undersigned have been asked to serve as a committee to secure from the Disciples of Christ the share which it is believed is due from them, for this work. Our proportion, estimated according to our membership, is six thousand dollars ($6,000), to be paid during the next four years, in annual payments of fifteen hundred dollars. It is inexpedient to ask for any additional collections to be taken in our churches, so that we must look to individuals whose hearts are beating in sympathy with this movement, to give it their support. Surely every Disciple of Christ ought to rejoice in the privilege of assisting in such a movement as this.

We therefore appeal to our people everywhere to share in this good work. There are many men and women among us whom God has blessed with wealth, who could easily pledge a hundred dollars or more, to be paid in four annual installments. Many more could help in smaller sums. Every preacher of the gospel ought to contribute five or ten dollars, which would be but a small amount, divided in four payments. Let us be the first of the religious bodies that depend upon voluntary gifts for raising their amounts to report that we have it pledged. Give what you can, whether much or little.

Please send your pledges and money to the treasurer of the committee, Brother George A. Miller, Pastor of the Ninth Street Christian Church, 338 Tenth Street, N. E., Washington, D. C. Will not every one who reads this send at once his pledge, to be paid as indicated? We ask it in the name of Him who prayed that all His followers might be one in Him.

W. F. Richardson,
H. L. Willett,
George A. Miller,
Committee.

The Missouri Convention

The Missouri State Convention meets in St. Louis, June 18-24. It will be held in the Union Ave. Christian Church, on the corner of Von Versen and Union. This is best reached from the Union Station by trolley car on 18th street, transferring after two blocks to the Delmar car on Olive street going west, which passes within sight of the church.

The St. Louis churches will furnish bed and breakfast to all delegates and visitors to the convention. These are requested to send their names at once to Mr. T. L. Horn, Chairman of the Entertainment Committee, 710 Washington Ave., St. Louis, Mo.

WITH THE WORKERS

Good reports come to us of the work of C. H. Forster, at Red Bluff, Calif.

C. L. Morgan is in a meeting at Glen Wood Springs, Colo.

The Michigan State Convention is being held at Dowagaic, June 7-10.

E. G. Campbell has resigned at Wayland, Michigan.

Miner Lee Bates, president of Hiram College will be convention speaker at the annual meeting in Michigan.

The churches of Michigan are rejoicing in the fact that they have raised their $5,000.00 as a Centennial fund.

Dr. S. A. Space, President of Keuka College, occupied the pulpit of the Jefferson St. Church, Buffalo, N. Y., May 23.

A. A. Ferguson, Kingston, La., preached the baccalaureate sermon at the Atlantic Christian College.

Otto B. Irelan began his work as minister of South Berkeley, Calif., Church, June first.

H. E. Stafford has begun work as pastor of the church at Massilon, Ohio, where the prospects are bright for a splendid work.

O. V. Wilkinson has begun work as pastor of the church at Trinidad, Colo., and the church is encouraged over his coming.

G. R. Whipple, for two years pastor of the church at Carlton, California, has resigned to accept a call to the church at Elmira, where he began work the first of June.

Todd Brothers, of Prickett, Texas, are assisting in a meeting at Shreveport, La., in which the preaching is being done by Rev. Weaver, of Marshall, Texas.

J. M. Lowe, who was for a number of years pastor of the Capitol Hills Church, Des Moines, will soon move to University Place, and give his time to evangelistic work.

J. E. Dinger reports twenty additions to the First Church, Fort Worth, Texas, at regular services, May 23; making ninety-three additions in the past eight Sundays.

With the month of May W. B. Crewdson closed his work with the church at Salida, Colo., and has moved to Logan, Iowa. Mr. Crewdson's two years' ministry in Colorado are highly commended.

A reception was given the members of the Bible College, Drake University by Mr. and Mrs. C. S. Medbury, the evening of May 25. It is spoken of as one of the most enjoyable events of the year.

R. C. Moore, who has been pastor at Goldfield, Ia., has been called to Lake City. W. C. Cole, who has been working under the direction of the State Board at Jewell Junction, becomes pastor at Goldfield.

Richard Martin, evangelist, is in a meeting at Utica, Kansas, where there were twenty-five additions the first few days. The church there has an Adult Bible Class composed entirely of Germans, and taught in the German language.

Prof. Walter Athearn, who has been teaching in Highland Park College the past two years, is to return to Drake University. Prof. Athearn is very popular in his state, both as teacher and lecturer, and will be a decided addition to the faculty of Drake.

B. S. Ferrall, pastor of the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, will be chaperon for the "Boys' Imperial Athletic Club" of his church, on their camping trip this summer. The club is growing and an important factor in the work of the church.

Ben. L. Smith will begin his work as pastor of the church at Salina, Kansas, early in May. This is the union of a strong man and a strong church. We shall expect a great work of a permanent type in this important field.

The Sunday-schools of the University Place Church, Des Moines and the First Church, Canton, Ohio, are in a contest for numbers, each school notifies the other of the attendance during Sunday afternoon, and announcement is made at the evening service.

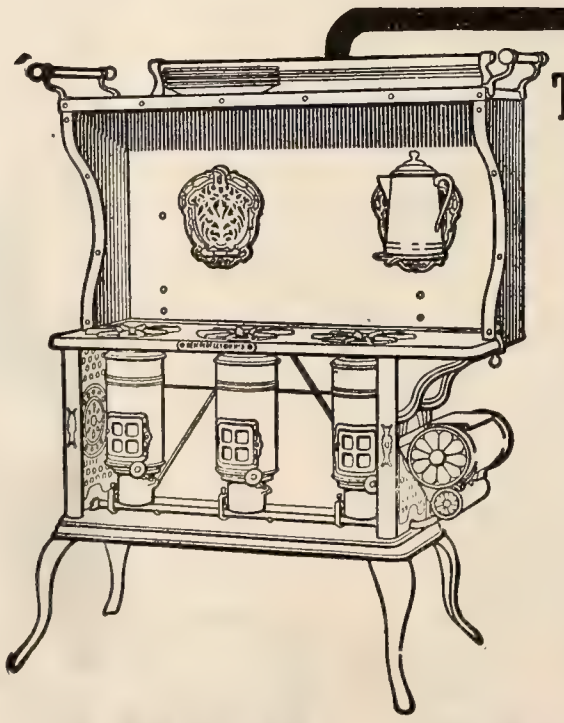
The Western District Convention (Colo.), will meet at Grand Junction, June 2 and 3. In this much attention is given to the work of the Sunday-school. Address are to be made by W. B. Craig, A. B. Elliott, R. H. Newton, and others.

B. B. Burton, who formerly lived in California, but more recently has been doing evangelistic work with DesMoines, Iowa, as headquarters, has gone to California again, and the churches there seem to have designs on him.

R. P. Shepherd, Pamona, California, has been asked to deliver a series of Bible addresses at the close of the year's work of the Y. W. C. A., at Los Angeles, California, which is said to be the largest association in the United States. It has 6,000 members, and a $350,000 building.

O. P. Speigel, general evangelist of Birmingham, Ala., has been in a very successful meeting at Jackson, Miss. There were twenty-one additions at the First Church the first two weeks. Then the meeting was moved to the West End Church, where it was progressing encouragingly at last report.

The convention of the Churches of Christ of Canada is to be held in the First Church, Toronto, June 2-7. The pastor, J. M. Van Horn, sends out an urgent invitation to the Canadian Disciples. Among the speakers will be, A. M. Haggard, J. H. Garrison, R. W. Miller, Buffalo; A. McLean, Dr. Butchart, China; Prof. C. T. Paul Hiram, and many others.



The Colorado Northern District Convention meets at Loveland, June 8-10. A fine program is announced. They are to have such speakers as, A. E. Dubber, Greeley; J. F. Findley, Ft. Collins; A. L. Ward, Boulder; and B. B. Tyler, Denver. Among the topics discussed are, "Long Pastorates," "The Sunday Evening Service," "The Co-operation of Churches."

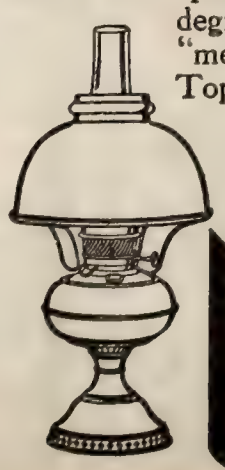
The First Church, Omaha, has issued a souvenir post card, bearing the picture of their new building.

The Annual Convention of the Southern Idaho churches will be held in Weiser, June 16-20. The program is full of missionary topics, indicating an aggressiveness on the part of these churches rarely surpassed. Among those who are to make addresses are, L. A. Chapman, W. E. Boulton, E. C. Sanderson, G. L. Surber, B. F. Clay, G. W. Muckley, E. E. Coulter, D. C. Peters, G. S. Lawrence, D. B. Titus, and F. E. Hagin.

The State Sunday-school Convention (interdenominational) was held in Peoria the last week in May. Ashley J. Elliott of the Central Christian Church was the marshall at the great parade, in which 1,500 men marched. The Christian churches of the state held a good fellowship meeting at the Central Christian Church during the convention. Addresses were made by C. L. DePew, Dr. Royal J. Dye, and Earnest Elliott.

The "Pacific Christian" which last week gave large space to the announcement of the election of H. H. Guy, as dean of the Berkeley Seminary, this week introduces to its readers, Prof. Walter Stairs, who has been with the Institution for one year in the chair of New Testament Greek and Exegesis. Prof. Stairs was formerly at Drake University, and is well known to many of our readers. He is a graduate of the Bible College at Lexington, with post graduate work in Yale University and the University of Chicago.

The Oil Stove With a CABINET TOP



The New Perfection Wick Blue Flame Oil Cook-Stove differs from all other oil stoves.—It has a CABINET TOP. This means you can keep dishes and utensils within easy reach while cooking, and can keep food hot after removing it from the blaze.

From its wonderful burners to its racks for holding towels the

NEW PERFECTION

is without equal. Its principle of concentrated heat means that the work can be done quickly and without the kitchen being heated to an unbearable degree. Can be lighted instantly and turned "high," "low" or "medium" at will. Three sizes. With or without Cabinet Top. At your dealer's, or write our nearest agency.

The Rayo Lamp comes as near lamp perfection as it's possible to get. Gives a clear, bright light that reaches the farthest corner of a good-sized living-room. Well made throughout of nickeled brass; perfectly safe and very ornamental. If not with your dealer, write our nearest agency.

WITH THE WORKERS

Edward Clutter reports twenty-nine added in the opening ten days of his meeting in Mine La Motte, Mo.

F. M. Rains dedicated the new house in South Omaha, May 23, and raised $3,000 to apply on their indebtedness.

C. C. Sinclair, pastor at Stuart Street, Springfield, Ill., says their recent ingathering makes the church entirely self-supporting. They are prospering in every department.

Commencement exercises of Cotner University, June 4-10. Burris A. Jenkins, of Kansas City, will give the class address. Friends of the University are invited to attend.

J. M. Lowe, of Goodland, Kansas, will remove about September 1, to Des Moines, Ia., to engage in evangelistic work. Churches desiring the right kind of a meeting held by the right kind of a man will do well to correspond with Mr. Lowe.

The Ann Arbor Church had a Centennial Rally and Roll Call service last Sunday, June 6. Such former members as could return were present and letters were read from previous pastors. The work at Ann Arbor is prospering under the leadership of O. E. Tomes.

Hugh T. Morrison, who is preaching for Disciples and Baptists on Prince Edward Island, changes his address from Kingsboro to Bothwell, Prince Edward Island. This is only a change of post office, not of field of labor.

George B. Stewart, who goes to the Colorado Springs church, has been engaged by the Redpath bureau to deliver two series of Biblical lectures of five each at the Mexico, Mo., Chautauqua this summer. "Leaves from Jewish History" and "The Divine Library" are the titles of his courses.

C. E. Booth began work at Le Roy, Kans., four months ago. The average Sunday-school attendance was forty-seven, prayer-meeting, six to fifteen. For the past three months average Sunday-school attendance has been 102, at prayer-meeting, thirty-eight, and there have been nineteen additions to the church.

The Portland Avenue Church, Minneapolis, Perry J. Rice, pastor, reports twenty-three additions during May. Only one of these had signed a card during the Gipsy Smith meetings. Two adult Bible classes have been organized recently, one for men and one for women, with a combined membership of over fifty.

E. W. Allen reports two baptisms May 30, at the Central Church, Wichita, Kans. During the past three months fifty persons have been received into the church and 120 at regular services since the close of the Scoville meetings, last November. Mr. Allen's church is one of the great missionary congregations of the Brotherhood.

The State Convention of New York will be entertained by the Central Church of Syracuse, June 29 to July 2. Peter Ainslee, of Baltimore, Marion Stevenson, of the Bible School work, W. J. Wright, of A. C. M. S., Mrs. M. E. Harlan, of the C. W. B. M., with a number of returned missionaries will reinforce the state leaders in making a superb program.

The First Church, Springfield, Ill., decided to build their new house on their present lot, notwithstanding the fact that a large sum was offered for its sale. The Sunday-school overpasses the four hundred mark each Sunday and promises yet larger gains. F. W. Burnham, the pastor, preached the baccalaureate sermon for Christian University, Canton, Mo., last Sunday.

Dr. Willett spent Sunday, June 6, in Lawrence, Kansas, preaching the baccalaureate sermon of the State University. On Friday preceding he attended a dinner, given by the ministers of Kansas City and vicinity, and lectured at the Linwood Boulevard Christian Church in the evening. In his absence from the pulpit of Memorial Church, Dr. Errett Gates, of the University of Chicago, preached in the morning, and Dr. Edward S. Ames, of the Hyde Park Church of the Disciples, in the evening.

Telegrams

Wichita, Kans., June 6.—Children's Day at Central: eight hundred in attendance, offering one hundred and sixty dollars.—E. W. Allen.

Foreign Christian Missionary Society, Cincinnati, O. Chicago's farewell reception to Royal J. Dye, one thousand dollars for Bolenge.—Alva W. Taylor.

Keysport, Ills.—Started here today. Only a handful of faithful Disciples. Yet a little leaven leaveneth the whole lump. We are praying and working to encourage and strengthen these small fields for the cause of Christ.—Thompson, The Egyptian.

Falls City, Neb., June 6.—Began here today with fifteen added. Meetings held in big tabernacle. Fifteen hundred present tonight. F. Ellsworth Day has made splendid preparations. Closed last Sunday at Lockhart, Texas, with one hundred thirty-nine responding to invitations.—Wm. J. Lockhart and Lintt.

Evansville, Ind., June 7.—Thirty-four converts yesterday, twenty-one last night, and the hottest day of the year. 450 in nineteen days of invitation. The street car strike, tying up all the lines so that the people dare not ride, has made this week's work very hard. People from far and near have walked nightly to the city auditorium. Have more than doubled our combined membership in Evansville. Brothers Drash, Turney and Sweeney have a great work in this city and are pushing on victoriously. They will organize a church at Howell mission and Evansville will have a fourth congregation.—Chas. Reign Scoville.

Des Moines, Ia., June 6.—A day of untold blessings. Out from local burdens of the year in connection with new building, this great people rallied for our greatest missionary offering. From all departments, for all parts of the work, the total stands at about sixty-five hundred dollars, fifteen hundred dollars increase over last year and the end is not yet. Six families by gifts of one hundred dollars each come to living-link basis. Other living-link groups in homes and foreign fields probable. Twenty of Drake's Volunteer Band with me on platform, and seven new Volunteers crowned the day's joy. Splendid children's exercises in the evening. Four hundred dollars from Sunday-school. Two confessions. The spirit of the Centennial abounds. —C. S. Medbury.

Charles Reign Scoville will hold a meeting in Little Rock, Ark., in January, 1910. J. N. Jessup is pastor there.

On Sunday, May 23, President T. E. Cramblett, of Bethany College, preached the commencement sermon for the Connellsville, Pa., High School. In the morning he preached for C. M. Watson, the pastor of the local church.

B. H. Hayden, London, Ontario, reports two recently added by baptism. His work there is opening up pleasantly. A happily arranged reception was given the new pastor and family the week after they arrived.

The men of the church at Bader, Ill., gave a banquet to the men of the vicinity, Monday evening, May 31. H. H. Peters gave an address on "The Land of Tomorrow," an exceptionally strong lecture which took the men by storm. The church is planning for a meeting by W. F. Shaw, of Chicago. L. R. Thomas is the pastor.

J. H. McCollough, San Jose, Cal., writes a note that is so typical of a great number of words of appreciation that we print it herewith: "I have just read 'The Trend of Events' in the Christian Century of May 20. I want to tell Brother Taylor that this one essay more than pays me for the price of the year's subscription. I shall feel the inispiration and uplift of your thought for many days."

A series of Centennial sermons on the "Origins of Our Movement," now being preached Sunday evenings by Claire L. Waite, pastor of the First Church, Milwaukee, Wis.:

1. The Great Departure from Apostolic Christianity, or How the Roman Catholic Church Originated.
2. Relics of the Dark Ages, or Survivals of Romanism in Modern Protestantism.
3. Attempts at Reformation, or How the Different Protestant Denominations Originated.
4. How This Restoration Movement Originated; I. Origin of "The Christians."
5. How This Restoration Movement Originated; II Origin of "The Disciples."
6. The Early Days of This Movement, or The Early Union of Baptists and Disciples.
7. The Early Union and Separation of Baptists and Disciples, or How the Baptists and Disciples Came to Separate.
8. How "The Disciples" and "The Christians" United, or the Union Principle Applied and Vindicated.
9. The Restoration of the Apostolic Evangelism. (As by Walter Scott et al.)
10. Then and Now, or The Progress of Christian Union During the Last One Hundred Years.

Notes From the Foreign Society

A telegram from Alva W. Taylor of Chicago brings the cheering news that our Chicago brethren have given a special $1,000 offering for Bolenge, Africa. This offering was made at a farewell reception and banquet tendered Dr. Dye by the Chicago brethren, Tuesday night, June 1. This fine gift will greatly cheer the missionaries and aid the work in Africa. Dr. Dye will start back to his work this month, greatly heartened by the warm interest and earnest response of our American brethren.

Send the Children's Day offering promptly to F. M. Rains, secretary, box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio. Be careful to give the local name of the Sunday-school when different from the postoffice. All the signs point to a large Children's Day offering.

MAKING SUNSHINE
It Is Often Found in Pure Food.

The improper selection of food drives many a healthy person into the depths of despairing illness. Indeed, most sickness comes from wrong food and just so surely as that is the case right food will make the sun shine once more.

An old veteran of Newburyport, Mass., says: "In October, I was taken sick and went to bed, losing 47 pounds in about 60 days. I had doctor after doctor, food hurt me, and I had to live almost entirely on magnesia and soda. All solid food distressed me so that water would run out of my mouth in little streams.

"I had terrible night sweats and my doctor finally said I had consumption and must die. My good wife gave up all hope. We were at Old Orchard, Me., at that time, and my wife saw Grape-Nuts in a grocery there. She bought some and persuaded me to try it.

"I had no faith in it but took it to please her. To my surprise it did not distress me as all other food had done and before I had taken the fifth package I was well on the mend. The pains left my head, my mind became clearer and I gained weight rapidly.

"I went back to my work again and now after six weeks' use of the food I am better and stronger than ever before in my life. Grape-Nuts surely saved my life and made me a strong hearty man, 15 pounds heavier than before I was taken sick.

"Both my good wife and I are willing to make affidavit to the truth of this."

Centennial Bulletin

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

Pittsburgh Hospitality.

The churches of Christ in Western Pennsylvania have made and partially paid subscriptions to the Centennial Convention Fund as follows:

First, Alleghany	$1000
East End, Pittsburgh	1000
Central, Pittsburgh	400
First, Washington	400
Squirrel Hill, Pittsburgh	300
Connellsville Church	300
Turtle Creek Church	200
Carnegie Church	200
First, Johnstown	200
Waynesburg Church	200
Hazelwood Church	150
Homestead Church	120
Crafton Church	100
Beaver Falls Church	100
Beaver Church	100
Dravosburg Church	50
Second, New Castle	50
Banksville Church	25
Nadine Church	25
Sheridan Church	25
Erie Church	25
Monessen Church	25
Greensburg Church	25
Scottdale Church	25
Calvary Church	25
Belle Vernon Church	20
Philipsburg Church	10
Enon Valley Church	10
Holbrook Church	10
Hooversville Church	5
Ridgway Church	5
Franklin Church	5
Butler Church	5

A number of our best churches are not included in the above list, and their subscriptions will considerably swell the total. When it is considered that this amount has been pledged during a time of financial depression, of which Pittsburgh was one of the principal storm centers, everybody will agree that this is no mean show of hospitality.

Making Ends Meet.

The first item of expense that has to be considered in entertaining a Convention is hall rent. The Pittsburgh Committee found itself in an unprecedented position in this regard as in many others. It was asked to provide auditoriums of the largest size for five simultaneous sessions. These will cost approximately $1,000 each. While only three will be needed throughout the entire period of the Convention, the excessive cost of one or two of these will keep the average up to what the one auditorium used at our annual Conventions usually costs. It is easy to foresee that the remainder of the fund provided by the churches will be wholly absorbed by the immediate expense of finding homes for the delegates, and then assisting the delegates to find those same homes.

Of course every church in Greater Pittsburgh is furnishing a group of workers to make the canvass of the city, and hundreds of our best members will take their vacation immediately before and during the Centennial by working day and night at headquarters and on reception committees. First and last the time that has been and will be given will amount to much more than the large fund of money contributed.

The Centennial Publicity Fund.

During the four years of the Centennial Campaign we have been gathering a list of representative members in all the churches. To every one of these persons we wish to send literature describing the attractions of the Centennial, outlining the program, giving full information in regard to entertainment and all the Convention arrangements. It will take 100,000 of these booklets to reach the people in the brotherhood that are especially interested. Various other forms of newspaper and circular publicity need to be used. The Pittsburgh Publicity Campaign should be as much greater than that of previous Convention Cities as the Centennial Convention is to be greater than those that have gone before.

For this purpose the business interests of Pittsburgh have already started a fund which it is hoped will not stop short of $10,000. $2,500 has already been subscribed. This week and next are being devoted by all our ministers, each in company with a business man, to a whirlwind canvass of the city to complete this amount at once so that it can be used at the time when it will be most effective.

The Centennial Memorial Program Book.

For our annual Conventions we have been satisfied with a paper bound program, half filled with display advertising. We have been satisfied with it because we understood that the advertising paid the printing bill, and that the church or churches entertaining the Convention were compelled without making heavy sacrifices to carry through their generous plan of hospitality to adding this additional burden. Before we had gone far in preparation for the Centennial we reached the conviction that this occasion demands something different. Every delegate should have a guide to the city, and a hand-book with him constantly while in the city. It should also be of such character as to both matter and mechanical preparation that it will be a permanent souvenir—an heirloom in the home of every delegate. This compels us to eliminate the display advertising and bind the book in edges. What is true of the program is equally forcible when we come to the badge. The celluloid disk is sufficient for the ordinary convention. But for the Centennial we want a handsome and significant design in metal.

At every turn there are considerations of the same sort. This is only once in a hundred years. We are accustomed in our homes to justify a little extraordinary expense at the holiday season by saying, "Christmas comes but once a year." Judged by the usual scale of expenses, a wedding is a time of wild extravagance. A certain amount of this unusual outlay is allowed because this is the supreme event in the lives of the contracting parties. None of these illustrations half indicate the extraordinary character of the Centennial. The very bigness of it makes it enormously expensive, as the number of guests increases the cost of the wedding dinner. But the character of the occasion counts for more than its size.

Centennial Registration Fee.

In recognition of the generous amounts already subscribed by the Pittsburgh churches and the large additional amount necessary to properly prepare for and handle the great Convention, the National Centennial Committee has instructed the local committee to ask every person who attends the Centennial to pay a registration fee of $1.00.

Until 1897 those who attended our National Conventions were give free board and lodging by the members of the churches and their friends in the Convention city. Then it was found that the proportions to which our Conventions had grown made this an intolerable burden. The next year the delegates paid for their own entertainment according to the general custom of large Conventions. For several years the sentiment has grown stronger and stronger in favor of a registration fee at each of our Conventions. One or two dollars is paid by every person who attends any of the interdenominational meetings whether the attendance be one thousand or twenty-five thousand.

In only one sense do the brethren at Pittsburgh regret that it falls to their lot to introduce this general order into our Conventions. The unique character and the immense preparations of the Centennial will doubtless enable us to do it without incurring the criticism that would fall upon any other city. But when once the plan is tried no one will favor returning to the old unequal order. Even the few that might otherwise object to a registration fee will heartily approve of the plan when they notice that what the Pittsburgh churches have given was beyond their ability, and that in addition each one who registers is presented with a handsome badge and a book which could not be matched in any store for $1.00. The registration fee is like the tuition paid by a college student which covers only half of the actual expense of his instruction. But in two respects the registration fee is different, for the delegate gets value received in the book, and any visitor who is unable and unwilling to register will be admitted freely to all the sessions of the Convention. The seats are as free as the seats in our churches. But just as in our churches we anticipate that only the extremely poor, or grossly unjust will enjoy the privileges without bearing the nominal share in the expense that is requested.

W. R. Warren,
Centennial Secretary.

Good Gains for May

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the month of May amount to $17,852, a gain of $4,361, or more than 31 per cent. This gain is exceptionally large for the month of May. The friends of the work will rejoice over the good news and be encouraged to press on. There has been a gain every month of the eight months of the current missionary year.

The total receipts for the missionary year, that is, from October 1, 1908 to June 1, 1909, amount to $136,748, a gain of $29,540, or over 27 per cent. This is the largest percentage of gain the Society has made during the corresponding period in many years.

The churches as churches have given $91,151, a gain of $9,590. There has been a gain in the receipts from every source except bequests, where there has been a loss of $4,118.

We regret to be forced to state that there has been a loss of 29 contributing churches. We feel sure that this will soon be overcome.

Now, let us see to it that June is made a great month.

JUST ONE A DAY
How the Coffee Drinker Compromises His Health.

Some people say: "Coffee don't hurt me" and then add: "Anyway I only drink one cup a day."

If coffee really don't hurt why not drink more? There is but one answer, and that is coffee does hurt them and they know it. When they drink it once a day they compromise with their enemy. There are people whom one cup of coffee a day will put in bed, if the habit be continued.

"Although warned by physicians to let coffee alone I have always been so fond of it than I continued to use it," confesses an Ohio lady. "I compromised with myself and drank just one cup every morning until about six weeks ago.

"All the time I was drinking coffee I had heart trouble that grew steadily worse and finally I had such alarming sensations in my head (sometimes causing me to fall down) that I at last took my doctor's advice and quit coffee and began to use Postum in its place.

"The results have been all that the doctor hoped, for I have not only lost my craving for coffee and enjoy my good Postum just as well, but my heart trouble has ceased and I have no more dizzy spells in my head. I feel better in every way and consider myself a very fortunate woman to have the truth about Postum."

Vol. XXVI. CHICAGO, ILL., JUNE 17, 1909. No. 24.

Revivalism and the Spiritual Life

In the series of questions suggested for the earnest consideration of evangelists, we reached last week a question which we promised to consider ourselves.

The earlier questions in the series cast no doubt upon the revivalistic method, as such. They had to do with the methods of particular evangelists—such points, for instance, as one would discuss in comparing one evangelist with another, say Gipsy Smith with Billy Sunday.

These points were all so personal to each evangelist that we felt the best way of getting at them would be through the evangelist's own mind, rather than through a pronouncement of our own judgment.

With the question propounded last week, however, the case would seem to be different. What we are now considering is not points of peculiarity possessed by one evangelist and giving him an advantage or a disadvantage in comparison with his brother worker; we are proposing to examine the thing common to all typical revivalists, the generic thing, revivalism itself. Concerning it we asked this question:

Does the church built up by typical revivalistic methods, or largely influenced by them, realize the full possibilities of the Christianity of Christ?

This is the most radical and searching and vital question we can conceive concerning revivalism. If one can entertain it the so-called vices of popular evangelism become insignificant. Questions concerning Billy Sunday's slang, for example, and his big haul of money at the end of a meeting seem only to scratch the surface of the problem.

The question regarded by most people as the most vital test of a revival is, "Do the converts stick?"

If the converts "stick," or if a good proportion of them "stick," the revival has proved itself good. An examination was recently made in Decatur, Illinois, one year following Mr. Sunday's great meeting there. There had been some six thousand "conversions." Almost three thousand of these had been taken into the churches. The reporter found upon examination that an average of sixty per cent of these had "stuck," that is, they were still more or less active in the churches which they joined. To the reporter's mind and, perhaps, to the average reader's mind this showing is ample proof of the thoroughness of Mr. Sunday's work.

But if we can entertain the question we have now raised, even such a consideration as the constancy of the converts is secondary and indeterminate. From the standpoint of the full possibilities of Christianity it may be that the methods of retaining the converts are subject to the same objections that are urged against the methods of securing them.

The revivalistic method is coming to be the conventional method of growth under pastoral as well as evangelistic leadership. It is not peculiar to evangelists.

And our thesis concerning the conventional way by which the church propagates the faith is that it builds up a church incapable of expressing the deeper and richer possibilities of the Christianity of Christ.

There are deeper and richer aspects of Christianity than have been recognized by the church. There are possibilities of personal enrichment in the gospel of which our conventional Christianity knows nothing. There are possibilities of social effectiveness and fruitage which the present day church does not see.

Christ's own religion meant vastly more to his soul than the religion bearing his name is made to mean to his disciples. The Christianity of Christ's own heart is receiving a fresh interpretation today. No doubt we are just beginning to perceive the singular richness of the experience of Jesus. Our main doctrine has centered in his death so long and so absolutely that the possibility that a principle for our salvation might be discovered in his life has only of late occurred to us.

But, having once occurred to our present day students of Christ, the clue is being followed with high hope that the secret of the richness and bigness and balance of Christ's personality may be possessed by us all.

To become a Christian would then mean the discovery of the secret by which Jesus lived and the decision of one's heart to make that secret its law.

But in no very serious and conscious way is our conventional church of today striving to discover the secret of Jesus and practice it. There are two primary reasons why the church lacks the conscious purpose to know the mind of her Lord.

The more obvious reason is the fact that Christianity has been historically conceived as a doctrine, or a set of doctrines about Jesus' person instead of an acquaintance with and appreciation of Jesus himself.

The Christian Religion has not always been, nor is it yet, the religion of Christ. It has always been possible to accept the Christian Religion and remain in heathen darkness concerning the religion of Jesus. So long as the reign of dogma prevails so long will the really vital elements of primitive Christianity be obscured.

However, even such statements as these must be qualified. For the fact is that the modern church is ceasing to be dogmatic. But it is not on that account becoming more vital. In yielding up its dogmas the church is also yielding up the virtue that accompanies dogma. That virtue is consciousness.

The outstanding weakness of the present day church is that it lacks consciousness.

So long as religion and dogma are identified you have an intense religious consciousness. But if with the passing of the creeds no ideal object remains to enthrall attention you may have a religion but it will be conventional, if not artificial.

And this is precisely a description of our present day Christianity. In so far as it is dogmatic still, it possesses a consciousness, keen and over-sensitive, but not vital. In so far as it has given up dogmas while formally retaining orthodox standing it has also likely been dispossessed of the consciousness of any truth at all, the perception of which would sustain and nourish and deepen the spiritual life.

Fuller proof of such statements need not be given than simply to analyze our method of evangelism. And this brings us to the consideration of the second reason why the church does not consciously undertake as its chief business to know the mind of Christ and to possess it.

This reason is that our evangelistic method, the method by which we bring men into the church, does not appeal primarily to consciousness but to the emotion or the will. And every appeal made to the emotion or the will except through clear perception of truth, produces a weak church and shallow spiritual life.

Two assumptions underlie popular revivalistic procedure: First, that men already know enough truth if they could only be persuaded to practice it. Secondly, that whether a man knows enough or not, once get him into the church in good faith and he will there learn the truth that he is to live by.

These two assumptions lie at the root of all revivalistic vices. More than that, they betray the incompetence of the typical revivalistic procedure even when stripped of its recognized vices.

The serious fault to be found with popular revivalism is not that it does no good: It does good, it saves souls, it raises money to build churches. Our present-day Christianity is in considerable degree the product of revivalistic methods.

But the serious fault with revivalism is that it eclipses a better kind of Christianity and develops a church which because it is developed in just that way is made incapable of fully expressing the more spiritual possibilities of the faith once delivered to the saints.

So radical a statement as this demands further analysis and concrete illustration. This we will endeavor to give in a succeeding article.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

VESTED INTEREST IN SALOON LICENSES

There is one sort of temperance reform (?) that the brewers unhesitatingly indorse. That is the limiting of the number of licenses to a certain number per the population. The English Brewers admit that their vested interests in licenses are worth $750.000,000. The license tax amounts to $9,000,000 per year, only one and one-fifth per cent on the value of the vested interests given by the license system. This limitation and thus value-enhancing policy does more to defeat temperance reform in England than any one other thing.

PRESBYTERIAN PROGRESS AT HOME AND ABROAD

The Presbyterian reports for the year show a decrease of 4,000 in members. But on the foreign field they made a gain of 5,000 over last year. The total number of accessions on the mission field was 15,000. The 10,000 added last year was the largest previous record. They have conducted an aggressive evangelistic campaign during the last year at home, yet the states that are strongholds of Presbyterianism show net gains of less than 1 per cent. On the other side the native teachers alone in Korea brought 8,000 new disciples into the class for instruction. Practically all of them will become Christians. The Korean Christians of the Presbyterian missions gave $77,000 and from all fields the native churches gave $350,000 for the work. This is reckoned to be the equivalent of $2,500,000 in our money.

TAFT OR ALDRICH

Mr. Taft's pre-election slogan was "a revision of the tariff that will make it cover the difference between the cost of production here and abroad, with a fair profit for the manufacturer." Mr. Aldrich, as chairman of the committee in the senate that has the bill in charge, increases the rates on the whole thus making it a revision upwards instead of downwards as Mr. Taft pledged the country. He resents the furnishing of figures by our consuls in Germany showing the cost of production in that country and insinuates that it is "impertinent" for Germany to furnish us the same. Were the "big stick" in the White House there would be a "rough house" in the senate. Mr. Taft preserves a dignified calm, but many who know him well suspect a brooding of wrath that will bode ill to the "stand patters" if the right kind of a bill is not presented for his signature.

LABOR GRAFTERS CONVICTED

The cause of organized labor has won a great victory by the conviction of Martin B. (Skinny) Madden and his colleagues as labor grafters. The Chicago Federation had long ago repudiated Madden and his organization, the Junior Steam Fitters Union, was not a member of the Federation nor recognized by the general union of that trade. Madden was business agent and had a life tenure on the job. He made a practice of calling his men off buildings under one excuse and another and sending them back after he had been "seen" by the owner or contractor. The employers who paid the "graft" have not been indicted nor has any move been made to deal with them. Why not? The conviction is gratifying and it is hoped the remaining dozen indictments may produce a substantial set of penitentiary sentences. Two understudies of Madden met a like fate with him. One of them, Pouchet, sought justification in the pending election in his union, but was handsomely defeated.

THE BONDAGE OF PARTY

Are we at the breaking of the ways in party politics, or will the bondage of the party name and tradition defeat the real end for which a party exists, viz., the propagation and execution of a principle. In the senate the southern senators have voted with Aldrich in such numbers as to uphold him in all high tariff measures. At the same time the "progressive" wing of the dominant party advocates many things that the opposition party first brought forward. LaFollette is at one with Bryan on most things while McEnery, of Louisiana, is at one with the party that opposes him in most things. In the last election men who opposed every thing for which their respective parties have traditionally stood were loyal to the respective party organizations. The bane of the solid south in all national affairs is the fact that it is "solid." The bane of the negro politically wise is that he is always "solid" in his party fealty. Pennsylvania is politically rotten because she is so "solid." The need is for more independence and less regard for party with fealty to principle regardless of the name it wears.

FIVE CENTS AND THE SLUM TENEMENT

A man by the name of John Martin is trying to show New York the way out of the slum. The ordinary worker, with a family is kept in a narrow tenement by inability to pay an extra five cents a day car fare and by the time limit to which the slow moving street cars subject him. Mr. Martin shows how the new subway increased values of real estate along its outer limits to the extent of $80,000,000, while its cost was but about one-half that sum. Build more subways, he says, and assess the cost to the real estate benefitting thereby.

It is objected that the city is bonded up to the debt limit so could not furnish money for construction. But, argues Mr. Martin, the dock and transit bonds are not properly debts but in reality assets because they pay their own way. They are bonded city investments. So let them be subtracted from the city's borrowing power and use their equivalent to construct these subways, then let the real estate benefited be taxed for a fund to repay. The Survey adds that the cost will have to be paid by the tenement dwellers in increased rent whether the subways are built or not. It says rents in the tenements that would be relieved will increase on an average of $8.00 per year for each family and that 300,000 families might be benefited. This equals a 5 per cent return on $54,000,000.

THE AMERICAN MIGRATION TO CANADA

The American migration to the rich wheat fields of the Canadian Northwest continues unabated. Last year 160,000 crossed the border for permanent residence. Canada makes it easy and the returns on labor are enticing. She tries to make it difficult for indigent or pauper immigrants to get within her vast borders, but she is more than generous to the man who can bring promise of helping to develop her unmeasured resources. Last year there was a decrease of 117,000 from her coast immigrant ports, largely owing, no doubt, to the restrictions aimed at aliens who would come unendowed with a small amount of money or the promise of becoming settlers on her landed domains. The Americans took valuables to the amount of $60,000,000 across the border with them.

No nationality has a greater reluctance for leaving his native heath than has the American. How much of this is due to the fact that here he finds it easy to make a living and no larger promises allure him, as they do the poorer and the ambitious of other and older lands, we may not say, but of this we may be assured, that sentiment stands between few men and their daily bread. It is traditional with us to dread and hate the rule of kings, but we do not refine our scruples until we cannot become good Canucks and lay our patriotic vows at the feet of the pacific Edward. Canadians testify that the new comers make loyal citizens and the new comers bear witness that the Union Jack waves in the Dominion over a land of the free and one good enough for them.

A SAMPLE OF "PERSONAL LIBERTY" POLITICS

Chicago has a "Personal Liberty League." It bears the title of "United Societies." In the late judicial election it had a non-partizan ticket. It was made up of those judges who had been partial to the saloons in their decisions. At least that was the credit they got by the exact words of commendation used by the "United Societies."

They also labored industriously for "home rule" for Chicago before the late legislature. Their patriotic efforts are largely responsible for the failure to get a new charter for the city. Their "home rule" would exempt Chicago from all state legislation that touched the saloon. At the same time they worked might and main to defeat the local option law and would continue to help deprive the remainder of the state of that and all other such laws were their brand of "home rule" granted.

Here is a sample of "home rule" in the city they so largely rule. The six wards that support the greatest number of saloons register 48,757 voters. Even many of these are doubtless names taken from tombstones. In the six wards that support the fewest saloons there are 92,562 voters. Thus it requires twice as many votes to elect a representative of the best citizenship as it does to send a Hinky Dink or a Bath House John to the city council. In a certain half of the city wards are found two-thirds of the saloons. In that same half are found but a trifle over one-third of the voters of the city. In the other half of the wards are found but one-third of the saloons while but little less than two-thirds of the voters are there. These same "personal liberty" advocates would resist with a perfect frenzy any attempt to redistrict the city.

FOR THE WEAL AND WOE OF LABOR

The world of labor makes slow gains just now. The under-current of sympathy for its claims grows, however. Oftentimes defeats mean larger victories in the end. No overt act of either capital or labor aids their cause in times of universal enlightenment, like these. Most men are for justice, especially when they are on the great disinterested jury of public opinion. And public opinion rules in the end.

Labor contends for the same right of organization as is gained by capital. The organized capital of the anthracite industries refuses to recognize labor as an organization in their mines. The shipping interests of the great lakes are firmly organized, but they refuse to accord to those who do their manual toil recognition as an organization. In the end organized capital must both recognize organized labor and treat with it.

In Georgia a new problem has arisen that threatens serious complications. The strike is under a truce, but the main problem is not settled. Here white and colored labor clash. The question is, shall negroes be allowed to act as firemen on trains? If they are, under what restrictions? They are denied promotion to the throttle now. It is another phase of the color problem, but as in most cases, wrapped up in the labor problem.

In the Philippines the injunction has reached the limit of application by forbidding the strikers to even hold a public meeting. In Chicago the cab and carriage strikers are striking for a six day week, a twelve hour day, and $2.00 per day pay. They have kept the peace though there were sensational reports of small riots here and there at first, not one of which could be verified when run down. The great newspapers gave large space to those reports, but have made no retraction nor said aught in favor of a cause so transparently just.

NO RETREAT A VICTORY FOR ANTI-SALOON LEAGUERS

The net gain in anti-saloon legislation during the session of the legislatures now closing has not been so great as in the last, perhaps, but it is a victory to have lost no ground. County option won in Indiana, but was defeated in Illinois, Nebraska, Wisconsin and other states, where hopes for victory were not so promising to begin with. In Illinois a terrific fight was brought by the saloon forces, but failed, and it was a victory indeed to be able to hold what had been gained with such a handicap as the general character of the assembly gave the enemy. Nebraska enacted the daylight law which closes the saloons tight from dark to dawn. Arkansas has put the matter of state wide prohibition up to the voters and there is no doubt as to the outcome. In West Virginia such an attempt was defeated. In Missouri the effort to get a referendum on state-wide prohibition was defeated in the senate. It was stated in these columns that the House had passed the measure and that the Senate had done likewise, but had attached an amendment which the House would need to approve. Later reports reveal the fact that the amendment was a rider which was purposely attached to kill the bill. St. Louis business organizations fought the measure and it is reported that a bar was run in Room 45 of the state capitol building where the general public was deluded by the sign over the door, "For Ladies Only." The liquor was furnished without cost by St. Louis brewers.

The recent meeting of the United Brewers Association in Atlantic City brought out the fact that the decrease in beer product was more than 1,000,000 gallons for the last year. The delegates did not conceal their alarm over the march of the temperance movement. It was freely acknowledged that the saloon had been put to the bad by mixing in politics and that its only hope was restrictive measures, law enforcement, and divorce from the politician.

EDITORIAL

President David Starr Jordan of Stanford University, in a recent address to the women of Stanford and Palo Alto, said that the ballot for women is inevitable and must come as a natural outgrowth of the educational development of the civilized world. He also expressed the conviction that the change is most desirable. Commenting on this, the Palo Alto Times Says: "Most thinking men will agree with this view. It is certain that if the matter could be brought to a vote in this state, the ballot would be granted to women."

The Coöperative Council of City Missions of Chicago holds a monthly meeting to consider the problems of the neglected districts of Chicago and especially the duty of the different churches to them. It likewise supervises a number of most interesting and important missions, such as midnight missions in the Red Light District, and several among foreign populations. At the present time the Disciples have no work of this kind organized in Chicago. But there is very great need that something of the kind should be done and there is hope that in the near future it may be attempted.

The American Christian Missionary Society has put out an excellent program for use of Endeavor societies in observing Inland Empire Day, Sunday night, July 4. The exercise is entitled "The Mighty Inland Empire." It contains music, recitations, typical addresses and so forth. There is an especial appropriateness this year in using Independence Day for quickening the missionary conscience of our churches toward the needy fields of the great northwest. Endeavor Societies may procure as many copies of this exercise as they need without cost, by writing H. A. Denton, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, Ohio.

Rev. C. F. Aked of the Fifth Ave. Baptist Church, New York, recently made a remark deploring the fact that about the only distinctive thing which separated Baptists from other Christians is their practice of immersion only as baptism. He declared that he believed it would be wrong for the Baptists to allow that item of difference to continue to justify the separation and expressed his willingness to be pastor of a pedobaptist church provided he was not compelled to subscribe to a creed made in the darker centuries. The Baptist Commonwealth, of Philadelphia, thinks Dr. Aked will find sympathy among Northern Baptists to his indifference toward immersion as a prerequisite to membership. To which the Baptist World, of Louisville, adds, "We are sorry to believe it and trust it is not true. A Baptist is playing with fire when he acquiesces in 'something else' instead of what Jesus did and commanded, a fire that will consume his own house. Immersion is only one Baptist tenet, but it is a fundamental one."

The long deadlock in the Illinois Legislature, lasting over four months, was broken a fortnight ago by the election of William E. Lorimer of this city to the United States Senate. Senator Hopkins, of Aurora, was designated by the primaries for reëlection and the state administration of Governor Deneen loyally backed him for the honor. It was conceded by nearly everyone that Senator Hopkins was far from the fittest choice that could be made. Many urged Governor Deneen to accept the toga. This he refused to do out of a sense of loyalty to the party question and the public expression of opinion. At last, when the deadlock had continued for an almost interminable period, a bi-partizan combination was effected by Congressman Lorimer and his lieutenants, which gave him the senatorship by the assistance of Democratic votes. Mr. Lorimer's political history is one of bossism of the rankest sort. His presence in the United States Senate can only lend additional color to the feeling that that body of men, which should be in the highest degree representative of dignity, unimpeachable honor, and national prestige is coming to consist largely of millionaires and bosses. Senator Hopkins' reëlection would have been a misfortune to the state. But the choice of Lorimer is the exchange of one evil for a worse.

The Congregational Ministers' Association of Chicago took an action about a month ago on the creed question that is interesting and important. The candidate for admission into the association has always been required to sign the constitution of which the creed of 1883 was an integral part. Last fall, however, three men of unquestioned character having been admitted by vote of the association, signed the constitution, but added, "not the creed." Thereupon the registrar refused to report these men as members of the association and in effect expunged their names from the year book and disfellowshipped them from the Congregational ministry. Considerable discussion was provoked by the incident, the contention of those who insisted upon enforcing the rule strictly being that the creed was not a test but a testimony. Others insisted that a "testimony" ought not to be embodied in a constitution, signature to which was set down as a prerequisite to fellowship. A committee appointed to consider the matter reported adversely to making the creed a condition of membership in the Association. An amendment to the constitution was proposed, making this sentiment effective. This is the amendment which has just recently been adopted, thus restoring to full standing the three who were disfellowshipped and placing the Association on a basis of Christian character only.

The question of the reinstatement of a minister who has once proved morally unfaithful is often times a difficult one for the church to handle. Especially is this true when the minister asks reinstatement in the first flush of repentance following the discovery of his wrong doing. A truly penitent soul, sensitive to the interests of the church would prefer to undergo humiliation, and, bearing his cross, bring forth fruits worthy of repentance before laying upon his brethren the responsibility of saying yes or no to his request. The Christian law of forgiveness applies to the erring minister as to every other brother. But this law by no means demands the reordination of the penitent. It may be best both for the church and the minister that he work out his soul's recovery apart from the subtle temptations of congregational leadership. Afterward, when full proof of the genuineness of his reclamation has been given, the church may feel that it is honoring itself in placing in his hands the responsibilities of the ministry. Point to these observations is given by the reordination of Dr. Harvey G. Furbey, who was dismissed ten years ago from the Presbyterian ministry in New York. After his reform from the use of intoxicants, John S. Huyler and others placed him in charge of the Industrial Christian Alliance. Here hundreds of human derelicts heard the story of dissipation, poverty and rescue through Samuel Hadley at the McAuley Mission. Dr. Furbey is a graduate of Princeton, and has been a lawyer as well as pastor. The Presbytery reordained him with great enthusiasm. The Alliance is developing remarkably under his management and larger quarters are to be provided.

It is one of the satisfactions of citizenship in Chicago that occasionally one in public office surprises both his friends and his enemies by a record of efficiency unexpected where there are so many opportunities for self-enrichment and graft. Mr. J. W. E. Wayman was elected State's Attorney against the earnest protests of many of the better class of people, chiefly because of their apprehension over the activities emphasized in his behalf by the saloon men and the United Societies. But Mr. Wayman has thus far exhibited an efficiency and singleness of purpose that have astonished and delighted those who have watched his work. He has insisted that it was his purpose to clean out the Augean stables of the City Hall, to pursue and punish graft wherever he found it in the public service, and to administer the affairs of his responsible office without fear or favor. Such promises are easily made, but more difficult to keep. Yet Mr. Wayman has not only kept them, but has even gone farther than any prosecuting officer in the recent history of the city. His latest achievement is the trial and conviction of Martin B. Madden, popularly known as "Skinny" Madden, the notorious graft-taker, in connection with the activities of organized labor. It was the plan of Madden and his associates to induce the trade unions to call strikes on important building contracts and then to settle with the contractors for a consideration running all the way from $100 to $5,000. This savoury coterie has now been convicted upon one charge at least; and Mr. Wayman promises that a long list of other indictments shall be pushed to the limit. The only disappointment in connection with the case is the failure of a prison sentence. The jury satisfied themselves with a fine. But this beginning foreshadows a new regime in the story of trade unionism in this city and we congratulate Mr. Wayman on the splendid impression which these early activities of his have produced. Mr. Wayman is a graduate of Bethany College and an enthusiastic lover of the old place and its traditions. He is a brother of J. C. Wayman, one of the most active and efficient members of the Memorial Church.

Religious Significance of the Old Testament

Life Experience of Ancient Hebrews Makes Clear the Broadening Pathway to God

The church through all the ages and throughout the world has held the Old Testament writings in an esteem second only to that felt for the Christian Scriptures. Its influence upon the church has been almost as profound as that of the New Testament. "It exercised the toil of origin and Jerome. It fired the eloquence of Gregory and Chrysostom. It moulded the thoughts of Athanasius and Augustine. St. Thomas Aquinas meditated upon its messages, and St. Thomas a Kempis attempted to voice its spiritual lessons. St. Vincent de Paul gained from it his tenderness for the poor; John Howard his love for the suffering; William Wilberforce his compassion for the slave and Lord Shaftsbury his inspiration for human betterment."

Because it was the book of a nation, devoted to social righteousness rather than personal salvation, it has been the text-book for the conduct of men in communities, even more than the New Testament. The prophets were the defenders of the oppressed, the fearless threateners of tyrants, the tribunes of the people. The national institutes of Israel have been the basis for most of the codes of later days. Justinian adopted the Hebrew ideals in many of his enactments. Dante based on the Old Testament his work "De Monarchia." From the same source came Rutherford's "Rex Lex" and Milton's "Defence of the English People." And the Puritans of New England naively affirmed that they would take the Old Testament as the law of their new state until such time as they had leisure to frame a better one! No book has ever reached so wide a range of men with the influences of healing and helpfulness. And no book save the New Testament, has ever impressed so powerfully and beneficently the lives of those to whom it has come.

But where in all this swiftly moving pageant of Old Testament life shall be found the leisure and quiet for devotional utterances? Surely these warriors have no time for prayer, these clarion-voiced prophets no seclusion from the stress of public work, in which the holy life can take on the silent and deeper elements of growth! In spite of the slowly passing generations, the men of the Old Testament seem always militant and moving girded for battle, putting to flight armies, or dividing the spoil. There is a tense and breathless haste to get onward to wider spaces and loftier heights which appears to forbid all tarrying and to rebuke all rest.

Yet in the intervals of battle the voice of prayer and thanksgiving can be heard. These very soldiers, like the troops of Cromwell at Marston Moor, rise from their knees to fall upon the foe. In shrines past which the hurrying multitudes of captains and kings, tradesmen and shepherds, artisans and wayfarers, sages and counsellors throng, there is kept alive the flame of devotion and there rises the song of joy. Through windows here and there one looks in upon gentle household pieties where childhood is taught the fear of God as the beginning of wisdom and age has the vision of the King in his beauty and the land that stretches far away. In spite of the dominant impression of action, struggle and intensity which the Old Testament makes upon its readers, it is astonishing to discover what quiet spaces may be found within its borders, and in what an atmosphere of calm and worship its greatest heroes dwell.

In this fact is to be seen the first outbursting of the devotional spirit into the glorious flowers of piety and prayer. You may judge of a people by the characters it exalts; you may estimate a book by the men it enthrones. The Hebrew Scriptures find their heroes in the men of faith and vision, to whom God had in some true sense become a reality. There is a passing admiration expressed for the Baraks, the Samsons, the Jephthahs and the Sauls. But the men who are given the center of the stage are the men in whom dwell the spirit of the Highest.

There is Abraham, the wanderer from the far east, who crossed the great river that he might follow the guidance of the God he had learned to revere. His whole life, as portrayed in these records, is one long act of devotion. We are not now concerned with the character of these records. The problem of their historicity plays no part in the inquiry now instituted. Whether or not the incidents and features of Abraham's career as narrated in our sources can be vindicated as facts, it is beyond question true that such a character as is there set forth attracted the attention and held the regard of the nation to the latest days. The man is a leader in virtue of his being led of God. There he moves, in the dim twilight of antiquity, a devout and venerable figure, marking the sites of his camps with altars to the Highest; walking forth at night under the Syrian skies to gaze at the unnumbered stars, less mindful that they are the tokens of his countless posterity than that they are set in their sockets by the hand of the Eternal; looking down from the heights of Hebron upon the doomed Sodom with a spirit so stirred with generous good will that he pushes entreaty to the borders of a city in his plea for the threatened town; and at last walking up the long ascent to Moriah with that child of his old age, in whom he lived again, and who tortured his breaking heart with his unconscious question, "Father, where is the lamb for the offering?" In these records of the patriarch who walked by faith and not by sight, who staggered not at the promises of God, who sought for a city which hath foundations, the generations of saints and martyrs found inspiration for holy living and dying. It was the life of one who endured as seeing Him who is invisible.

Or study again the character of David. Biblical scholarship has supplied the materials for a competent appreciation of this remarkable man. We need not idealize him as did an earlier generation, at the expense of the very values he illustrates. The facts of his life are simple, and not infrequently discreditable. He led successively the life of an ambitious youth, a border bandit and an oriental despot. He was a polygamist, he did not hesitate to lie when falsehood served his purpose, he exacted blackmail from the farmers of Judah in the days of his outlaw life, he was the victim of superstition which did not hesitate to hang up seven of the sons of Saul to stop a plague, and his cruelty in war could hardly have been exceeded by Assyrian delight in human torture. Add to all this his base murder of one of his loyal captains that he might possess his wife, and the indictment seems complete. He does not satisfy the lowest standards of today. And yet judged in the light of his time, he stands nearer to God than many men of greater opportunities. To be quite impartial, let us waive all the testimony which the Psalms have been made to yield to his character. This is best for two reasons, first, because the extent of his relation to the Psalter is, to say the least, an open question, and secondly, because as has been remarked, "So long as we conceive a man of this character, so cruel and sensual, as at the best he is seen to be, to be the author of the greatest hymns of the faith, it is impossible to regard him as self-consistent, or to allow his personality any save a sentimental influence over our lives."

But without the aid of any such special pleading, consider for a moment the other side of the shield. His lament over the deaths of Saul and Jonathan is a literary monument of imperishable beauty and reveals a nature superbly loyal to the King who had exhausted the means of compassing his death, and a friendship passing the love of women for the campanion of his youth. His nature was incapable of the exalted conceptions of God with which tradition has credited him, but he did much to make such conceptions possible to a later age. His care for his parents, his generous provision for his soldiers who remained in camp, his unchanging affection for the son he knew to be a traitor, and his heart-broken confession of sin, which is one of the earliest in which horror at the thought of sin as an offense against God takes precedence even of the fear of penalty—all these were manifestations of virtues to which few men even made approach in that age. Professor Vernon aptly says, "The depth of his own loyalty led him to religious conceptions in advance of those of his own time. He had the power of discrimination in ritualistic values, so much more important in his day than in ours. He did not hesitate to eat holy bread to save his life, or to defy the wrath of God for the marvelous mother love of Rizpah; but he risked death rather than slay the Lord's anointed, though a King was something quite new to Israel, and without any traditional sanctity." He had an inner standard by which he instinctively tested the elements of religion in his time. Perhaps his highest moment was when he sent back the ark to Jerusalem, then in possession of his son, Absalom, with words which seem to have pushed the human race leagues along in its search for God: "Carry back the ark of God into the city; if I find favor in the eyes of the Lord, he will show me again both it and his habitation; but if he say, I have no delight in thee, behold here am I, let him do as seemeth good unto him." This was the insight of the steadfast heart. The very man who at the beginning of his career besought Saul to permit him to stay in Judah, that he might not be cut off from the only soil on which God could be worshipped, learned through the profound qualities of his own spirit and his experiences with the Highest that God is not confined to any dwelling place, however sacred it be. It was a long and difficult discipline which brought the people of God to understand at last that

> "The God of life and light
> Dwells not alone in temples made with hands,
> But that the path to him, from every soul,
> In every farthest corner of the world
> Is as direct as sunlight rays to earth."

It was not speculation, but the experience with God of this man of large heart and tumultuous life which gave rise to these first words which shine with the "peace which passeth understanding." When the modern man, the heir of the centuries, bows before this hero of barbaric times, because of his steadfast faith in God "he has a glimpse of eternal values."

Our Most Popular Amusement

The moving picture has the boards as the most popular and universal of public amusements. Ten millions see base ball each season, but four millions see moving pictures every day. Already a thousand vaudeville houses have removed their curtains and put up the white sheet of the motion picture man. Every day nearly two hundred miles of films run through the white lights at the rate of fourteen pictures to the second. The great cities are gaudy with their gilded fronts, the streets of the smaller cities are full of the hoarse cry of their phonographs, and the country towns are welcoming them with great patronage. All told there are seven thousand theaters devoted to their exploitation and they are growing in number more rapidly than ever. Chicago has more than two hundred now and, it is estimated, will have five hundred within a year. More than $50,000,000 is invested in the industry and the nine greatest firms of film makers have organized the inevitable trust.

This amusement goes to the door of the people. It saves the poor man car fare and makes it possible for multitudes who could not go to the theater, to have an hour's enjoyment. If it is kept pure who shall condemn it? Amusement is lawful. Moreover in the crowded sections of great cities it is absolutely necessary that it be provided. The "trust" promises to make no impure or suggestive scenes. It will taboo train robberies and revelling. It will furnish fun, drama, and scenery. So far, so good. With adequate police supervision it may be made a boon to multitudes.

The motion picture may become an educator also. Temperance lecturers and missionaries are already using it with profit. Scientists are finding a way to make it teach also. The People's Institute of New York City will use it to teach nature study. Travel talks are making it their chief lieutenant. Now it is being combined with the phonograph to reproduce operas. The day of wonders is but begun.

Just Like God

A mother was talking to her little girl of the love of God to us. She repeated the beautiful verse, "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son that whosoever believeth in Him shall not perish, but have everlasting life," and said, "Isn't it wonderful dear, that God should love us so much as that?" To her surprise the child replied, "No, mamma, I don't think it wonderful." The mother said, "Why daughter, don't you know that God's love is wonderful?" "I think it would be wonderful if it were any one else," said the child, "but it's just like God."—The Delineator.

It is no such heinous matter to fall affiicted as, being down, to lie dejected. It is no danger for a soldier to receive a wound in battle, but, after the wound received, through despair of recovery to refuse a remedy; for we often see wounded champions wear the palm at last and, after fight, crowned with victory.—St. Chrysostom.

An Apostle of the Congo

Dr. Royal J. Dye—Missionary Statesman—Ends a Year's Furlough Spent in Awakening a Nation-wide Interest in the Evangelization of the Dark Continent.

By Alva W. Taylor

On the 26th of June Dr. Royal J. Dye will sail again for the Congo. During the past year he has gone up and down the land like a flaming torch. Thousands have heard his story of the gospel's power in Congo-land and a missionary conscience has been burned into their very hearts by it. He goes back to Bolengi alone. White children cannot live in that tropical clime and his faithful and heroic wife has not the health to return. She counts hers as the greater sacrifice. The world honors the heroism of Livingstone for his great loneliness while he was threading the forests of the Dark Continent, and such honor no less belongs to men like Dye and Eldred, who have so heard the cry from the African Macedon that they can do no other. They count it not a sacrifice to thus serve their Lord. and with Paul of old thus "fulfill within themselves the joy which was in Christ Jesus."

If the petitions of a multitude avail, the Bolengi workers will be given a strength that will multiply into miracles the marvels that have already rewarded their labors. Dr. Dye's campaign at home has been only equaled by those of men like Moffat and Paton and Hudson Taylor. When he came there was but one station provided for and itineration must be made in native canoes hollowed out of logs. More than once they have been in danger of drowning in these precarious craft and their native oarsmen have even lost their lives. Yet in such vessels they have traveled for days in the broiling equatorial sun and carried the message to peoples who have thus heard it for the first time, and with them have spied out the land to find it a veritable land of promise for the Christian's evangel.

The River Steamer "Oregon."

Dr. Dye will take back the promise of a river steamer. With it fifteen hundred miles of navigable waters will be made accessible. Already the building of it is guaranteed. It will be the tribute of the generous though not large churches of Oregon and will bear the name of their beloved state. With it our heralds of the cross will be able to expedite their evangelistic journeys, carry supplies to the far stations, open new fields, and save the health of the workers for the arduous task that awaits them.

The new work at Longa is established. The Doctor arranged at Brussels on the return trip for its land grants and is rejoiced over the prospect that it will be another Bolengi. It will be the new base for evangelistic journeys by the native bands and will lay a great, rich field at the feet of the Master. Ten thousand dollars was given for this station by Bro. Lacelle after he had heard accounts of the opportunities it offered. Now California is endeavoring to provide for two new stations that will open yet greater fields, already whitened unto the harvest. One of these will be far Bonyeki, two hundred and fifty miles up the Great Bosira, in the heart of a very populous region. Mr. Eldred and Dr. Widdowson visited it some months ago, rowed by native oarsmen for six days beneath the tropical sun. The people pleaded for teachers, but the white men could not stay. They called for volunteers and two of the hardy oarsmen gladly tarried behind to instruct the people in all they knew. Now seven hundred have thrown away their feticnes and plead for the white teacher to come and show them the way more perfectly. The other station proposed is down the Momboyo, a tributary of the Bosira and forming the point of triangle with the Bosira from Bolengi on the Congo to Bonyeki, as a base line. It means the driving of the missionary wedge into another vast pagan quarry.

And yet tnere are other regions ready and waiting. The native evangelists have threaded far and wide and from everywhere comes the cry, "come over and help us." Five millions are offered as the prize of the missionary quest in this great uncharted country. The Nkundu people are one in tongue and custom. What wins at Bolengi and Longa and Bonyeki will win everywhere among them. They are strong, quick to learn, and supple in speech and action. If men dare inhospitable Alaska for gold and the ice and snow of the polar circle for glory and armies go to the tropics for material conquest, why should not many be bold for the Prince of Peace and take the Congo for Christ and civilization?

Marvelous Generosity of Bolengi Church.

The marvel of the Bolengi church is its generosity. They tithe before they begin voluntary giving. Some give the first tenth of their labor, lest they fail to get all the other nine, and the Lord be cheated. Then they give one-tenth of their members, the brightest and strongest of their sons. From their six hundred souls they send sixty to repeat the story the missionary has taught them. At the end of three months these return with the fruits of their labors. They bring their converts from tens and scores of miles that the white teacher may complete the instruction and baptize them if found worthy. Then they tarry for another period of learning and are away to the forests and jungles again. They go to hostile clans and wade unknown swamps and take their lives in their hands that they may tell the story that has meant so much to them. They are jibed and buffeted often, they have been beaten, they are tempted with the seductive temptations of the old pagan life, but they are faithful and return to tell the story of it all with a wonderful reserve and to touch the altar fires in other hearts with a like zeal to herald the glad tidings. But the field develops and the need increases and the opportunities multiply and there must be more thorough training for these native Pauls and Barnabases. Thus the call for a college for Biblical and industrial instruction. Dr. Dye will take its fair assurance back with him. Already two-thirds of the necessary twenty-five thousand dollars is promised, and once it is builded the native students will render it largely self-supporting through its industrial work.

Dr. Dye's Accomplishment on the Home Field.

Yet the best of this year's home campaign remains to be told. The spirit Dye has aroused is like unto that of his beloved Bolengi. The churches are offering men as well as money. The enterprises enumerated above have enriched our generosity with the promise of a total of over seventy thousand dollars, much of it already given, and the good Doctor must be thanked for no small part in the increase of missionary giving all along the line this year. Churches are undertaking to support their own missionaries and multitudes are increasing their offerings because of the vision they have seen as he told the story of apostolic success on the Congo. Already six have gone to the field, inspired to the task by his account of the Bolengi band's stewardship, and two more will return with him this month. Twice as many more would go if the means were at hand to send them. Bro. Waters of California adds to his previous gift of five thousand dollars an offer of two thousand to pay the way of a young physician if he will go immediately. He offers such a career to some young M. D. as no other could offer him. He will have a clinic equal to that of a great surgeon and a satisfaction few great surgeons know. Unsurpassed by Livingstone's famous meeting at Oxford was the dramatic sequence of the Oregon addresses of Dr. and Mrs. Dye last year when, during the state convention, thirty volunteered to prepare for the task of evangelizing the Congo.

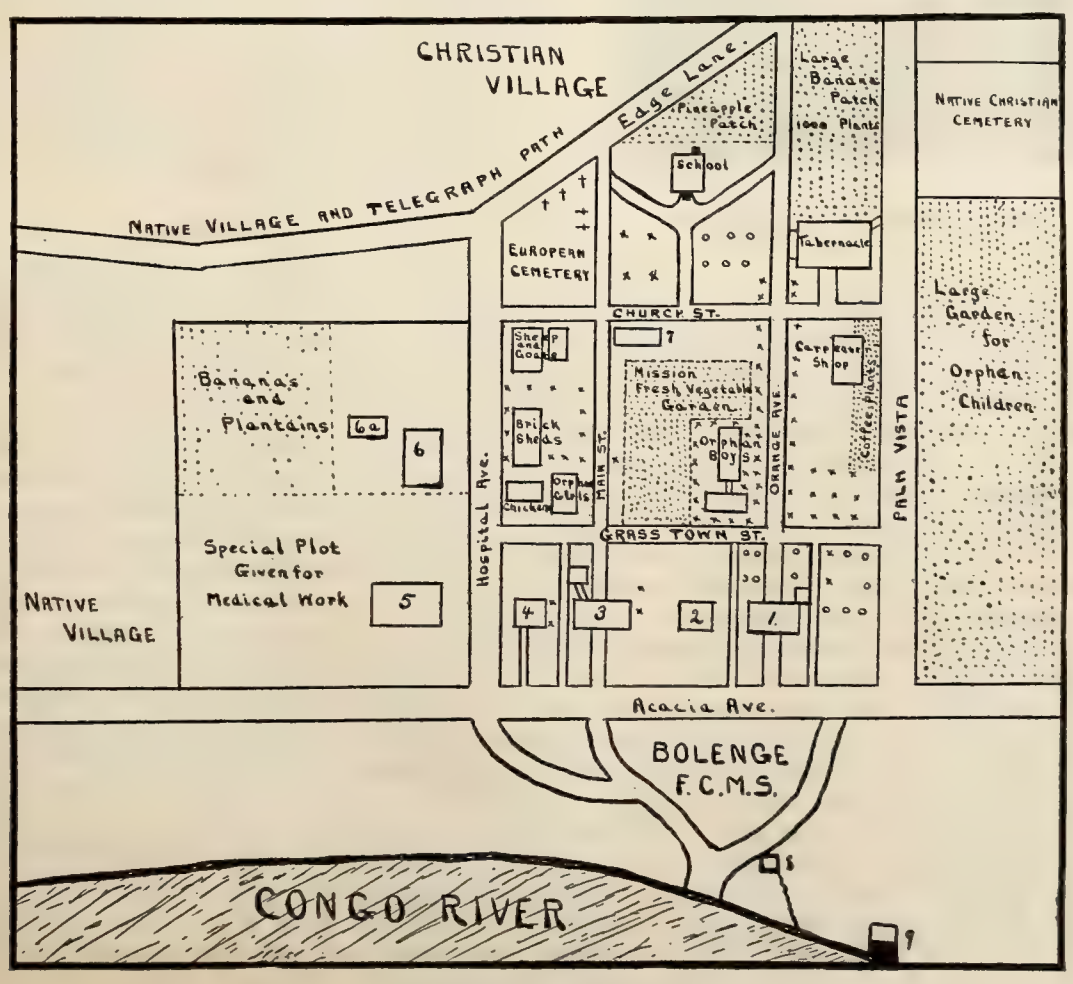
To civilize a nation is better than to conquer the world. Stanley's call from Uganda was answered by the Church Missionary Society. It cost men and it cost thousands of pounds of money, but English church-men gave both, and after but three decades, Uganda is redeemed from an atrocious savagery and tens of thousands read and write and are faithful to the church that redeemed them. Even greater things shall the Bolengi workers do, for they have a vaster population to labor among and they have a people less bound by the lust of conquest and the pagan pride of tribal power. To this and more do their efforts thus far testify.



The Long Wait for the Present Harvest.

It has been but a decade since we took over the Bolengi station from a sister society. It had cost them dearly in men and treasure and the harvest time had not come. For five years there was nothing to cheer our workers but that faith which cheered Judson when he answered the query, "What of the night?" with the words "Bright as the promises of God." Six years ago a little handful of converts were organized into a church. Today they number six hundred and the latest word that comes says that every grown person in the village of Bolengi is a Christian excepting the old chief only. He sits alone in his pagan pride in the midst of a people who honor him with the traditional authority, but honor their Lord with their lives. Even he is not the same man. He is in a Christian community and accepts the Christian ways. The leaven of righteousness is at work in his old heathen heart. Other chiefs have become Christian and led many of their people into the Way and the great chief of chiefs in that section is a member of the Bolengi church.

Tabernacle in Course of Erection

The Bolengi tabernacle has been twice enlarged and on each Lord's Day more than a thousand gather to hear the message proclaimed. They come from thirty miles around, beginning their journey on the afternoon before. As many gather for the Bible school each Sunday, and the Endeavor Society is the largest in the world. After morning service communion is conducted by the native elders with a becoming decorum, then the entire congregation scatters into the nearby villages to tell others what they have heard. At four in the afternoon they return, bringing those who will come with them. During the day other groups are gathered by the native teachers in villages more remote and thus a total of two thousand are instructed on each first day of the week. Twice every day there is an evangelistic service attended by from six to seven hundred people who come from villages within a radius of seven miles and oftentimes by strangers who have come much farther after hearing of the wonders wrought at Bolengi. From far down the Momboyo came two chiefs one day to hear of this that had reached their ears like an impossible story, and their coming will open the hearts of the people for the far Momboyo station. In the evenings, at the time the drums formerly tatooed the call for a heathenish carousal, the people gather in groups or form processions, singing the songs that tell of their redemption. Where once the peaceful night was broken by the scream of a beaten wife or slave or the riot of a barbarous melee is now heard the evensong. The naked are clothed, the slave is freed, woman is redeemed from the curse of polygamy and little children are no more sold into lives of shame. Work is now honorable where it was once a man's degradation and the symbol of woman's subjection. The industries of civilization are taught the people and they are clothed and in their right minds.

Ten Native Evangelists and Their Wives

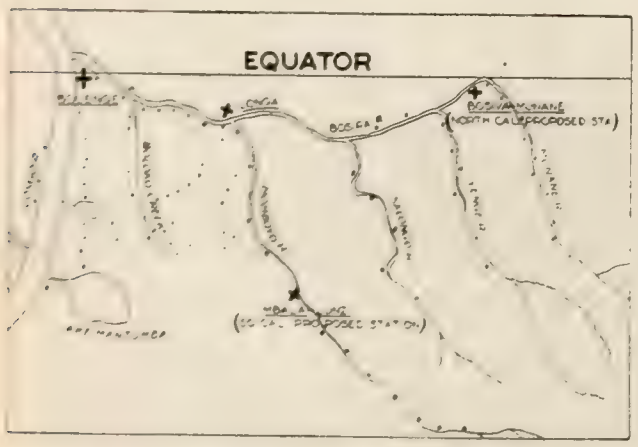
A Statesman for a Statesman's Task.

Dr. Dye is not only a successful missionary, but he has well won the distinction of a missionary statesman by the vision he has of the field and the plans he presents to the church for its conquest. By the strategic planting of far out bases of operations like that at Bonyeki, two hundred and fifty miles up the Great Bosira, and that down the Momboyo more than a hundred miles from the Bosira base line, the rim of each field may be made to touch those of the others and the whole vast region be worked by the native evangelists. What five years in this territory will bring challenges the optimism of a bold prophet to predict. A whole nation is to be taken by such strategic planting of bases of operation and the linking of them together with a steamer to communicate between them and a college at the major base to supply the trained workers. Here is before us the task of winning an empire for Christ and civilization in this our generation. Longa begins with fifty members, faithfully furnishing their tithe of evangelists and already there are twenty-five out-stations planted within the hundred miles radius of Bolengi which the native band of evangelists are cultivating. Yet beyond are other stretches of territory. With others Dr. Dye has visited the dwarf Batswa and to the north of the Congo stretches the great Mobangi clear up into the Sudan, enriching a country of teeming millions. Already the Bolengi church has disciples along its shores and it beckons us to enter the vastest unevangelized field in the world.

Joseph the Crippled Evangelist who led the first 20 Converts to Christ.

Professor Starr's Testimony.

No more telling testimony to the worth of the work at Bolengi has been given than that of Prof. Frederick A. Starr, the noted anthropologist of the University of Chicago. Prof. Starr visited there while on his trip for scientific study in the Congo country. On the evening of June 1 the men of the Chicago churches gave Dr. Dye a farewell luncheon and with it $1,000 to pay the expense of sending Bro. Herbert Smith of Bethany and his bride, out to Africa with him on the 26th inst. Prof. Starr accepted an invitation to be present and speak. He is a very frank man and prefaced his remarks by repeating that he was not an enthusiast on the topic of missions. Owing to peculiar views he holds in regard to the rights and virtues of primitive peoples, he has never been a missionary advocate. At this luncheon, however, he made a most eloquent talk, in which he praised the work at Bolengi with enthusiasm and challenged the Christians at home to be as generous as those Christians out there who gave one-tenth of their all to the cause. He spoke in the highest terms of the character of the Bolengi Christians and the courage of the native evangelists. He referred to the daring they displayed in going among savage and cannibal tribes and into the villages of traditional enemies to teach the people their new found truths. He said the Nkundu were of a very high order among barbarous peoples and would justify all expectations. He was generous in his praise of the missionaries and of Dr. Dye in particular, saying he was the only man he found who retained his native vigor in the tropics. He thought the missionaries ought to have the best of the land and be well cared for in order that they might retain the vitality and health their arduous labors demanded. He made a subscription to the fund that was raised at the meeting and thus added his works to his words.



Responsibility Laid Upon Native Church.

Finally the question may be asked "What is the explanation of the extraordinary success of the Bolengi mission?" Dr. Dye says it is because of the responsibility laid on the native church. In Korea alone perhaps can there be found a mission field so productive of results today as is this one. There too the native Christians built their own chapels and supported their own evangelists. Perhaps this is not possible in many mission fields. At Bolengi a recent storm ruined the tabernacle. The native Christians have already rebuilt and enlarged it until an audience of 1,200 can now be accommodated. At far Bonyeki, from whence came the Macedonian cry of the 700, the untaught natives have erected a large tabernacle in anticipation of the coming of the white teachers. Other villages have done the like thing.

The best praise of a worker is his work. We indulge in no fulsome praise of this man, though his works would make it easy. He has been ten years on the Congo and by his energy, faith, and efficiency has made himself one of the first of living missionaries. But he loves to praise his fellow workers and none of them have lacked the full meed of credit at his hands. Tribute has been paid him in a way more eloquent than words when the churches so generously answered his "Call of the Congo" with the men and means for enlargement.

W. Remfrey Hunt.

It pays sometimes to stop the machinery in the mighty engine rooms. It is good to "come apart and rest awhile." These are our convictions after a real soul-inspiring furlough, with all its blessed spiritual uplift and wider outlook through our conversations, pulpit service, deputation work, as well as lovely little bits of rest on the English coast, the lakesides, the forests and even the din and confusion of city life in America. The native churches—the children of our service—gave us a royal reception. The preachers had grown a cubit. They had been tested, proved and blessed in the revivals. In the guest room, in the classes, at the Lord's table, it was evident that the work of divine grace had been doing its work in their hearts. It was proof of faith that whether with us, or without us, the work of God in China goes on, and accomplishes the thing whereunto it has been destined in the power of the Spirit.

One of the revivals was aided in a very simple and beautiful manner at one of our visits to the monthly class of our evangelists in training. They had been prepared for it by the wave-currents of blessing that had been reaching them from Manchuria. There was a new discovery of prayer-energies. They were as the church in Jerusalem "of one accord and of one mind," and they were praying in the spirit. They had been asking with faith for the things nearest the heart and mind of the Saviour.

We related the story of the gouging up of a couple of planks in the Church building at Shanghai. They were clean, polished, and bright on the surface, but underneath they were slimy, smelly, covered with snails, and filthy. They were in the church building, were an integral part of it (as members of the building), yet they were in their real inner parts, the unseen parts, filthy, diseased, and unpresentable. The lesson was applied with mighty and convincing power by the Holy Spirit, and the heart-breaking, soul unveiling, and tear-filled confessions preceded what we look and pray for as the droppings of showers of blessing which shall woo and win many souls to the love and service of the blessed Redeemer.

Views of Life

By George A. Campbell

Golden Rules of Worldly Wisdom

Bagshot's golden rules of worldly wisdom as given by J. A. Spender, are four in number, and are as follows:

"Be rich among the poor rather than poor among the rich."

"Take all but the most important things at their surface value."

"Seek the prizes of your own calling and be resolutely hors concours to all others."

"Never display a wound except to a physician."

Rich Among the Poor.

Much of life has to do with "worldly wisdom." Even superlatively religious people are forced in these days of strenuous competition to give it much attention. No man can elbow his fellows long without forming some conclusions as to the wise course in worldly things.

Bagshot's first golden rule has come down to us in many forms. It has the stamp of the ages upon it. It is difficult, now, for the poor to gain a place among the rich. If he succeeded he surely would be constantly reminded, to his own great discomforture of his poverty. The rich might not wish to do so, but the very habit and temper of life that riches create, except in rare cases, would make uneasy the poor man. Even education makes of its devotees aristocrats, whose company the unlettered man is not likely to enjoy—unless they are so well educated as to have formed the habit and spirit of estimating aright every man.

Surface Values.

Concerning the second golden rule Bagshot is reported by his editor to have written this note on "Surface values":

"B. asked you to dinner the other night and you enjoyed yourself. You think he called you a bore after you had gone? Very likely he did, but you enjoyed ourself. What more do you want? It was amiable of B. to have been so agreeable to you, if he thinks you a bore."

Surely the acceptance of this golden rule would give some an infinite amount of pain and any number of alienations of friendships.

Bagshot by his comments, however, ought to have recognized that often the intention is good when the word or the deed is suspicious. At such times the golden rule of worldly wisdom would be something like this:

Look below the surface to the spirit.

Just the other day after I had delivered an address a lady said to me: "I enjoyed your address, especially the poetry." "Especially the poetry" was spoken with unction. The address was forty minutes long; while all the poetry quoted took but one minute, at most two. The poetry was the only part of the address that was not my composition. Doubtless the lady was right—the poetry was the good part; but I am going to keep myself happy by thinking that she really meant to compliment me. So I would revise Bagshot to read after this manner:

When you suspect the intention take the surface value; and when you dislike the word or deed, look beyond to the intention. Interpret all language so as not to give you sleepless nights.

The Prizes of One's Own Calling.

The third golden rule of world-wisdom will be considered by most as splendid advice. A. McLean says it is the rare man that can do more than one thing well. He exhorts the preachers to be resolutely "hors concours" to all other callings. Upon this Bagshot comments, "choose your own world and live in it. Don't, if you are a public servant, expect the applause and notoriety of a public man; don't if you are a professional man, expect the prizes of what is called society; don't, if you are an artist, expect to shine as an author. There can be no greater folly than to play another man's game on his terms—amateur against professional. In life, the champions do not concede points to their inferiors. We all start from scratch in each race."

Generally speaking our friend Bagshot is right. Life is short to succeed even in one thing. Men, too, are numerous. One who gains distinction among so many competitors must usually work in one field all his days. There are, however, almost enough exceptions to shatter the rule. For instance many who have gained distinction in literature have worked in it as a pastime. There are some who are saying that ministers would be stronger if they did not teach or write. I often hear it regretted that H. L. Willett does not give his whole time to the pulpit. On the other hand it might be well for some pope to sentence countless of ministers to the added task of writing or planning. The danger from lassitude is quite equal to that of scattering.

Concerning the Display of Our Wounds

"Never display a wound, except to a physician," is the fourth word of worldly wisdom. "Thus," the author adds, "you will avoid vain striving for the trivial or the impossible, and if you suffer hurt, be spared the mortification of thinking that others are witnesses of your discomforture. Let your physician be a trusty friend, who will not break your confidence. Let him see you without your clothes on, but never disrobe to an acquaintance."

Perhaps this is wise counsel. If taken with moderation, I shall not object. We can well encourage many to wear their hearts less conspicuously. I would cool down the gushy man, but at the same time warm up the cold one. I would not have a soul made of steel. At times I long to hear a sigh from the man who never reveals a hurt. Some are too coldly poised. The man who, at least once in a while, gets mad is preferable to him whose brain is always steely poised. The minister who said in his resignation last Sunday that he felt discouraged because the people would not come to church, revealed a hurt that I was glad to have frankly stated. By his silence as to his hurt he could have said, "I am most happy in the situation." It is not safe to display your wound only to your physician; for your physician will likely be your wife. She will not be able to bear all. It will relieve her and you to shout once in awhile your grief from the house tops.

Bagshot says some other good things.

Here is a rich passage. A man with even the slightest humor can happily apply it:

"Mr. Gladstone dropped an admirable phrase last night. 'The right Hon. gentleman with that incontrollable coscience of his' . . . surely the mot joste and of the widest application.

"How one hates it. that conscience out of control, ranging at large over the trivial, breaking hubsflies on wheels, pouncing on molehills, and discovering them to be mountains of right and wrong. An incontrollable conscience fails almost invariably to discover a real case of right and wrong. The prig is he who renders unto God the things that are Caesar's."

Legalism a Factor in Disciples' Success

The legalistic element which has been a native strain in the Campbellian movement exhibits another intimate connection with the social consciousness of the age, and has contributed largely to the success of the movement.

The legalism of the Campbells was peculiar, however, in that it was a constitutional legalism; and in just that respect it was typically American. The circle of ideas which formed the atmosphere of Revolutionary political thought in America, centered in the writing and adoption of a Constitution for the United Colonies. Says a writer on the "Constitutional History of the United States": "Americans were the first people to reduce their civil organization to a written form; the first to express the fundamentals of government in a written constitution amendable as the public judgment and the public conscience might demand." The ideas of the "Social Contract" filled the political thought of the eighteenth century. The ideal relation between rulers and ruled, and between citizens, was a contractual, a constitutional, a covenant relation; not personal, not patriarchal, not even fraternal, but legal, grounded in an agreement to which rulers and subjects consented.

It was in that period when the American mind was occupied with first of all the writing, then the ratification, and finally the working of a constitution that the Campbells came to America. They had come out of a religious atmosphere in the Old World filled with "covenant ideas," into a political atmosphere in the New World filled with constitutional ideas drawn from the same sources as the covenant ideas. How singularly political phrases mingle with religious in the following sentence from the Declaration and Address: "The New Testament is as perfect a constitution for the worship, discipline, and government of the New Testament church, and as perfect a rule for the particular duties of its members, as the Old Testament was for the worship, discipline, and government of the Old Testament church, and the particular duties of its members."

Here is the earliest expression in the writings of the Campbells of the application they made of the "Covenant Idea" to the relative authority of the Old and New Testaments. It is both the language and thought of American Revolutionary philosophy. Whether Thomas Campbell had in mind, when he wrote that sentence, the prevailing political philosophy, it is difficult to say; but it is not hard to see that he brought himself into rapport with current social feeling in using the political analogy of a constitution; and that in no other age or place could he have used the figure with such certainty of being understood, or of placating his audience. It is safe to say that he was affected by surrounding conditions, both in his thought and language.

The Kingdom of God Legalistically Interpreted.

This is even more strikingly true of Alexander Campbell. He construed Christianity as a whole in terms of an institution, and of a political institution at that. He might have construed it in terms of the domestic institution, the family; or of an educational institution, the college; but he chose the state, rather than either the family or the school, for his analogy. In his treatment of the Kingdom of God in the "Christian System" he carries out his exposition in every particular, in political terms. He shows that he is aware of current political thought when he says, in justification of Jesus' use of the term kingdom: "And why, an American would say, is it not called the Republic of Heaven, and the chief called the President of a Celestial Republic?"

In opening his exposition of the Kingdom of Heaven after discussing the nature and advantages of republics, in which he does not have great faith, he says: "Monarchy is the only form of government, however, which nature recognizes. It was the first and will be the last. The most approved theory of human nature and of human government now current wherever the English language is spoken, either in the Old World or in the New, is that a monarchy would be always the best government, because the cheapest, the most efficient, and the most dignified; provided only, that the crown was placed on the wisest head, and the scepter wielded by the purest hands. Could we always secure this, we would all be monarchists: because we cannot, we are all republicans." In this he is reasoning back from the conception of the Kingdom of God in the New Testament, to the ideal political government, which, he believes, should be copied after it.

Elements of the Kingdom.

"What, then," he asks, "are the essential elements of a Kingdom as existing among men? They are five, viz.: King, Constitution, Subjects, Laws, and Territory. Such are the essential parts of every political kingdom, perfect in its kind, now existing on earth." Such also, he says, are the essential elements of the kingdom of heaven. The constitution of the kingdom, however, is an eternal agreement made between God and Christ. This agreement was entered into "before the world was," but was put into effect when "the word became flesh and dwelt among us."

This constitution binds both king and subjects, both God and man. He further says: "We must regard all the elements of the kingdom as constitutional elements; the king as a constitutional king; the subjects, laws, and territory, including the ultimate inheritance, as constitutional subjects, laws, territory, inheritance." Man's relation to God, the subject's relation to the ruler, is, therefore, not a personal or natural relation, but a constitutional, a legal relation. He says: "The Lord Jesus Christ is the constitutional monarch of the Kingdom of God." He realizes the difficulty of making monarchical political ideas fit American republican ideas; but he patches up a reconciliation by declaring that the monarchical is the ideally perfect form of government, as in the kingdom of heaven, for an ideally perfect world. But since we are not in a perfect world, the next best thing, American republicanism, must be accepted.

That this constitutional, legal conception was not mere analogy or illustration with Campbell is evident from his own practice and that of his followers. He says: "Into every kingdom, human or divine, there is a legal door of admission. That is, in the statute-book of heaven, called a birth." That birth was consummated by a baptism in water. Here the legal analogy passes into the legal practice of the churches founded by the Campbells. He says: "Every immersed believer, of good behavior, is by the constitution a free and a full citizen of the Kingdom of Heaven."

A Legalistic Evangelism.

This constitutional or legal conception of the Campbells was fused with the evangelism of Scott and Stone, and has been an influential factor in the evangelistic success and organic consolidation of the Disciples. In their evangelism it has been effective as a doctrine of assurance. In answering the question, What must I do to be saved? the evangelist has derived a note of certainty from his legalism which has brought peace and comfort to many a troubled and perplexed soul. He could assure the inquiring sinner that God had entered into a written agreement with man, through Jesus Christ, to pardon his sins on certain definite conditions, clearly expressed in the Scriptures. Those conditions were faith, repentance, confession, and baptism. The process was consummated in an outward act which was definite and unmistakable. This was a "law of pardon" which bound both God and man; which bound man to its obedience to the letter, and when obeyed, bound God to its fulfillment in an act of pardon.

Doctrine of Assurance.

It had immense advantage in the popular consciousness over the uncertain, miraculous, and mysterious operation of the Spirit in regeneration according to the prevailing doctrine. It was refreshing, startling, and almost incredible doctrine to audiences accustomed to the fatalism of Calvinistic preaching. It transferred the evidences of pardon from ecstatic feeling to obedient action and brought assurance out of doubt and despair. The Christian mind was waiting for deliverance from the doctrine of total depravity and moral inability. It turned eagerly to a covenant doctrine which made man an active agent in his own salvation and grounded assurance in his own willingness to keep his part of a covenant. Salvation was made a mutual transaction between God and man, with the divine part already performed as far as it could be, awaiting for its completion the performance of the human part, in an "obedience of the gospel."

This legalistic evangel had all the strength of positive and immediate assurance, and when consummated in an act of baptism, it yielded all the joy and comfort, with none of the uncertainty, of the older way. To the question, "What must I do to be saved?" the answer came quick and clear, "Repent, and be baptized every one of you in the name of Jesus Christ for the remission of your sins; and ye shall receive the gift of the Holy Spirit."

This was an answer that answered fully and completely, and yet in brief, the anxious inquiry of every penitent sinner. It was nothing short of a marvelous discovery, both to preacher and people, when it was first proclaimed as the "divine law of pardon" in the early part of the nineteenth century. It has contributed, more than any other single thing, to the constant and rapid increase of the Disciples throughout their history.

The best proof of a great religion is its use on small occasions.

The only way to digest a good sermon is to do what it suggests.

People of Importance

—The Pope is to be presented with a specially made automobile. It is the gift of a small group of Americans.

—Mr. E. H. Harriman has laid aside all cares of railroad building for a time at least and sailed for Europe. This is his first outing abroad in five years.

—Vice President James S. Sherman has rented the Thurman cottage at Ne-Ah-Ta-Wanta, on Grand Traverse bay, and will, it is said, spend the summer there with his family.

—It is understood that Professor Jenks of Cornell University can be minister to China if he desires. Professor Jenks was formerly at Knox College.

—James C. Dahlman, the cowboy mayor of Omaha, a Democrat, has been reëlected. He defeated his Republican opponent by more than 3,000 votes.

—Former Governor T. T. Crittenden of Missouri, whose administration was conspicuous among other things for the breaking up of the famous Jesse James gang of outlaws, died recently at his home in Kansas City. He was chief executive of the State when the depredations of the James gang had become so numerous that the governor and Western railroads offered a reward for Jesse James and his brother Frank. Ex-Gov. Crittenden was a native of Kentucky.

—Lieut. Gen. Arthur MacArthur, the ranking officer of the army, has been placed on the retired list by operation of law on account of age and the grade of lieutenant general has ceased to exist in the army. By MacArthur's retirement Maj. Gen. Leonard Wood, commanding the department of the east, becomes the ranking officer of the army, but without increase of rank.

—John F. Stevens, former chief engineer of the Panama Canal, will go back into the service of James J. Hill, owner of the Great Northern and the Northern Pacific Railroads, having finally severed his connection as first vice president of the New York, New Haven & Hartford Railroad. Mr. Stevens was formerly president of the Great Northern Railroad.

—John Mitchell, for eight years president of the United Mine Workers of America and for the last year secretary of the National Civic federation, with headquarters at New York, has moved with his family to that city to reside permanently after seventeen years' residence in Spring Valley, Ill. Mr. Mitchell has purchased a $25,000 residence in the big city.

—Robert J. Wynne, former Washington newspaper correspondent and for two years until 1904 postmaster-general, since 1905 consul-general in London, is to retire from that post to make way for John L. Griffiths, now consul at Liverpool. Mr. Griffiths used to be a lawyer in Indianapolis, and wrote a biography of President Harrison.

—William Lorimer of Chicago, who has just been elected United States Senator from Illinois by an unholy combination of Republicans and Democrats was born in Manchester, England in 1861. He came to this country when nine years old. He started in life as a newsboy and was a street car conductor for a while. He has served several terms in Congress.

—Dr. James Warren Freeman, a prominent physician, has just died at his home in Saginaw, Mich. He was the father of the late Alice Freeman Palmer of the University of Chicago.

—Former Secretary of the Navy Newberry, before sailing for Europe, accepted the office of vice president of the Navy League of the United States, succeeding William McAdoo. Gen. Horace Porter, ex-Ambassador to France, is the president.

A New Baby

A baby come to our house
  Not very long ago,
And father says we'll keep it here
  'Cause mother loves it so.
I didn't understand at first;
  My heart felt very sore.
It seemed to me that mother
  Wouldn't love me any more.

But mother took me in her arms
  Just as she used to do,
And told me that a mother's heart
  Was big enough for two,
And that she loved me just the same
  Because of this, you see,
The place I have in mother's heart
  Is always kept for me.

Jamie's Chickens

BY EMMA C. DOWD.

"Oh, there's Mr. Dane! I've got to go!" and Jamie Shinners slipped his arms and his head from the rope harness, for he and Wooster Mann had been playing horse.

"Who's Mr. Dane?" asked Wooster.

"He brings us vegetables and berries and things from the country," Jamie answered.

"Well, what you got to go for?"

"'Cause he's my friend, and I want to see him," said Jamie. "He doesn't come but once a week."

Off he sped, calling, "Hullo, Mr. Dane!"

The man from the country turned from hitching his horse to give the little boy a smile and word of greeting, and Wooster watched them till they disappeared at the side of the house.

After a time Jamie returned, his eyes shining.

"I'm going to have some chickens!" he told his friend. "Mr. Dane's going to bring me three, a rooster and two hens, and I'm going to build 'em a coop! Then I'll have some eggs to eat, and can sell 'em and get some money, and I can have some little chickens! Won't that be nice?"

"You can't have the eggs for chickens if you eat 'em," said Wooster.

"Well, 'course I sha'n't eat the same ones; but there'll be enough for me and the chickens too, and what's left I'll sell—that's what I mean. Don't you understand?"

"Yes," Wooster replied meekly. "And I'll help you make a coop. I helped grandpa once when I was up there last summer."

"Oh, thank you!" beamed Jamie. "Let's begin now! 'Cause he'll bring 'em next week, and we want to have it ready."

Mrs. Shinners gave the boys a big box, and helped them to set it up in a sunny corner of the yard. Then with boards and hammers and nails and saws and a hatchet they went to work. Every day they kept at their task, until by the time the fowls came their home was ready.

Jamie was very fond and proud of his handsome white cock and hens, and he fed them regularly and gave them fresh water several times a day. About sunset he would let them out of their own little yard, which he had made by stretching wire netting around the box house, and they would have a good run for a few minutes before going to roost. When Jamie found a beautiful white egg in the nest he had fashioned in one corner of the house, his joy was complete. He could not be induced to eat it all himself, but it had to be divided into four parts, one each for papa, mamma, Aunt Jane, and himself.

The chickens always had their supper just before their bedtime; but one night Jamie was at play two or three squares from home, and forgot all about his pets. It was quite dusky when he came into the house, tears running over his cheeks.

"What is the matter?" mamma asked.

"My poor chickens!" sobbed Jamie. "I forgot 'em and they had to go to bed hungry—oh, dear! oh, dear!"

"No, darling," mamma said, gathering him in her arms, "the chickens had their supper. Aunt Jane fed them. And she found something for you—see!

There were two big white eggs in mamma's hand!

"Oh, oh," smiled Jamie, through his tears, "I've been wishing and wishing I could find two together! Now I'll give 'em both to auntie, 'cause she was so good, and I'll never forget my chickens again as long as I live!"

The Bellville Bird Club

BY HELEN ROSS LAIRD.

Miss Gertrude was the nicest teacher the Bellville School ever had had. All the boys and girls thought so. Miss Gertrude was young, she had blue eyes and golden hair, she never scolded,—though she kept the best order the little school had ever known—and she liked boys even when they were barefooted and mischievous. Scotty Black started out to make trouble when she came—Scotty always tried that with a new teacher—but in two weeks Scotty was chief monitor, and ready to fight any boy that didn't mind Miss Gertrude. So things, after that, generally went Miss Gertrude's way.

But there was one thing Scotty loved that Miss Gertrude didn't like. Scotty was a born hunter. He knew how to hunt bird's eggs, and he already had a collection. He snared wild rabbits, and he dug out woodchucks with Max, his dog. The other boys all tried to hunt as Scotty did, and so the birds and beasts at Bellville had a hard time. But one day Miss Gertrude asked the boys to stay after school, and proposed that they should organize a "Bird Club."

"The object of the Bellville Bird Club," she read aloud from a sheet of paper, "shall be to learn all about the habits and nests of birds and other wild creatures."

Scotty looked pleased. "I can tell lots about birds," he said. "I've seen so many of them."

"Very well," said Miss Gertrude, "Scott Black would be a good president for the club, boys, wouldn't he?"

That pleased them all, and the club was organized and Scotty elected president. Tom Murray was secretary, and Elmer Jones, historian. The historian was to keep the record of what the club did.

The first thing Miss Gertrude suggested to Scotty, was to study birds' nests. She had a book all about birds, with ever so many pictures, and members of the club were asked to answer a list of questions, such as:

What kind of a nest does a robin build?
Where?
How many eggs in it?
How long does it take them to hatch?
With what do the old birds feed the young ones?
How soon do they fly?

Now the eleven boys of the Bellville Bird Club knew how to rob nests, but that was all. This idea of studying nests, instead of taking the eggs out, was new. They all set to work and watched nests; and to do that they had to be quiet, and make friends with the birds instead of disturbing them. Scotty was seen scattering crumbs for the robins. Elmer Jones tied up the cat when a brood of young robins began to fly and were in danger from her for a day or two.

Then Miss Gertrude bought a camera—a good one, but easy to work. She let the club take photographs of this nest and that. Scotty got some splendid snap shots of young fledglings and a mother rabbit and her two little ones. Before long, the members of the Bellville Bird Club found themselves getting fond of birds and wild creatures, just as they were fond of their own pets. "Huh! it's more fun to help a bird along than to kill it, anyway!" said President Scotty at the midsummer meeting. Miss Gertrude smiled—for she knew then the club was a success.

The last snap shot of the summer was a picture of the club, under the tree where the first and only humming-bird's nest was found. Scotty is the tallest boy in the line—can you find him? And the historian, at the back, is the boy that told me all this.—Morning Star.

Sweet Assurance

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XX.

Colonel Barrington Is Convinced.

It was not until early morning that Courthorne awakened from a long sleep, after Winston conveyed him into his homestead. and ate it with apparent difficulty. When Winston came in he looked up from the bed where he lay, with the dust still white upon his clothing, and his face showed gray and haggard in the creeping light.

"I'm feeling a trifle better now," he said; still, I scarcely fancy I could get up just yet. I gave you a little surprise last night?"

Winston nodded. "You did. Of course, I knew how much your promise was worth, but in view of the risks you ran, I had not expected you to turn up at the Grange."

"The risks!" said Courthorne, with an unpleasant smile.

"Yes," said Winston wearily, "I have a good deal on hand I would like to finish here and it will not take me long, but I am quite prepared to give myself up now, if it is necessary."

Courthorne laughed. "I don't think you need, and it wouldn't be wise. You see, even if you made out your innocence, which you couldn't do, you rendered yourself an accessory by not denouncing me long ago. I fancy we can come to an understanding which would be pleasanter to both of us."

"The difficulty," said Winston, "is that an understanding is useless when made with a man who never keeps his word."

"Well," said Courthorne, "we shall gain nothing by paying out other compliments, and whether you believe it or otherwise, it was not by intention I turned up at the Grange. I was coming here from a place west of the settlement, and you can see that I have been ill if you look at me. I counted too much on my strength, couldn't find a homestead where I could get anything to eat. Any way, the horse threw me and made off, and after lying under some willows a good deal of the day, I dragged myself along until I saw a house."

Said Winston, "What do you want of me? Money in all probability. Well, you will not get it."

"I'm afraid I'm scarcely fit for a discussion now," said Courthorne. "The fact is, it hurts me to talk, and there's an aggressiveness about you which isn't pleasant to a badly-shaken man. Wait until this evening, but there is no necessity for you to ride to the outpost before you have heard me."

"I'm not sure it would be advisable to leave you here," said Winston.

Courthorne smiled ironically. "You'll certainly find me here when you want me."

Winston, glancing at the man's face, considered this very probable, and went out. He found his cook, who could be trusted, and said to him, "The man yonder is tolerably sick, and you'll let him have something to eat when he asks for it."

The man nodded, and making a hasty breakfast, Winston, who had business at several outlying farms, mounted and rode away. It was evening before he returned, and found Courthorne lying in a big chair languidly debonair but apparently ill. His face was curiously pallid, and his eyes dimmer than they had been, but there was a sardonic twinkle in them.

Winston sat down in front of Courthorne.

"Well?" he said.

Courthorne laughed. "You ought to be a witty man, though one would scarcely charge you with that. You surmised correctly this morning. It is money I want."

"You had my answer."

"Of course. Still, I don't want very much in the meanwhile, and you haven't heard what led up to the demand, or why I came back to you. You are evidently not curious, but I'm going to tell you. Soon after I left you, I fell very sick, and lay in a little desolate settlement for days. The place was suffocating, and the wind blew the alkali dust in. They had only bitter water to drink and I lay there on my back, panting, with the flies crawling over me. I knew if I stayed any longer it would finish me, and when there came a merciful cool day I got myself into the saddle and started off to find you. I don't quite know how I made the journey, and during a good deal of it I couldn't see the prairie, but I knew you would feel there was an obligation on you to do some thing for me. Of course, I could put it differently."

Winston had as little liking for Courthorne as he had ever had, but he remembered the time when he had lain very sick in his lonely log hut. He also remembered that everything he now held belonged to this man.

"You made the bargain," he said, less decisively.

Courthorne nodded. "Still, I fancy one of the conditions could be modified. Now, if I wait for another three months, I may be dead before the reckoning comes, and while that probably wouldn't grieve you, I could when it appeared advisable, send for a magistrate and make a deposition."

"You could," said Winston. "I have, however, something of the same kind in contemplation."

Courthorne smiled curiously. "I don't know that it will be necessary. Carry me on until you have sold your crop, and then make a reasonable offer, and it's probable you may still keep what you have at Silverdale. To be quite frank, I've a notion that my time in this world is tolerably limited, and I want a last taste of all it has to offer a man of my capacities before I leave it. One is a long while dead, you know."

Winston nodded, for he understood. He had also during the grim cares of the lean years known the fierce longing for one deep draught of the wine of pleasure, whatever it afterwards cost him.

"It was that which induced you to look for a little relaxation at the settlement at my expense," he said. "A trifle paltry, wasn't it?"

Courthorne laughed. "It seems you don't know me yet. That was a frolic, indulged in out of humor, for your benefit. You see, your role demanded a good deal more ability than you ever displayed in it, and it did not seem fitting that a very puritanical and priggish person should pose as me at Silverdale. The little affair was the one touch of verisimilitude about the thing. No doubt my worthy connections are grieving over your lapse."

"My sense of humor never had much chance of developing," said Winston grimly. "What is the matter with you."

"Pulmonary hemorrhage!" said Courthorne. "Perhaps it was born in me, but I never had much trouble until after that night in the snow at the river. Would you care to hear about it? We're not fond of each other, but after the steer-drivers I've been herding with, it's a relief to talk to a man with moderate intelligence."

"Go on," said Winston.

'Well," said Courthorne, "when the trooper was close behind me, my horse went through the ice, but somehow I crawled out. We were almost across the river, and it was snowing fast, while I had a fancy that I might have saved the horse, but, as the troopers would probably have a mounted man, I let him go. The stream sucked him under, and, though you may not believe it, I felt very mean when I saw nothing but the hole in the ice. Then, as the troopers didn't seem inclined to cross, I went on through the snow, and, as it happened, blundered across Jardine's old shanty. There was still a little prairie hay in the place, and I lay in it until morning, dragging fresh armfuls around me as I burnt it in the stove. Did you ever spend a night, wet through, in a place that was ten to twenty under freezing?"

"Yes," said Winston. "I have done it twice."

"Well," said Courthorne, "I fancy that night narrowed in my life for me, but I made out to cross the prairie in the morning, and as we had a good many friends up and down the country, one of them took care of me."

Winston sat silent a while. The story had held his attention, and the frankness of the man who lay panting a little in his chair had its effect on him. There was no sound from the prairie, and the house was very still.

"Why did you kill Shannon?" he asked, at length.

"Is any one quite sure of his motives?" said Courthorne. "The lad had done something which was difficult to forgive him, but I think I would have let him go if he hadn't recognized me. The world is tolerably good to the man who has no scruples, you see, and I took all it offered me, while it did not seem fitting that a clod of a trooper without capacity for enjoyment, or much more sensibility than the beast he rode, should put an end to all my opportunities. Still, it was only when he tried to warn his comrades he threw his last chance away."

Winston shivered a little at the dispassionate brutality of the speech, and then checked the anger that came upon him.

"Fate, or my own folly, has put it out of my power to denounce you without abandoning what I have set my heart upon, and after all it is not my business," he said. "I will give you five hundred dollars and you can go to Chicago or Montreal, and consult a specialist. If the money is exhausted before I send for you, I will pay your hotel bills, but every dollar will be deducted when we come to the reckoning."

Courthorne laughed a little. "You had better make it seven fifty. Five hundred dollars will not go very far with me."

"Then you will have to husband them," said Winston dryly. "I am paying you at a rate agreed upon for the use of your land and small bank balance handed me, and want all of it. The rent is a fair one in face of the fact that a good deal of the farm consisted of virgin prairie, which can be had from the Government for nothing."

He said nothing further, and soon after he went out Courthorne went to sleep, but Winston sat by an open window staring at the prairie while the night wore through, until he rose with a shiver in the chill of early morning to commence his task again.

A few days later he saw Courthorne safely into a sleeping car with a ticket for Chicago in his pocket, and felt that a load had been lifted off his shoulders when the train rolled out of the prairie station. Another week had passed when, riding home one evening, he stopped at the Grange, and as it happened found Maud Barrington alone . She received him without any visible restraint, but he realized that all that had passed at their last meeting was to be tacitly ignored.

"Has your visitor recovered yet?" she asked.

"So far as to leave my place, and I was not anxious to keep him," said Winston, with a little laugh. 'I am sorry he disturbed you."

Maud Barrington seemed thoughtful. "I scarcely think the man was to blame."

"No?" said Winston.

The girl looked at him curiously, and shook her head. "No," she said. "I heard my uncle's explanation, but it was not convincing. I saw the man's face."

It was several seconds before Winston answered, and then he took the bold course.

"Well?" he said.

Maud Barrington made a curious little gesture. "I knew I had seen it before at the bridge, but that was not all. It was vaguely familiar, and I felt I ought to know it. It reminded me of somebody."

"Of me?" and Winston laughed.

"No. There was a resemblance, but it was very superficial. That man's face had little in common with yours."

"These faint likenesses are not unusual," said Winston, and once more Maud Barrington looked at him steadily.

"No," she said, "of course not. Well, we will conclude that my fancies ran away with me, and be practical. What is wheat doing just now?"

"Rising still," said Winston, and regretted the alacrity with which he had seized the opportunity of changing the topic when he saw that it had not escaped the notice of his companion. "You and I and a few others will be rich this year."

"Yes, but I am afraid some of the rest will find it has only further anxieties for them."

"I fancy," said Winston, "you are thinking of one."

Maud Barrington noddtd. "Yes, I am sorry for him."

"Then it would please you if I tried to straighten out things for him? It would be difficult, but I believe it could be accomplished."

Maud Barrington's eyes were grateful, but there was something that Winston could not fathom behind her smile.

"If you undertook it. One would almost believe you had the wonderful lamp,' she said.

Winston smiled. "Then all its virtues will be tested tonight, and I had better make a commencement while I have the courage. Colonel Barrington is in?"

Maud Barrington went with him to the door, and then laid her hand a moment on his arm. "Lance," she said, with a little tremor in her voice, "if there was a time when your distrust hurt you, it has recoiled upon our heads. You have returned it with a splendid generosity."

Winston could not trust himself to answer, but walked straight to Barrington's room, and finding the door open went quietly in. The head of the Silverdale settlement was sitting at a littered table in front of a shaded lamp, and the light that fell upon it showed the care in his face. It grew a trifle grimmer when he saw the younger man.

"Will you sit down?" he said. "I have been looking for a visit from you for some little time. It would have been more fitting had you made it earlier."

Winston nodded as he took a chair. "I fancy I understand you, but I have nothing that you expect to hear to tell you, sir."

"That," said Barrington, "is unfortunate. Now, it is not my business to pose as a censor of the conduct of any man here, except when it affects the community, but their friends have sent out a good many young English lads, some of whom have not been too discreet in the old country, to me. They did not do so solely that I might teach them farming. A charge of that kind is no light responsibility, and I look for assistance from the men who have almost as large a stake as I have in the prosperity of Silverdale.

"Have you ever seen me do anything you could consider prejudicial to it?" asked Winston.

"I have not," said Colonel Barrington.

"And it was by her own wish Miss Barrington, who I fancy, is seldom mistaken, asked me to the Grange?"

"It is a good plea," said Barrington. "I connot question anything my sister does."

"Then we will let it pass, though I am afraid you will consider what I am going to ask a further presumption. You have forward wheat to deliver, and find it difficult to obtain it?"

Barrington's smile was somewhat grim. "In both cases you have surmised correctly."

Winston nodded. "Still, it is not mere inquisitiveness, sir. I fancy I am the only man at Silverdale who can understand your difficulties, and, what is more to the point, suggest a means of obviating them. You still expect to buy at lower prices before the time to make delivery comes?"

Again the care crept into Barrington's face, and he sat silent for almost a minute. Then he said, very slowly, "I feel that I should resent the question, but I will answer. It is what I hope to do."

"Well," said Winston, "I am afraid you will find prices higher still. There is very little wheat in Minnesota this year, and what there was in the Dakotas was cut down by hail. Millers in St. Paul and Minneapolis are anxious already, and there is talk of a big corner in Chicago. Nobody is offering grain, while you know that land lies fallow in Manitoba, and the activity of their brokers shows the fears of Winnipeg millers with contracts on hand. This is not my opinion alone. I can convince you from the papers and market reports I see before you.

Barrington could not controvert the unpleasant truth he was still endeavoring to shut his eyes to. "The demand from the East may slacken," he said.

Winston shook his head. "Russia can give them nothing. There was a failure in the Indian monsoon, and South American crops were small. Now, I am going to take a further liberty. How much are you short?"

Barrington was never sure why he told him, but he was hard pressed then, and there was a quiet forcefulness about the younger man that had its effect on him.

"That," he said, holding out a document, "is the one contract I have covered."

Winston glanced at it. "The quantity is small. Still, money is very scarce and bank interest almost extortionate just now."

Barrington flushed a trifle, and there was anger in his face. He knew the fact that his loss on this sale should cause him anxiety was significant, and that Winston had surmised the condition of his finances tolerably correctly.

"Have you not gone quite far enough?" he said.

Winston nodded. "I fancy I need ask no more, sir. You can scarcely buy the wheat, and the banks will advance nothing further on what you have to offer at Silverdale. It would be perilous to put yourself in the hands of a mortgage broker."

Barrington stood up very grim and straight, and there were not many men at Silverdale who would have met his gaze.

"Your content is a little too apparent, but I can still resent an impertinence," he said. "Are my affairs your business?"

"Sit down, sir," said Winston. "I fancy they are, and had it not been necessary, I would not have ventured so far. You have done much for Silverdale, and it has cost you a good deal, while it seems to me that every man here has a duty to the head of the settlement. I am, however, not going to urge that point, but have, as you know, a propensity for taking risks. I can't help it. It was probably born in me. Now, I will take that contract up for you."

Barrington gazed at him in bewildered astonishment. "But you would lose on it heavily. How could you overcome a difficulty that is too great for me?"

"Well," said Winston, with a little smile, "it seems I have some ability in dealing with these affairs."

Barrington did not answer for a while, and when he spoke it was slowly. "You have a wonderful capacity for making any one believe in you."

"That is not the point," said Winston. "If you will let me have the contract, or, and it comes to the same thing, buy the wheat it calls for, and if advisable sell as much again, exactly as I tell you, at my risk and expense, I shall get what I want out of it. My affairs are a trifle complicated and it would take some little time to make you understand how this would suit me. In the meanwhile you can give me a mere I O U for the difference between what you sold at, and the price today, to be paid without interest and whenever it suits you. It isn't very formal, but you will have to trust me."

Barrington moved twice up and down the room before he turned to the younger man. "Lance," he said, "when you first came here, any deal of this kind between us would be out of the question. Now, it is only your due to tell you that I have been wrong from the beginning, and you have a good deal to forgive."

"I think we need not go into that," said Winston, with a little smile. "This is a business deal, and if it hadn't suited me I would not have made it."

He went out in another few minutes with a little strip of paper, and just before he left the Grange placed it in Maud Barrington's hands.

"You will not ask any questions, but if Colonel Barrington is not kind to you, you can show him that," he said.

He had gone in another moment, but the girl, comprehending dimly what he had done, stood still, staring at the paper with a warmth in her cheeks and a mistiness in her eyes.

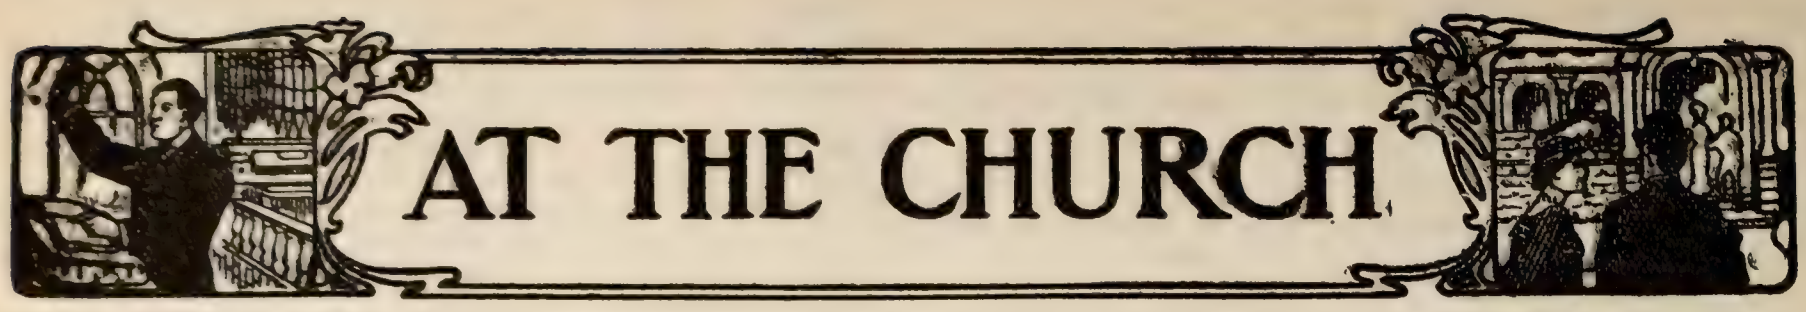
A Call to Duty



By Ophelia M. Tracy.

I.

Come, let us plan what we shall do today!
The rosy morn steals forth, in bright array!
A scowl? A fret? And moments thrown away?
Oh God, forbid so mean a day, I pray!

II.

But if we feel desire to do our part,
Today's the day! And now, the time to start
That song of love, to ease a sorrow's smart!
To ease? Perchance to heal a broken heart!

Sunday School Lesson

LESSON FOR JUNE 27.

Temperance Lesson—Romans 13:8-14.

Golden Text.—Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ.—Romans, 13:14.

Introduction.

The apostle begins this chapter with an exhortation to render to the civil authorities or rulers of the state, the duty which we owe to them. From this he passes to a more general exhortation to render to all "their dues," tribute to whom tribute is due, and honor to whom honor is due. The lesson is an expansion of this thought, with argument, illustration and appeal.

Outline of the Lesson.

Love, the sum of duty.
It fulfills the law.
Time is passing.
We must be up and doing.
The daily walk.
The garment of salvation.

Notes on the Lesson.

8v. Owe no man anything. Not only in the way of unpaid dues, but also of undone duty. Let no man hold an unfulfilled obligation against you, whether monetary, moral, a claim of law, or a claim of honor. Keep your accounts straight with all men, financially, morally and spiritually.

But to love one another. Love is the great obligation, and yet the idea of obligation or duty seems to kill it. To love because we must is not to love.

Hath fulfilled the law. The argument of the apostle is that the commandments mentioned are intended to prevent us from injuring one another, and that love will fulfill them all because we would not injure those whom we love. As he says in the 10th verse, "Love worketh no ill to his neighbor, therefore love is the fulfilling of the law."

10v. No ill to his neighbor. The saloon and the liquor traffic do work ill to neighbors. Dr. Dickey made a tremendously forcible argument along this line in his debate with Mayor Rose, in Chicago. The question in the debate was, "Resolved, that prohibition is right," and Dr. Dickey maintained the affirmative, showing that the liquor traffic works ill, therefore, it is right to prohibit it. In proving this he showed that it works ill economically, physically and morally—that is, it causes poverty, ill health, and crime. He presented a telling array of authorities for each point, the authority of political economists and statesmen, of physicians and of the courts. The failure of Mayor Rose to meet these arguments was dismal and the debate became quite one-sided before it was over.

Fulfilling of the law. The liquor traffic is a notorious violator of the law. It attempts to nullify, evade or destroy every law that gets in its way, and it makes men violators of all law. Temperance makes men keepers of the law—the courts have little to do and the jails are often empty.

11v. And that knowing the time, etc. Here the apostle appeals to a powerful motive for faithfulness in the Christian life. Time is passing, the hour is at hand, awake out of sleep; our salvation is nearer. The stroke of the clock falls upon our ears like the voice of an admonishing angel and tells us to wake and rise and press on. Than when we believed. The complete deliverance. Men are saved when they believe, but the completeness of salvation is always coupled with last things in the New Testament.

12v. The night is far spent. The pagan world had seen a long and dreadful night, darkened by ignorance, by superstition, by unbelief, and made hideous by deeds of lust and shame.

And night is the special time of drunkenness. It is at night that the father or the son comes staggering into the home to break the heart of a wife or mother. The day is at hand. A beautiful figure. The beginning of the Christian life is the dawn of a new day, and Christianity turned the night of the heathen world into the light of a better day. Cast off the works of darkness. As a mountain sheds its shadows when day breaks in the east and floods of light pour from the morning.

Put on the armor of light. As opposed to the heavy shadows of sin and ignorance, the armor of truth and faith and hope and love. See Eph. 6:13-17, and 1 Thess. 5:8. "Let us who are of the day be sober, putting on the breastplate of faith and love; and for an helmet the hope of salvation."

13v. Let us walk honestly, as in the day. The Christian is to be an honest man, a sincere and frank man. It is not necessary that he should wear his heart on his sleeve, but it is necessary that he should not be "sly" or "smooth," or so diplomatic as to make men doubt him. Not, in rioting and drunkenness. An abounding sin of the time. These are works of darkness which they are to lay off. "They that be drunken are drunken in the night." 1 Thess. 5:7. Not in chambering and wantonness. It was this text that convicted the great Augustine of sin and led to his conversion. He was in a garden at Milan, and he heard a voice saying, "Take and read"—it was the voice of a child in play, but he rose and took up the scripture again and opened at this verse. It so convinced him of his guilt that he immediately made the great decision.

Not in strife. Intemperance causes strife, but not all strife, and this text is a condemnation of all strife. It should be avoided.

14v. Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ, a Greek expression. Devoted followers of a teacher were spoken of as putting him on. It means clothing ourselves with the sentiments, virtues, and characteristics of the Master.

Make not provision for theflesh. Pagans were living for the flesh. Rome's emperors were beasts of iniquity, who used their position, power and revenue for the gratification of their lusts. The contrast between the example of Jesus Christ and that of these monsters was equal to the whole distance of moral extremes.

Suggestive Points.

—It would be a great mistake to apply this lesson only to the liquor sellers or the liquor drinkers.

—It is a lesson for all.

—We can never get away from law in a universe of law—it must be in our hearts or its hand writing will be on the wall.

—The Ten Commandments can never be abrogated until sin is abolished.

—Talk about applied Christianity, as a modern discovery! ! Here it is in searching thoroughness.

—Love is a force, but law is a force only when it is enforced.

—The clock is ticking our time away; don't forget that.

—"To awake out of sleep."—the world is much asleep, and it is to be feared that that means all of us.

—What an awakening it will be when the world becomes temperate and thinks back over the horror of the cost and the harm and the crime and the shame caused by the open saloon, and the license traffic in rum!

—"The day is at hand"—Paul faced the morning, blessed is the traveler toward the morning.

—"Cast off" and "put on"—very significant!

—"Let us walk"—water runs down hill, and so does life if not watched; it takes good stiff walking to reach the right place.

—Putting on Jesus Christ is clothing ourselves with salvation and with the garments of praise.

Comment by Others.

"See how wide is the application of this great principle of owing every man love. It means that the strong owe their strength to the weak. If any man have the gift of speech, he must plead the cause of those who have no words. If any man have wealth, he holds it as a trustee for the needy and honorable poor."—Joseph Parker.

Paul's Rule.

The rule laid down here would be a remedy for all the evil of bad debts; it would teach men to be industrious and thus avoid debts; it would make them frugal, economical and humble in their views and manner of life. Religion would produce sober and chastened views of the end of life, and would at the same time take off the affections from the splendor, gayety, and extravagance which lead often to the contraction of debts. It would put a period to the vices and unlawful desires which prompt men to contract debts. It would make them honest in paying them. It would also make them conscientious, prompt, and faithful in keeping promises.—Albert Barnes.

The Prohibition Wave.

The long, long night of the dominance of rum is nearing its end. At the beginning of 1909, the Distillers' Security Company of the United States reduced its current dividend from is usual one and one-half per cent quarterly to one-half of one per cent. This action followed the prohibition sentiment and legislation in the South and West. The liquor dealers have come to realize that prohibition does prohibit. There are only two hundred and seventy-five counties in all the southern states where liquor is legally sold. In Kentucky one hundred million dollars is invested in distilleries, but the people have voted to prohibit the sale of liquor in all but twenty-two of the one hundred and nineteen counties of the state. Signs multiply that the end draws near.—Westminster Teacher.

PRAYER MEETING

By Silas Jones

THE CHRISTIAN'S PANOPLY.

Topic, June 23. Eph. 6:10-20.

Some of our political leaders are saying that we need huge armies and navies for the promotion of peace. Their sincerity may be open to question, but granting that they believe what they say, we as disciples of the Lord must beware of attempting to apply their kind of wisdom to the problems of the kingdom of God. We must arm for war. It is not peace that we seek, but the destruction of the enemy. We have no right to follow a policy that includes terms of peace with the spiritual hosts of wickedness.

The Lord honors his people by giving them a real fight. Only a sham Christianity fights sham battles. The drills of the disciple are earnest struggles against some form of sin. The armor is put on for the purpose of meeting an enemy. The armies of the world are equipped with the most effective weapons. Science leaves nothing undone to provide terrible instruments of destruction. Can the Christian be careless about his equipment and escape disgraceful defeat?

The Girdle of Truth.

The girdle made rapid movements possible for the Roman soldier. He put on the girdle that he might be unhindered in action. Truth as an element of character does the same service for the Christian. We must be careful not to make too much of Paul's figure of the full armed soldier, but I think we are not going astray when we insist that sincerity is a part of the meaning of truth as here used. The sincere man has a decided advantage over the hypocrite. He has merely to consider what is best, what an honest man ought to do. The other has a number of questions relating to his reputation and to the various selfish schemes he has concocted.

The Breastplate of Righteousness.

Uprightness of character defends the heart against the assaults of evil. The sowing of wild oats is not encouraged by this passage. It is contrary to the teaching of scripture and of experience that we can allow bad habits to grow and then in a moment banish them and be as if these habits had never held us in bondage. We give the reins to godless ambition and to base suspicion and then expect to maintain our integrity and faith in the presence of fierce temtation. Especially is it true that for strength to overcome the discouragements connected with any form of Christian service there is needed a life of integrity. The preacher, the teacher, and the leader of the forces of civic righteousness must have sound character. Much of the pessimism expressed by men who have tried to reform the world and have encountered angry opposition is the outgrowth of sinful indulgence.

The Readiness of the Gospel.

"Do it now" is a good motto. It is misused, however, if we understand it to mean that we have no need to consider anything but our own impulse to act. The readiness of the gospel—"the preparation of the gospel of peace"— is the readiness of thoughtful study and careful planning. The deed is to be done at the right moment and the right moment may be long delayed. The ready man knows what temptations to avoid and what he must meet and overcome. He changes his plans promptly when he finds them wrong and better ones are presented to him.

The Shield of Faith.

Weak faith gives the enemy access. Do we have an insecure hold on the great realities of our religion? Do the impassioned utterances of the heroes of faith seem foolishness to us? Do we accept it as a matter of course that men should endanger life in the quest of gold but count the missionary among the abnormal human personalities? Then our character has a foundation of sand. Let trouble come, let sickness and loss of friends be our lot, and we shall be ready to curse God.

Helmet and Sword.

In I. Thessalonians Paul mentions the hope of salvation as the helmet of the Christian. Hopeless men do not build characters nor do they give help to others. They are powerless. It is the man with a song in his heart whose life is an inspiration. He puts down wickedness. The world welcomes him and listens to his song. The sword is the word of God. Do you ask why it is called a sword? You can get the answer by reading the words of the prophets and of the Master. They smite evil with their lips.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR LESSON

TOPIC FOR JUNE 20.

Pilgrim's Progress Series. VI. The Hill of Difficulty. Rom. 7:14-25; 2 Cor. 6:1-10.

The Hill of Difficulty is to all of us no strange part of the Pilgrim's way. Like Formality and Hypocrisy in the allegory we are apt to shun the hill and seek a shorter way. It seems easier to follow the line of least resistance than it is to push on over the mountain. Sooner or later we learn that it is "Better, though difficult, the right way to go,

Than wrong, though easy, where the end is woe."

The man who chooses only easy ways, the student who likes only easy lessons, the person who is watching for the least work,— these are apt to be led into the bypaths of Danger and Destruction. Let us try hard things nor flinch at difficult duties.

Who sleeps on duty courts discharge and disaster. No wonder Christian lost his roll, the assurance of life, when he slept at midday in the midst of difficulty. I remember coming into New York harbor, after the long Mediterranean trip, having been delayed two days by the fogs off shore. Our good captain scarcely ate or slept; never a moment did he leave his watch. Watchfulness insures safety, the assurance of coming into the desired haven. If you are going home and realize the value of your ship, keep constant watch.

John Bunyan, Author of "Pilgrim's Progress."

Bunyan was right in teaching us that "the Porter's lodge" is on the Hill Difficulty, built by the Lord of the hill for the relief and security of pilgrims. I once heard a quaint old farmer say that, "in traveling up the road to heaven, you will be sure to find one of God's blacksmith shops just where you break down and need help." There is always a place to rest when we need it.

The Pilgrim in the lodge has practical conversation about Christian things. It is good to talk over the life we try to live. Why did we begin it? What lessons have we learned by the way? What experiences have proved full of warning? Of hope? Does the heart turn to the old life? Is the burden of sin gone? Do we love Him well by whom we were eased of the burden? Are these the deep things about which we confer with our fellow Christians? Or are we content to chat, or chatter, on the level of the weather, and of ball games, and of dresses? After awhile, in the lodge, they sat down to meat. "And all their talk at the table was about the Lord on the hill." About what is your table talk?

From the hill the pilgrim had his vision of the Delectable mountains. There is always a glorious outlook from the hilltop, no matter how hard the climb. We can see the things coming, as we speed on our way. George MacDonald has a beautiful poem on "What lies over the Hill?" It is a child's question and the answer speaks of

"Rivers and fields and men,
Over and over—a weary tale."

But that is not all, for there is "a stair up into the sky." And the child answers,

"I will go! But the steps are very steep;
If you would climb up there,
You must lie at its foot, as still as sleep,
And be a step of the stair

"For others to put their feet on you
To reach the stones high-piled,
Till Jesus comes and takes you, too,
And leads you up, my child."

Woman's Sphere

—Miss Helen Taft, daughter of the President, unveiled the monument erected at Gettysburg, Pa., in memory of the Union soldiers who participated in the Gettysburg campaign.

—Prince Albert of Belgium's consort, Princess Elizabeth, who has the reputation of being the best-dressed princess in Europe, is a charming and clever daughter of the royal oculist, Duke Theodore of Bavaria. She has studied medicine, and used to help her father in his work among the poor. Her social work in Brussels has endeared her to rich and poor alike.

—The girls of the geological department of Barnard College are planning to take a two weeks' tramp through the mountains this summer.

—Miss Mary Adele Case of Portland, Ore., whose engagement to marry Claus Spreckles, grandson of the California sugar magnate, has been announced, was born in a sodhouse near Springfield, S. D., twenty years ago. Miss Case, who has been studying in Paris for two years, won her way in the musical world practically by her own efforts.

—Mrs. Ann McCarthy was married to Gus Rhenstrom, her chauffeur, at Redwood City, Calif., last week. The bride was the wife of August Chamot at the time of the boxer rebellion in China and she and her husband were instrumental in saving many lives in Peking. Chamot was interpreter at court and also kept a hotel for foreigners. Mrs. Chamot was called the angel of the legations. In return for their services in Peking they received $450,000 from the allied powers, many rare jewels and gifts, and August Chamot was made a mandarin of China, one of the first Europeans to be accorded this honor.

—Her royal highness, Princess Alexandra of Fife, eighteen years old, is the debutante princess of the British royal family for 1909. She is a tall, athletic young lady, whose other titles are duchess of Fife and countess of MacDuff. The Princess Alexandra is, of course, named after the queen of England, who is her grandmother. Her grandfather, King Edward, raised her to the rank of highness with the title of princess, and in 1900 the late Queen Victoria created a separate duchy of Fife for her great-granddaughter, who until then had been only the Lady Alexandra Duff.

Chicago

The Divorce Scandal—Sights and Scenes in Chicago Courts

BY ORVIS F. JORDAN.

Great cities come to be known by their distinguishing characteristics or by their means of livelihood. Boston is fond of beans and Browning. Philadelphia is said to be very slow. Pittsburgh is said to have very naughty millionaires. Chicago has been known by its pork-packing industries. Sioux Falls, South Dakota, has been known as a good place for a quick and easy divorce. It seems, however, that Chicago is soon to be known as the home of the divorce mill of the country. Divorces are to be had here at the price of a good tailor-made suit.

The other day Judge Kavanaugh had in his court a woman suing for a divorce who had already been divorced from three husbands. She was trying to be free from a man who had already divorced five wives. A part of her complaint was that the man was already making arangements to take in his seventh wife as soon as this divorce was granted by default.

Saturday "Our Busy Day."

Saturday is known as divorce day in the Chicago courts. On this day the cases that go by default are tried. As only fifteen per cent of all the divorce cases brought in the city are contested, it will be seen that Saturday is a very busy day, indeed. In the cases not contested, there is a large percentage where there is collusion between the parties, one of the parties ageeing beforehand that he or she will not appear in the courts to contest. Thus the breaking up of a home by divorce comes to be for a very large part a matter of agreement between the two partners who have come to be tired of each other's company and who have already discovered more attractive partners.

If one wishes drama with the note of realism in it, the courts are better than any theater in Chicago. Recently we visited one of the leading courts in Chicago where family differences were aired. We were astonished at the rapidity with which the court had to deal with cases in order to take care of the business that came there. In a period of fifteen minutes, three divorce cases were heard and decrees granted. The brief and thrilling stories told there affected all but the people who by long practice had become accustomed to the scenes of that court room.

The first case was that of a woman suing for a divorce. The court asked the usual questions concerning name, age, residence and so forth. Then he inquired on what grounds the divorce was sought. The woman said her husband was in Joliet, convicted of murder and on a life sentence. She seemed refined and acquainted with the better things of life. Looking into the faces of the court-room habitues, she broke down and wept at the story of life's disappointment. Corroborating testimony was taken and the decree was granted.

Daughter as Chief Witness.

The next case was that of a man suing for a divorce from his wife. A little daughter was introduced as the chief witness. Her mother had forsaken the home and had lived in adulterous union with a man not her husband. The little girl had lived for a time in this sorry imitation of a home and had left because she had revolted at the kind of life her mother was living. The disgusting details of this unnatural household were sought from the girl. With tears streaming down her cheeks, she told the story of her mother's shame and of her father's sorrow. After brief corroborative testimony the case was ended by the issuing of a decree of divorce.

The next case was introduced by the testimony of an elegantly dressed lady who told the story of her alleged disappointment. She wore plumes valued at over a hundred dollars on a hat that was fearfully and wonderfully made. Her gown, her furs, her whole make-up proclaimed the society woman who in her materialism gave chief attention to the externals of life. She had no tears to shed and gave her testimony as she would order a dinner. She had married a soldier boy. He had not turned out well. She declared she had tried to make a man of him but had failed. The man hod gotten drunk and she claimed he had been abusive. This brought the case under the statute. After the corroborating witness had finished, she sailed out of the court-room to other conquests, or perhaps to meet the lover on whose account she may have sought the decree.

Divorced in Five Minutes.

These cases indicate something of the range of operation in the ordinary divorce court. A divorce granted in five minutes examination may sometimes have sufficient thought as to the facts brought forth, but it seems a terrible thing to decide the life destiny of individuals and break up a home forever with five minutes' consideration.

We are familiar with the results of the divorce court, but we are not yet sufficiently familiar with the causes that contribute to this end.

One of the great contributing causes is the light esteem in which marriage is held. It is the most familiar object of jest. Young people keep company with little thought of the possible outcome, playing with great life forces which they do not understand. Marriage is ill-advised and separation is in such cases often inevitable. In departing from the European system of taking advice from the family, our young people have gone the extreme of individualism. There is no doubt that while our young people will hold the freedom they have gained, they will come to have more regard for the advice of their elders. Getting married will have at least as good counsel as the matter of buying a house and lot.

Another great cause is the unfitness of many of the men today for marriage. The hospitals and physicians have some terrible stories to tell for those who have ears to listen. This fact has become so potent a factor that several states are considering compulsory medical examination before marriage. This may seem a harsh measure, but if there is no other way by which the innocent may be protected from reaping the harvest due the wicked, then let it come.

Defect in Education of Girls.

Another great contributing cause is the impractical nature of many of our girls today. Our grandmothers educated our mothers for domestic life. The girls of today learn the things that make for veneer culture often without the solid essentials of a woman's training for life. A woman who performs beautifully on the piano but knows nothing of domestic processes is not fit to preside even over a rich man's house. These impractical young women in the end have to marry in their own station of life. When the bookkeeper marries and finds his money not spent economically at the grocery, finds his food cooked abominably and his house untidy, he will probably end up in the saloon where the free lunch is so much better than he has at home and where good fellowship takes the place of strained relationships. Not that he is right, but it is human nature.

It will not do then, to try to cure divorce after it has happened. We must make marriage more sacred, by investing it with deeper religious significance. We must insist upon our young people making it more a matter upon which to receive advice. Above all we must produce a generation of practical young people who are trained for the real tasks of life by a system of education which lays its emphasis upon the things of genuine worth.

America leads all civilized nations of the earth in the number of divorces. It is a part of our individualism. With the dawn of the new social spirit, we ought not to tend to make marriage a matter of still further individualistic interest, but see that every wedding is the concern of the whole community.

Chicago Church Notes

C. G. Kindred spoke at the large men's class in Gibson City recently.

The Odd Fellows of Irving Park held their memorial service in our church in that suburb, A. W. Taylor preaching the sermon.

The Austin Sunday-school will hold their annual picnic in conjunction with two other Sunday-schools of their suburb this year.

A local auxilliary of the C. W. B. M. has been organized in the Armitage Avenue Church with the help of the ladies of the Irving Park Church.

About a hundred and fifty Odd Fellows worshipped with the Austin church on the first Sunday night in June. Every seat in the church was taken.

The Children's Day exercises in Harvey were held on the first Sunday in June. The offering this year will reach a hundred dollars.

The West End Church is planning some open air series on their church lawn this summer. The experiment will be watched with interest.

O. F. Jordan has been invited to fill the pulpit at Taylorville, Illinois, some Sunday soon and tell the story of the institutional efforts in Evanston, reviewing the whole city problem.

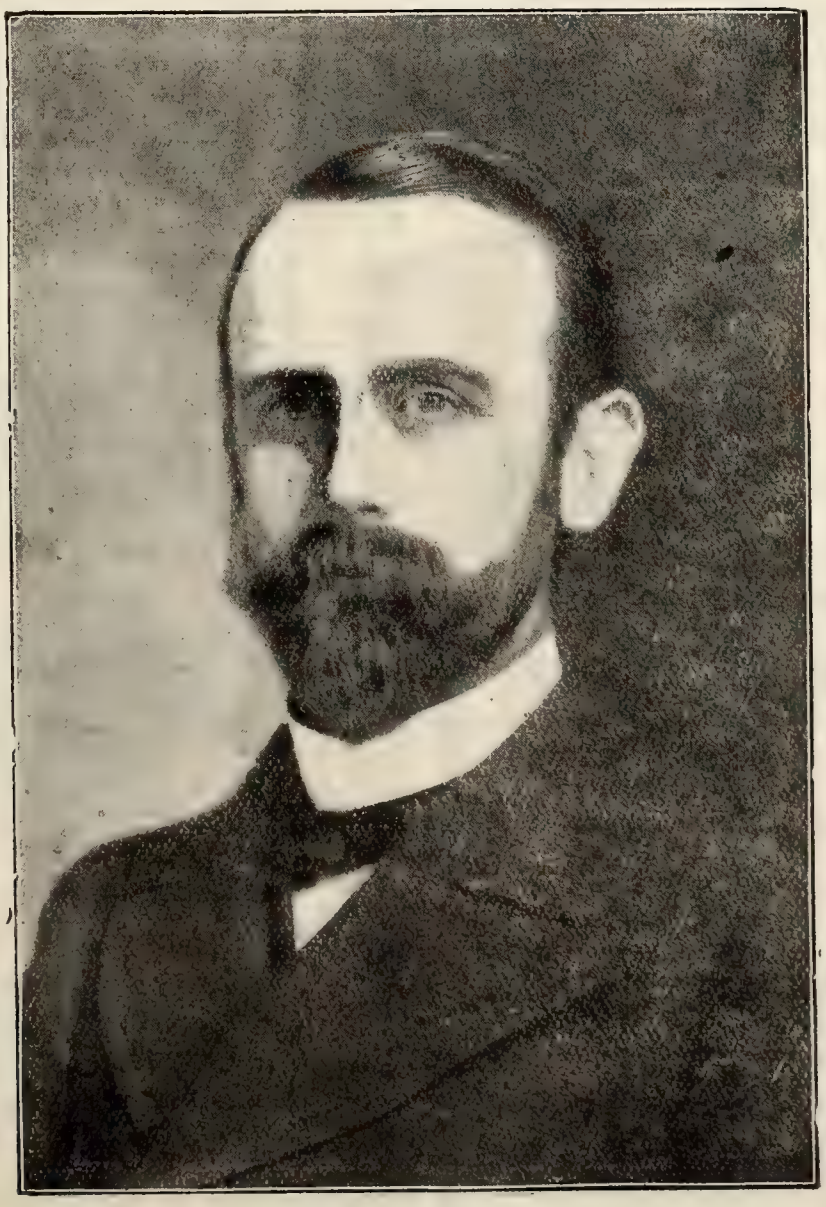
Five Austin churches have been on fire recently as the result of the work of an incendiary. The Austin Church of the Disciples burned a year ago and though it was not then guessed that this fire was of incendiary origin, that theory now seems a possible one.

—Lord Roberts, England's great soldier, known as "Bobs," has just celebrated the golden anniversary of his wedding. So popular is he that the event assumed something of the character of an imperial festival. The King and Queen were among the earliest to remember the day and the newspapers were full of eulogies of the veteran soldier.

—Dr. Charles R. Henderson of the department of ecclesiastical sociology at the University of Chicago,has been appointed international prison commissioner to succeed the late Dr. Samuel H. Barrows. The international prison commission meets annually to discuss matters concerning the improvement of prisons. Congress has appropriated $25,000 to enable this country to participate, and the meeting of the commission in 1910 will be in this country.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett



Should the Lord's Supper be partaken of every Sunday? Is it commanded that we use the emblems thus frequently? H. McB.

Chicago.

There is no command relating to the manner, the time, nor the frequency of observing the Lord's Supper. Jesus took the simplest elements of the Passover meal, the bread and the wine, which have also been the most fundamental articles of diet in all history, and suggested to his followers that whenever they partook of bread and wine, he wished them to remember him. It is by no means certain that Jesus designed to establish this as a formal custom, but rather reminded his disciples that on all occasions when they met and partook of food they should remember that he was present with them as their Lord and guest. Yet so precious a memory could not fail to create in the hearts of the disciples a desire to observe the custom regularly and as a holy privilege. And thus they fell early into the habit of breaking bread with this significance. Probably at first the communion was observed daily (Acts 2:46). But after the first enthusiasm of the Christian community subsided and the usual tasks of life were resumed, the custom of observing the holy meal tended to coincide with the memorial of the Saviour's resurrection, the first day of the week. At least in one instance (Acts 20:7) we are informed that the disciples met on the first day of the week to break bread. Other references, especially in the writings of Paul, relate to the fact of the communion as a recognized part of Christian worship, but do not throw light upon its frequency, nor the time at which it was observed. The Saviour's words, however, "as oft as ye eat this bread and drink this cup, ye manifest the Lord's death until he come," indicate that a frequent rather than an occasional celebration of the supper would meet the ideals of early Christianity. Nor it there any reason why it should not be celebrated at any time where a company of believers is gathered. The fact that its original observance was upon Thursday evening would hint that it is by no means necessary to restrict the custom to the Lord's day. Wherever its ministration may be helpful in any company of believers, at the bedside of the sick, or even in a family circle, it is appropriate. It must be borne in mind that it is never intended to be a mere formal sacrament, but rather a loving and precious exercise of the Christian privilege of communion with the Master and with those who have obtained like precious faith through fellowship with him. Wherever and whenever his followers meet for purposes which he would approve and where they can be conscious of his presence with them, there the holy supper is an appropriate observance.

What is the meaning of the passage in Matthew 24:41—"Two women shall be grinding at the mill; the one shall be taken and the other left?" Student.

These words are found in the discourse of Jesus regarding the disasters which were soon to fall upon Palestine through its invasion by the Roman armies. Jerusalem would be invested, its people would be reduced to dire extremities, great numbers of them would be put to death and others could only save their lives by instant and unreckoning flight. Families would be divided, tragedies would be numberless, and such haste in escape would be necessary as should make all matters of property or even of friendship seem of trifling moment. A vast common domestic custom in Jesus' day was that of grinding wheat or barley for bread. Two women sat opposite each other, revolving a convex stone disk in the hollow of another stone. This is a custom still followed in the Orient, and it requires daily a considerable amount of time on the part of the women of the household. So sudden would be the tragedy of Palestine's baptism of blood under Roman oppression that the women of households would be caught in the sudden pillaging of towns; and one might be able to escape while the other would be put to death. In this manner Jesus illustrated the necessity of being always ready for the events of life, more particularly those which had to do with the establishment and progress of the kingdom of God.

Echoes of the May Offering

Lee's Summit, Mo.—Last year the Lee's Summit Church had no part in this blessed work. There was no one preaching here and the church without a preacher does very little. This year we send $28.30.—LEE H. BARNUM, Pastor.

Wichita Falls, Texas.—Find check enclosed for $44.60 for Home Missions. Our offering was $40 last year.—W. J. BULLOCK, Treasurer.

About three thousand orders for Children's Day supplies have been received, and more are pouring in every day. It looks as though the $100,000 would be forthcoming from the Sunday-schools.

Osgood, Mo.—Find enclosed $25 for Home Missions; our apportionment is $15. Gave $10 last year.—J. E. TODD.

Gurnee, Ill.—Enclosed find $15.75. Exceeded our apportionment. Offering last year was $6.—J. F. WILLIAMS.

Remington, Ind.—You will find enclosed draft for $47.05, the offering of the First Church for Home Missions. Our apportionment was $35.—H. RANDALL LOOKABILL, Pastor.

Weatherford, Texas.—Enclosed find New York draft for $32.50 to be credited to the Central Christian Church, of Weatherford, Texas, for Home Missions.—IRA B. TAYLOR.

Mt. Sterling, Ill.—Enclosed find draft for $32.64, offering for Home Missions. Offering last year, $7.72.—W. D. TOMPKINS, Treasurer.

Hopkinsville, Ky.—Enclosed find $263.36 for Home Missions. Living Link.—H. D. SMITH.

Abilene, Kans.—Enclosed find $48.60, $44.50 of which is from the First Church of Abilene, the remainder from the Harmony Church. Offering last year from the Abilene Church was $27.50.—C. A. COLE.

Glasco, Kans.—Enclosed find $20.09 from the Glasco Church for Home Missions.—J. F. HAY.

Bristol, Tenn.—Find enclosed $52.77, the offering of the Central Church at Bristol for Home Missions. We gave $5 last year, therefore, this offering is ten times greater this year. With best wishes, and hoping that the offering was a record breaker, I am, J. RANDALL FARRIS.

Tazewell, Va.—Enclosed find New York draft for $85, the contribution of the Tazewell Church for Home Missions. I made individual, personal appeals to certain members, and they responded creditably. Offering last year was $67.50.

Zionsville, Ind., May 26—Enclosed you will find P. O. for $20; Home Missionary Offering from the Zionsville Church. Offering last year $9.00. Etta Hoffman.

Columbus, Ind., May 25—I herewith enclose check for $562.12, our offering for American Missions. We are a little disappointed in not raising our $750, but this is the response to date. We are hopeful for some additions later on. P. W. Harding.

Columbia, Ky., May 24—Please find enclosed check for $30 from Columbia Church for Home Missions. We have only two services a month and take the offering the fourth Sunday. Last year offering $18.00. Z. T. Williams.

Fayette, Mo., May 20—I am sending you check for $41.95, our offering for Home Missions, and while it is about double what it was last year, I regret that it is so small. Andrew P. Johnson.

Kingfisher, Okla., May 24—It gives me great pleasure to enclose draft for $35, our apportionment for Home Missions. Clay T. Runyan.

Rudolph, Ohio, May 24—Please find enclosed check for $30.35, the Home Missionary Offering of the Bethel Church. O. E. Smith.

Chapin, Ill., May 25—After some delay you will find enclosed our offering, $33.25. Our apportionment was $30, and we went a little above it. Wish we could have doubled it. T. L. Read.

Emmett, Idaho, May 21—You will find enclosed draft for $16.10, offering from the First Christian Church for Home Missions. I think this is doing well for this new and inexperienced church. Albert L. Young.

Jennings, La., May 24—I beg to hand you herewith draft for $23.51, offering from the Jennings Christian Church for Home Missions. Offering last year, $17.75. Brown Funk.

Chattanooga, Tenn., May 25—I am requested by the Highland Park Christian Church to forward you $20.10 for Home Missions. Madison Orton, Treas.

Nelson, Nebr., May 24—Enclosed find draft for $12, the offering of the Christian Church at Nelson. We sent $10.00 last year. Mrs. A. E. Stahl, Treas.

Vinton, Pa., May 16—Enclosed find $28.65 for Home Missions from the Prairie Greek Church. Offering last year $6.30. R. F. McMillan.

Winchester, Ky., May 25—Enclosed find $16.05 from Forrest Grove Church, Clark Co., for Home Missions. Our offering last year was $6.00. J. L. Prewitt.

Mansfield, Ohio, May 24—Enclosed find $75 from the First Church. Will send another like installment later. Will make it $150 in all. We rejoice and wish it were more. Chas. R. Oakley.

Minerva, Ohio, May 24—Enclosed find Cleveland draft for $40. Our offering is being continued through this month with hope of getting as much as possible. Will send any additional early in June. J. A. Wharton.

Clarksville, Mo., May 21—We enclose herewith $10 for Home Missions. Offering last year $5.10. C. B. Gilbert.

Pembroke, Ky., May 24—Enclosed find check for $50.40 for Home Missions. Our apportionment was $30.00—we have nearly doubled you see. Heretofore this church has been giving little or nothing for Home Missions. R. V. Ferguson.

Santa Monica, Cal., May 21—Enclosed find check for $38.35, Home Missionary offering from the churches of Ocean Park and Santa Monica. J. L. Lobinger.

Ladonia, Texas, May 22—Find enclosed $25.00, which is the offering of the First Christian Church at Ladonia, Texas. Offering last year, $10.00. A. L. Clinkinbeard.

Are Universities Destructive?

As a contribution to the current discussion partly provoked by a series of magazine articles on the revolutionary character of university teaching, the Western Christian Advocate (M. E.) publishes an excellent article by Rev. A. W. Fortune of the Walnut Hills Church of Disciples, Cincinnati, on "Are Universities Destructive in Their Tendencies?" Mr. Fortune writes from the standpoint of one who has passed through one of the great universities of the country. His words are both instructive and reassuring. We quote portions of his article:

"If it is a destructive tendency to permit teachers to seek to know the truth, rather than to conform rigidly to the traditions of the past, then the fears of the most radical critics of the universities are justified. These teachers are seeking to know what is true, rather than to determine what the fathers believed, because they feel that it is the truth that makes men free. But these teachers, in their search after truth, are not anxious to overthrow the traditions and customs of the past. They use the historical method of teaching, and that necessarily makes the past living and vital. They study the past, not as a matter of curiosity, but in order to find out what is true and helpful for the present. These university professors are seeking to know the way of God, hence, as a rule, they are humble and reverent. Upon the seal of the University of Kansas is the picture of Moses before the burning bush, with the words from the Vulgate: "Video visionem hanc magnam quare non comburatur rubus:" "I will see this great sight, why the bush is not burnt." That might be on the seal of almost any of the universities, for it is with this spirit of reverence that the teachers approach the subject under investigation. It was my experience that the teachers in the Divinity School invariably began the recitation with prayer.

"If it is a cause for alarm that the university professors are optimistic, and "protest against the looking back regretfully to a Golden Age," then the alarm should be sounded in all haste. For these professors do teach that we have more of truth than any past age. We have climbed up the mountain a little higher, and hence can see a little farther. They do teach that theology changes, and who that has studied the history of Christian doctrine would say otherwise? But while theology changes, and some phases of it "break down," the great principles of religion are eternal, and these teachers are endeavoring to interpret these principles in harmony with the thought of our day. These professors do teach that the standards of morality have changed, and who, in the light of history, would atempt to deny this? There are many things tolerated in the earliest Biblical times which would not be tolerated today. More light means higher ideals, and we have, not only the light of Biblical times, but we have also the added light which has come with the centuries. These university professors do teach that the Bible, or any part of the Bible for that matter, is not a code of laws, given in a Golden Age, according to which all ages are to conform. They teach young men to try to grasp the spirit of Christ and the prophets, and to apply these eternal principles to our age and to our conditions, so that, with our increased opportunities, we may help lift up the race toward the perfect ideal.

"If it is a dangerous tendency to permit the university professor to accept the results of modern science, and study the Bible from that point of view, then there are dangers before us. For these professors, as a rule, are men of broad culture, and they try to correlate the different realms of thought. It is a calse for rejoicing that they are reverent men who know the results of modern scientific research, and can explain the Bible in the light of all these facts. This makes it possible for the young man of our day, who has gone through the high school and the college, to still believe in the Bible. When one is forced to give up a tradition or belief which he has cherished, he sometimes feels that the foundation is dropping out from under everything. But he may find, erelong, that he has a firmer foundation on which to stand. Calvin, in his "Commentary on Genesis," condemned all who asserted that the earth is not the center of the universe. He referred to Psalm xciii, 1: —"The world also is established, that it can not be moved"—and asked, "Who will venture to place the authority of Copernicus above that of the Holy Spirit?" John Wesley declared that "unless witchcraft is true, nothing in the Bible is true." When the followers of Calvin and Wesley were forced to give up these beliefs, they felt that the foundation was dropping out from under faith. But we have adjusted our beliefs on these and many other questions, and as a result of that readjustment we feel that we have a firmer foundation than our fathers had. The university teachers, as a class, are not anxious to point out difficulties in the Bible. Their effort is to clarify these difficulties, so that the Bible becomes a practical Book to the man of modern culture.

"The danger before us is not the destructive teaching of the universities. It is rather that, in our loyalty to tradition, we shall occupy a hostile attitude toward these universities, and thus alienate from the church the brightest young people of the country. The church does not need to be afraid of investigation, for truth is mighty, and in the end it shall conquer and make free."

THE REAL BELL.

Ringing Quality, Durability and Sweetness of Tone—these three are the characteristics of the Real Bell. Experience is the important factor to consider in making Bells. It is in the "knowing how" to make a Real Bell at a minimum cost so that it can be sold at a price within the reach of all. The widely known manufacturers, "The C. S. Bell Co., Hillsboro, Ohio," are the makers of the Steel Alloy Bell, which is a Real Bell. For over one-half century this company has been making Bells, finding a market for them in all countries on the globe. Their catalogue and special prices will interest you. A postal card will bring you full information.

Books You Need

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing among the Disciples of Christ. You need every one of this splendid list.

OUR CENTENNIAL BOOK.

"Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union."—Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic for this our Centennial year. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Boston W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Retail price, $1.00. No one should allow the Centennial to pass without possessing this book.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind., a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possibly only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these churches are given their present form."

Every Disciple of Christ will be interested in getting from his own pen the teachings of Professor Willett. No fair man will consent to judge him on the basis of newspaper reports. These books should be in every one's possession just now.

ERRETT GATES' ILLUMINATING WORK.

"The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples."

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 35c. Paper binding, 25c.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, PA.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, MASS.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes:

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

W. T. Fisher, pastor at Clarinda, Ia., was the speaker at a recent banquet, given by the Men's Class of the Sunday-school at Shenandoah, Ia.

Norwood Avenue Church, Toledo, Ohio, loses its pastor, A. C. Finch, who has accepted a call to Frederick Avenue Church, St. Joseph, Mo.

At Hereford, Texas, where S. T. Shore, is pastor, the church is erecting a $20,000 building. The Ladies' Aid Society of the church will send the pastor to the Centennial Convention.

All former students and graduates of the College of the Bible, Lexington, Ky., who were members of Philoseubia Literary Society, are requested to send their names and addresses to R. L. Riddell, Secretary.

H. O. Breeden has not accepted the pastorate of the West Side Church, San Francisco, as announced in some of our papers, but will supply the pulpit until a pastor is decided upon.

At Milton, Ind., where C. H. Calloway is pastor, fine Children's Day exercises were held the first Sunday in June, and an offering of $20.00 made to foreign missions.

Robert Stewart, pastor in Rochester, N. Y., where there are 223 members, reports that their offering for all missionary purposes the first Sunday in June was $489.00, and that it will easily be raised to $600.00

Vernon Harrington and wife, who have been at work in Texas, expect to come north shortly, and are available for meetings with churches in Iowa, Missouri, or Illinois. They may be addressed at McGregor, Texas.

At the June meeting of the Southern California Ministerial Association, Christian Church, the principal address was: "Demonology of the New Testament," by E. D. Chapin. Princess C. Long sang at the meeting.

June 13 to 18, is the date of the commencement exercises of the Christian Temple Seminary, Baltimore. The Baccalaureate sermon was preached by Peter Ainslie, Dean of the Seminary, and the commencement address will be given by F. D. Power, Washington, D. C.

By the unanimous vote of the church at Pawnee City, Neb., C. L. Wheeler, who has served them so successfully during the past year will remain another year. The church begins a meeting with the assistance of Wilhite and Tuckerman, June 13.

J. F. Williams, who has been pastor of the church at Gurnee, Ill., has accepted a call to the church at Geneva, Ohio, where he begins work, July 1. The church in Geneva has 400 members, and Mr. Williams is looking forword to a very pleasant work.

T. J. Golightly, pastor at Shenandoah, Ia., delivered the address to the graduating class of the high school at Metropolis, Ill. The address was published in full in the local paper. Mr. Golightly speaks well of the work of J. T. Alsup, pastor at Metropolis.

The Atlanta Christian College closed a very successful year's work with the first week in June. This college is growing and coming to a place of great influence among the churches of North Carolina, and the entire South.

The corner stone of the new First Church, at South Bend, Ind., was laid, June 6, at 3 o'clock. The address by the pastor, Geo. W. Hemry, was highly commended by all. The new building will be completed about November 1.

The Green Castle (Ind.) Herald, June 1, gives in full the baccalaureate sermon, delivered by J. M. Rudy, before the graduating class of the high school of that city. The subject of Mr. Rudy's address was, "Some Factors of Human Development."

From the Bulletin of the church at Fayette, Mo., we clip the following: "Some people are exceedingly loyal to the preacher they have just had, and the one they are just going to get, but the one on the field can not count on them. There are few of that kind here."

Under the leadership of J. E. Wolfe, minister, the church at Weston, Mo., has more than doubled all missionary offerings during the present year. The evening service of this church, May 30, was given up to exercises appropriate to the gradaution of eight members of the teacher training course.

Commencement of Eugene Bible University was held May 23-25; baccalaureate sermon by J. A. Pine, Dayton, Oregon; alumni address by F. E. Billington, of the class of 1902, subject: "The Preacher of the Twentieth Century"; the commencement address was by W. F. Reagor, pastor of the First Church, Portland, Ore.

Eureka College Commencement week began June 13. The baccalaureate sermon was preached by Stephen Fisher, Champaign, Ill. The address on Sunday evening was by Dr. Royal J. Dye, and the alumni address by David H. Shields, the pastor of the church at Eureka. Commencement address by Judge Orrin N. Carter, Springfield, Ill.

W. C. Hull, of North Tonawanda, N. Y., has been called as successor of F. M. Dowling at Pasadena, Cal. It is believed that the great work done by Mr. Dowling in this field will be carried prosperously forward by Mr. Hull, who has done an efficient work in New York. Mr. Hull began work with his new church, June 11.

A happy surprise came to Harry E. Tucker, minister of the church at Platte City, Mo., when at the close of a sermon preached by L. S. Cupp, former minister of the church, announcement was made that the church had arranged to send its present minister to the Centennial Convention. Churches take notice.

The special program for the Inland Empire Day, July 4, prepared by the Home Society, is ready for distribution. This Inland Empire, the Great Northwest, is the special find of the Endeavorers of the Disciples, and nothing should be allowed to prevent each society having a good program, July 4. Send to American Christian Missionary Society, Y. M. C. A. Building, Cincinnati, Ohio, for free copies of the program.

On account of failing health, J. B. Mayfield, pastor at Butler, Mo., has been compelled to retire from the active ministry for a time. His son, W. M. Mayfield, Kansas City, Mo., has been called to become pastor of the church.

F. E. Udell, a prominent member of the Union Ave. Church, St. Louis, Mo., who was chairman of the Building Committee, during the recent erection of their beautiful building, and who is a member of the committee appointed at Norfolk to arrange for the establishment of a publishing house for the Disciples, has been in San Francisco for a few weeks, superintending some of his business interests, and incidentally becoming acquainted with the churches, and workers of the Pacific Coast.

"Sunday, June 6, was a great day at Fayette, Mo. The Bible school reached the highest mark in its history. The Young Ladies' Class was organized four years ago with a membership of fifteen and now has over thirty, and will go to 100. There have been ten in the last thirty days. The church has doubled all of its missionary offerings," writes Andrew P. Johnson, Minister.

H. A. Denton, centennial secretary of the Home Society, has resigned his office to accept a call to the church at Bedford, Ind. The reason assigned for Mr. Denton's giving up his work with the Home Board, is the condition of his wife's health, making it impossible for him to be away from home so much of his time. The CENTURY trusts that the change may prove beneficial to Mrs. Denton, and that the arrangement may be one of happy and successful work for both pastor and church.

B. H. Sealock, who has recently taken charge of the work at Petersburg, Ill., has organized the young men of the Christian Church upon the basis of their athletic interests, for the purpose of stimulating interest in clean athletics, and to promote the physical and social development of the young men. They have formed a baseball team, a basket ball team, and a track team. Mr. Sealock has not forgotten his athletic record in Eureka and the University of Chicago.

E. M. Todd is at work with the church at Fort Wayne, Ind. The announcements in the calendar, May 30, show the church to be working aggressively, and to be allying itself with the larger movements of the city's life. Mr. Todd is preaching on Sunday mornings during June, a series of sermons on the topic, "What is a Christian." All who know Mr. Todd know that these sermons will deal vitally with the subject, and will be a means of uplift to the church.

Two brethren in Texas have announced a public debate on the question, "The Use of Instrumental Music in the Service on the Lord's Day is Contrary to Scripture and Sinful.' The discussion is to occupy four evenings, and the meetings are to be held in a tent. The brother who denies that music—instrumental music—should be used in the service, will also deny that the work of the Texas Christian Missionary Society is in harmony with scripture. Such discussions offer a kind of entertainment where better forms are not to be found.

William J. Lockhart and W. F. Linnt, have held a very successful meeting with the First Christian Church, Lockhart, Texas, where Edward O. Sharpe is the pastor. The meetings were held in the church which seats 600 people, but this proved too small, and the doors and windows of the church were crowded with eager listeners throughout almost the entire meeting. There were 139 who responded to the invitation; of these twenty-five will unite with other churches, according to their expressed purpose. Thirty-six of the seventy confessions were from the Sunday-school. The pastor is enthusiastic over the work of both the evangelist and the singer.

A new pastor has been called to the work of the Twenty-fourth Street Church, San Francisco. Otto B. Irelan, who goes to South Berkeley, has just closed a four years' work with this church. His successor is William C. Bailey. The last Sunday evening in May, Mr. Irelan preached his last sermon for the church, and received Mr. and Mrs. Bailey into the fellowship of the church, and then calling Mr. Bailey to the pulpit, delivered to him the keys of the church, and the membership list. What a beautiful way to effect a change in administration! Such methods and spirit would greatly lessen the loss so often suffered by the church during change of pastors.

WITH THE WORKERS

M. M. Davis, Dallas, Texas, preached the baccalaureate sermon for the Virginia Christian College, Lynchburg, Va.

C. A. Polson, minister at Akron, Ohio, writes that they have begun to remodel the church building there. One young man was reclaimed June 6.

Sumner T. Martin has received a unanimous call from board and church to remain another year in Santa Barbara from August 15. He preached the sermon on Memorial Day, in the M. E. Church.

Andrew P. Johnson, minister of the First Christian Church, Fayette, Mo., delivered the address on Memorial Day. He is preaching to the largest audiences the church here ever had at regular services.

A. B. Philputt, Central Church, Indianapolis, will preach the baccalaureate sermon for the State Normal School at Terre Haute, Ind., and in the evening perform the same service for the State University at Bloomington. The State of Indiana could find no man more capable of measuring up to these two splendid opportunities.

Eureka College has been represented at all the District Conventions of Illinois and her work has been enthusiastically endorsed. The Endowment Campaign for the College is becoming the issue of the hour in Illinois and much will be accomplished within another year.

Hiram College celebrates Commencement week beginning June 17. President Miner Lee Bates will preach the Baccalaureate sermon Sunday, June 20. Various exercises follow on Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday, with Thursday as the great day of the feast. President W. O. Thompson of Ohio State University delivers the commencement address on "The Development of Moral Responsibility."

John R. Ewers, pastor at Youngstown, Ohio, and editor of the Men's department of the Christian Century, has accepted a call to the East End Church, Pittsburg, recently made vacant by the resignation of John G. Slater. Mr. Ewers will begin his work there September 1. The combination of that superb church and rare leader will greatly strengthen the cause in the Centennial city. Mr. Ewers has been active in the vigorous local option campaign in Youngstown which closed last week.

The Nevada Daily Mail, Nevada, Mo., May 31, prints in full the text of the baccalaureate sermon, delivered by W. W. Burks, pastor of the Christian Church, before the graduating class of Cottey College, of that city. The exercises were held in the college auditorium. Mr. Burks' text was, "This is the Victory that Overcometh the World even our Faith."

A Centennial Rally will be held by our three congregations at Galesburg, Knoxville, and East Galesburg, Thursday, June 24. The Rally will be held at Gilbert's Park, at Knoxville, and an all-day's program is arranged. Among the speakers are Prof. Gray, of Eureka; Mrs. Royal Dye, of Africa; Geo. B. Ranshaw, of the Home Board, Cincinnati, and Finis Idleman, of the Central Church, Des Moines. The Rally will resemble the old fashioned "basket meeting" and great good is expected to result from it. About ten churches of that vicinity will participate.

Third District Convention

The Third District Convention was held in Abingdon, May 24-26. About 100 delegates were present. F. L. Moore, the pastor, is doing a splendid work and proved himself a royal host. The officers elected are as follows: President, A. M. Hale, Vice President, H. J. Reynolds, Secretary A. I. Zeller, Advisors, J. A. Barnett and H. G. Waggoner. At a meeting of the District Board, held in Bushnell, June 1, it was decided to secure a man for general district work as soon as possible.

A. I. Zeller, Sec'y.,
Cuba, Ill.

Telegrams

Matanzas, Cuba, Sunday-school gives $20.60 for Children's Day. 130 givers.—Melvin Menges.

Literberry, Ill.—Greatest offering in our history. Apportionment more than reached. —C. G. Cantrell.

Rushville, Ind.—Apportionment raised, $300. Check follows. Gilbert's class hundred and ten.—Carl N. Nipp.

New Richmond, O.—Aim: $25 offering; 200 in attendance; 25 confessions. Record: $32.28 offering; 209 in attendance; nine added.—W. E. Anderson.

Des Moines, Ia.—University Church gives three thousand dollars for all missionary interests. Six families unite to support Livinglinks. Seven volunteers for mision field.—M. E. Barnhill.

Washington, D. C.—Children's Day at Vermont Avenue today was the "Best Ever." We will go beyond our apportionment, $375, thus making Vermont Avenue a Living-Link another year.—E. O. Gouzwer, Supt.

Fall City, Neb., June 13.—Fifty-two added today. Twenty men confessed Christ at big Men's meeting. Total of 82 first eight days. Big tabernacle jammed tonight. Great victory for this saloon-ridden town. Fighting against great unbelief and sin. Pray for us. Brother Day and his people loyal.—Wm. J. Lockhart and Lintt.

Keysport, Ill., June 13.—It's an inspiring sight: Preacher with coat and vest off, perspiration running off his body, men in shirt sleeves and overalls, women fanning, babies crying, and in the midst of it all strong men and women stepping out and making the good confession. Seems like old pioneer time. Best of all, three men pledged for the ministry from this section, so we thank God and continue.—Thompson the Egyptian.

Angola, Ind., June 14.—C. R. Scoville and his helpers are assisting Vernon Stauffer and the Angola church in leading churches of Christ in Steuben county in a county union meeting. Tabernacle is located here in the county seat. Most excellent preparatory work is telling in results. Forty-four converts today, fifty-five in first two days of invitation.—W. J. Minges.

The Hot Springs, Ark., Church is making an appeal to the brotherhood for aid in building a church building. Usually their independent appeals should be discouraged and our offerings for such purposes sent through the regular channels of our societies organized for this purpose. But this Hot Springs instance seems to be exceptional. T. N. Kincaid, the pastor, reports that already he has received $3,600 in cash and pledges. Of this, $2,000 in pledges are conditional upon the "Harris proposition" being realized. Mr. Kincaid describes this proposition and writes as follows: "Z. A. Harris, of Blackwell, Okla., agreed to be one of fifty to give $100. Up to date we have received twenty of these pledges. We secured a pledge yesterday from one of our splendid brethren, M. T. Reeves, of Indiana, completing the first twenty pledges. We have shaped our financial affairs and are shaping them so that this work can be taken from before the brotherhood the moment the remaining thirty pledges are secured on the Harris proposotion. I appeal to every brother or sister in the brotherhood, who is able and has the money to invest in the Lord's work, to join Brother Harris on this proposition. The time limit on some of these pledges is the first of January next, and we must not fail to secure the remaining thirty before that date. Those who pledge now help us doubly. Let all who can send a small amount and send their pledges at once. The building is waiting for money. We cannot resume work until we hear from the Brotherhood.

Good News From the Home Board

The "Home Board" is rejoicing in the splendid increase of regular receipts for the month of May. More than 900 churches remitted promptly. 309 sent larger offerings than a year ago. while 227 sent smaller offerings. The total amount of the smaller offerings. however, was more than doubled by the total amount of increased offerings. Only nineteen churches were content to send the same offering, while 349 new contributing churches were added to the lists. The total gain from regular sources for May was $3,172.16.

Annuities and bequests show a falling off. but the outlook for gifts from these sources is very hopeful, indeed. Most of the large churches have not yet remitted. These are the larger gifts and therefore the rate of gain will doubtless largely increase from this time forward. Churches, however, that have not yet remitted, should send in their offerings promptly in order that our American Christian Missionary Society may save interest on borrowed money.

Our Home Missionary Secretaries report that, in that slowest of all appeals to take hold of the schools, there has been a splendid increase. The Home Missionary Offerings thus far are $4,000 ahead of last year, and many schools have arranged to send offerings later in the year. The live school is always a missionary school.

The latest word from the office of the American Christian Missionary Society assures us that the offerings are coming in at the rate of $1,000 per day. This is very cheering new for those who expect to go up to the Pittsburg Convention celebrating the Centennial with a great Home Missionary offering.

BRAIN BUILDING

How to Feed Nervous Cases

Hysteria sometimes leads to insanity and should be treated through feeding the brain and nerves upon scientifically selected food that restores the lost delicate gray matter. Proof of the power of the brain food, Grape-Nuts, is remarkably strong.

"About eight years ago when working very hard as a court stenographer I collapsed physically, then nervously, and was taken to the State Hospital for the insane at Lincoln, Neb., a raving maniac.

"They had to keep me in a straight-jacket and I was kept in the worst ward for three months. I was finally dismissed in the following May but did no brain work for years, until last fall when I was persuaded to take the testimony in two cases.

"One of these was a murder case and the strain upon my nervous system was so great that I would have broken down again except for the strength I had built up by the use of Grape-Nuts. When I began to fell the pressure of the work on my brain and nerves I simply increased the amount of Grape-Nuts and used the food more regularly.

"I now feel like my old self again and am healthy and happy. I am sure that if I had known of Grape-Nuts when I had my trouble 8 years ago I would never have collapsed, and this dark experience in my life would never have happened.

"The power of Grape-Nuts as a brain food is simply wonderful and I do not believe any stomach is so weak that it cannot digest this wonderful food."

"There's a Reason." Look for the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs.

Centennial Bulletin

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

Pray, Brethren, Pray!

The first and doubtless the most neglected of all Centennial aims is "Daily Worship in Every Home." The next in neglect is like unto it, "All the Church in the Prayer Meeting." This delinquency in the Centennial year is becoming painfully apparent to our brethren everywhere. I. N. McCash of Berkeley, Cal., makes the timely suggestion that we seek to put first that which is first in importance by not only increasing attendance at and interest in the mid-week prayer meeting, but by making the Centennial themes the subjects of study, and the objects of prayer. T. J. Golightly of Shenandoah, Iowa, proposes that a special season of prayer be appointed for Tuesday, Wednesday, Thursday and Friday, September 7 to 10. The first of these days is the actual hundredth anniversary of the publication of the Declaration and Address. In addition to the prayer and thanksgiving appropriate for such a season there should be special studies of the life and work of the pioneers, and special emphasis upon the supreme first principles of the gospel. The songs in the service should be the great old hymns that were not only dear to the hearts of our fathers, but have been precious to the saints of all times and places.

Bible-school Organization.

The open secret of the marvelous success won by many of our churches in their Bible-schools was stated in the Centennial committee's report at the Norfolk Convention as a bugle blast to the delinquent. "Organize your work, work your arganization." The schools that have reached the Centennial aims, and other high marks, have done this. Like splendid achievements await those that shall follow in their steps. There is yet time for the transformation of every Bible-school before the Centennial.

But in our best states we have not stopped with the organization of the local school, but on the same principle have banded together all the schools of the state under a state superintendent. The third and logical step has now been taken in a national organization with a national superintendent. The Centennial year is the opportune time for this completion of our Bible-school organization. Its directors were fortunate in being able to secure one of the wisest, strongest and best Bible-school specialists in America as national superintendent. Marion Stevenson is his name, and his address is 393 North Euclid avenue, St. Louis.

He has been in the field several months, and is rendering splendid service. To the several departments of Bible-school activity, and to all the state organizations, he stands in much the same relation as that of the local superintendent to the departments and classes in his school. He is the representative of the whole body. He holds it together and makes it a body rather than a mob. He helps the weak and encourages the strong. He gathers up the best results of the efficient and puts them at the service of the inefficient. He is all the schools' servant for Christ's sake. The importance of his work will become more and more apparent from year to year.

For the maintenance of our Bible-school headquarters and superintendent, the national directors ask that every school in the brotherhood send in just one collection, if possible that of June 27, 1909. Let us signalize the Centennial year by every one responding promptly to this very reasonable request. This will bring ample funds without burdening any one.

Centennial Railroad and Hotel Rates.

As announced some time ago the Central Passenger Association, which includes all the territory between Pittsburg and St. Louis and Chicago, makes a rate of a fare and a half for the round trip. The Western and Southwestern Associations will make the same reduction, which we are also confidently expecting from the Trans-Continental Association and the Southeastern. East and northeast of Pittsburg, where our membership is not so strong, the Trunk Line Association has granted a fare and three-fifths, excepting Pennsylvania, where it is straight two cents per mile, and the New England Association will probably make the same reduction, as will also that of Eastern Canada.

If representative brethren in every city and section will take the matter up at once with their local passenger agents, and let them understand how many people are planning to come, our efforts at securing desirable concessions will be greatly assisted.

Two or three thousand of the delegates to the Centennial can be cared for in the hotels at rates ranging from $1.00 per day up, on the European plan, and $2.00 per day on the American plan. Unusual concessions have been made by all the hotels where two or more go together in one room.

A thorough canvass is being made of all the residence sections of the city for rooms in private homes. The rates for these will be from 50 cents to $1.00, with 25 cents or more additional where breakfast is taken also. Meals will be provided not only in the numerous regular restaurants of the city, but in special and ample places in the Centennial Quadrangle at popular prices for first class service. Those who wish a particular kind of rooms, or a particular location, should write at once to the entertainment committee, 203 Bissell Block, Pittsburg.

The Roll Call of Veterans.

Who are they? There is a strange sensitiveness when questions of age are raised. Some men are offended if you include them among the veterans; others are hurt if you leave them out. The only course left for us is to fix an arbitrary age limit. This must be the scriptural three-score and ten. For the purpose of the Centennial Camp Fire, Saturday afternoon, October 16, every man or woman in the Restoration Movement who is over seventy years of age is a veteran. We want the names of all such at Centennial headquarters. We want the veterans themselves to write and tell us which of their number shall be put in charge of the preparations for this Camp Fire.

As we begin to count them up we find their number astonishingly small. In the first place when they were young, not many people were enlisted in the Restoration Movement. And then of course a great majority have been promoted to the higher service. Let us render all the more honor to those who remain as the representatives of a mighty generation.

Nothing But the Centennial.

Last Monday, an enthusiastic meeting was held at Wilkinsburg, in connection with the monthly rally of the Northern Pennsylvania Disciples. It was a gathering of all the Centennial Entertainment Committees of all the greater Pittsburgh churches. Each church had been charged to appoint the five people that would have been chosen if it had had to take care of the Centennial Convention alone. The keynote of the meeting was sounded by the Chairman, Fred M. Gordon. "No church has anything else to do now but prepare for the Centennial." This dominant note rang through his outline of plans for the canvass of the city, and the questions and answers and discussions. The best homes are not too good for those who come up to the Centennial, and every citizen of Pittsburgh must take a pride in not only seeing these homes provided but at the lowest rates within reason.

The city is being districted around the churches as sub-centers, just as the postoffice department has its sub-centers. Each delegate on arrival and registration will be sent to one of the churches and there assigned a room by those who are personally acquainted with the neighborhood.

The New State Secretary.

A new era has been inaugurated in Western Pennsylvania. For the first time in its history a man is employed to give his whole time to the work of State Secretary. Of course he will also be State Evangelist, but until after the Centennial it has been agreed by the Secretary, the Executive Committee and the Board, that he has nothing to do but assist in the Centennial preparations.

Western Pennsylvania has been greatly blessed in the men who have served as State Secretaries, while holding pastorates. The last of these has rendered this splendid service for many years. There has not only been a steady gain in offerings for mission work, but he has directly organized several congregations, and saved many others from disorganization.

The new Secretary, E. A. Hibler, whose address will be Centennial headquarters, 203 Eissell Block, Pittsburgh, is a graduate of Hiram College, from which he came to our church at Homestead. After a brief ministry there he went to Johnston, over ten years ago. His work there has been monumental. The Second Church was organized and helped into self-support, and a home of its own. The old church was strengthened and increased and put into the best church building in the city, and one of the best possessed by our people anywhere. Brother Hibler is a preacher of power, a man of God proved by fire, and an administrator who brings things to pass with unerring precision. His coming to the work at this time is a matter of importance to the entire Kingdom of God, especially since it does not involve the loss of Brother Joyce, from whose office across the hall, over 30,000 copies of the "Church of Christ" have gone into circulation, and whose ministry with our second youngest church in the Sheridan district, Pittsburgh, has been richly blessed.

Tipton, Ind., June 5, 1909. Encouraging advance continues to be made by our Sunday-school here. The average attendance upon the school for the month of May (five Sundays) was 429; average collection, $11.66.

G. I. Hoover, Minister.

PRESSED HARD

Coffee's Weight on Old Age.

When prominent men realize the injurious effects of coffee and the change in health that Postum can bring, they are glad to lend their testimony for the benefit of others.

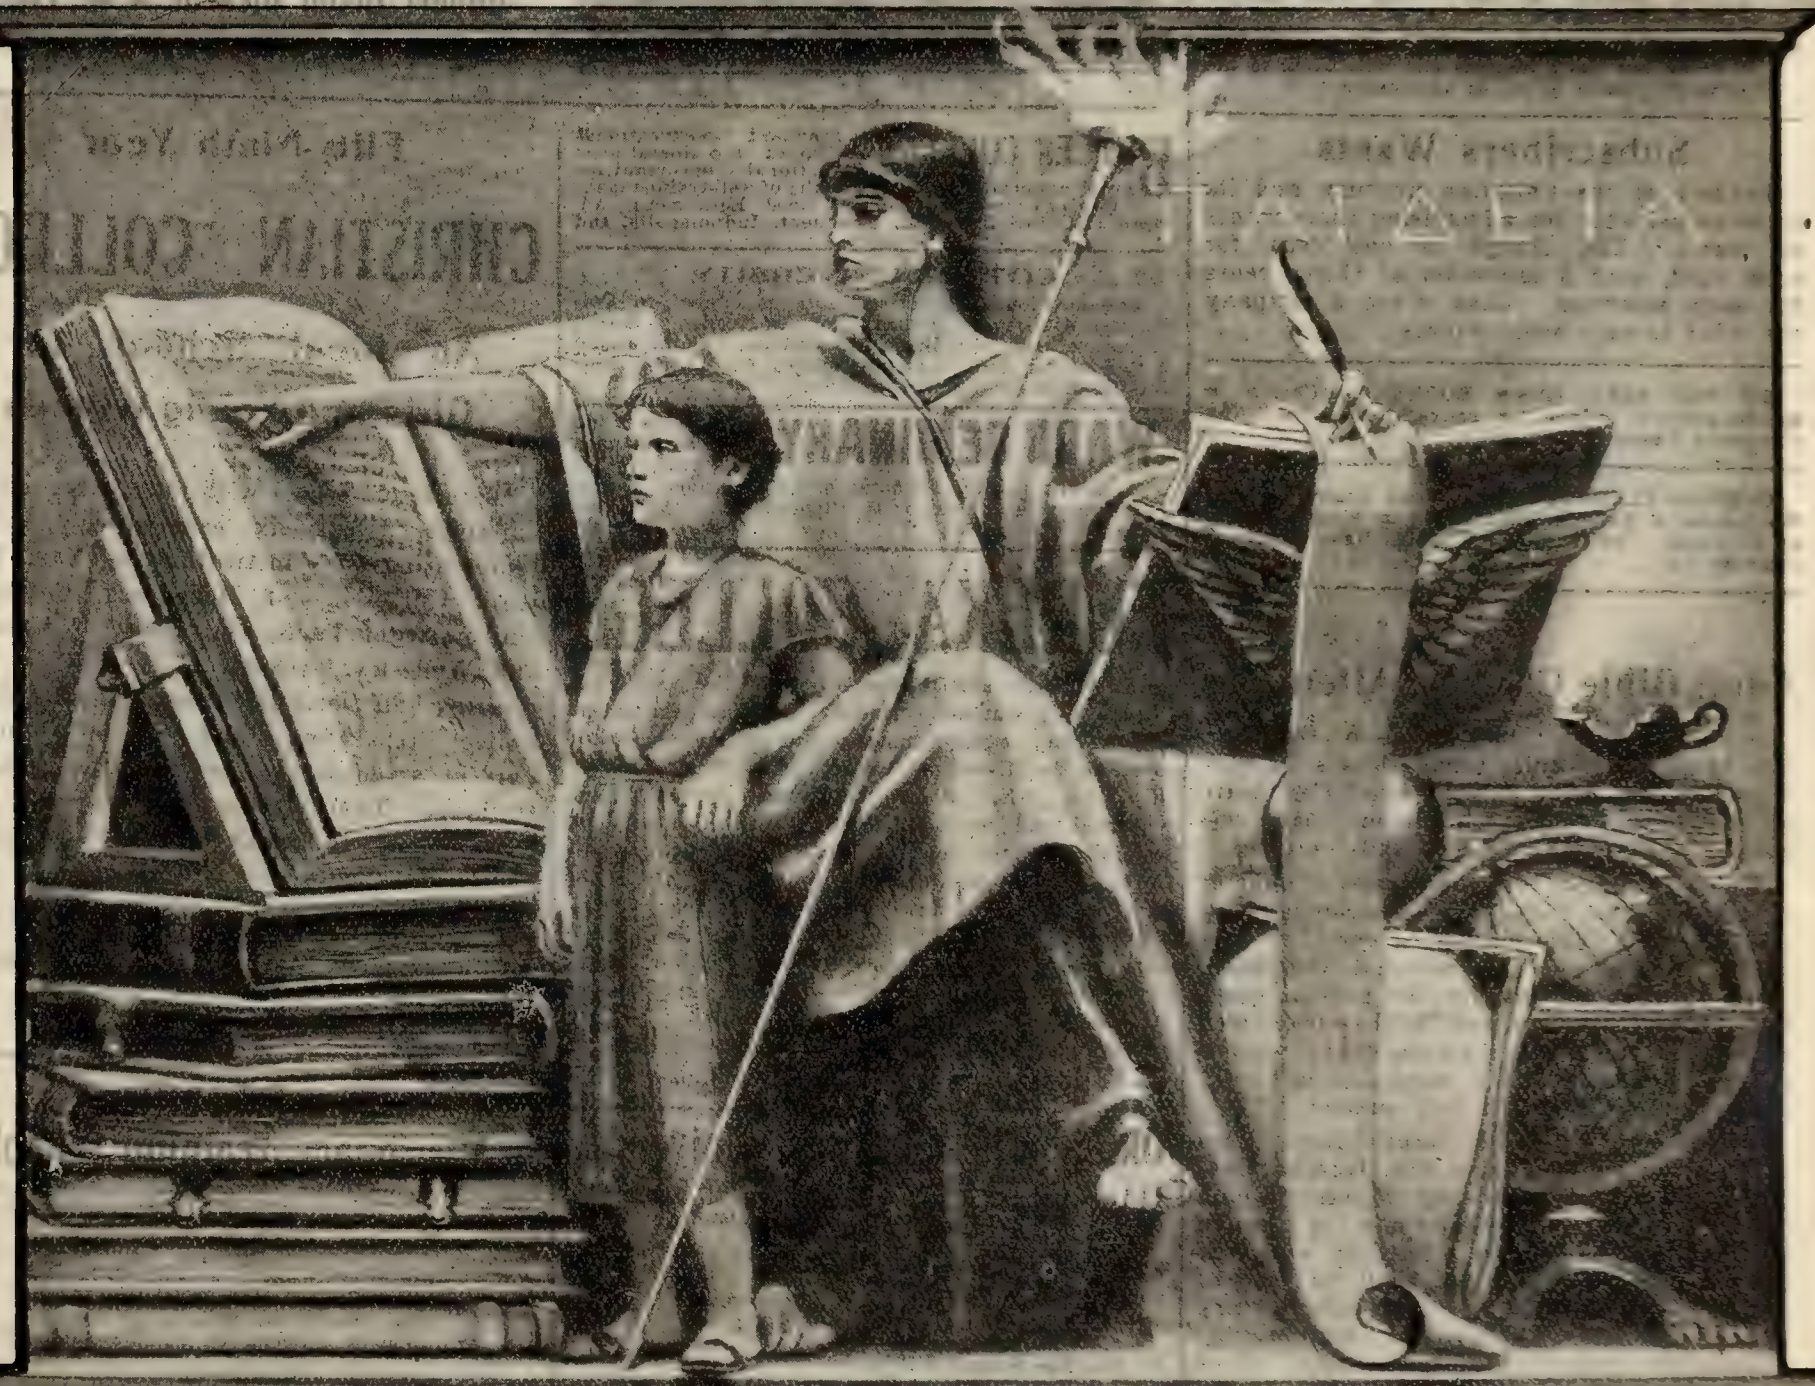
A superintendent of public schools in one of the southern states says:

"My mother, since her early childhood, was an inveterate coffee drinker, had been troubled with her heart for a number of years and complained of that 'weak all over' feeling and sick stomach.

"Some time ago I was making an official visit to a distant part of the country and took dinner with one of the merchants of the place. I noticed a somewhat peculiar flavour of the coffee, and asked him concerning it. He replied that it was Postum.

"I was so pleased with it, that after the meal was over, I bought a package to carry home with me, and had wife prepare some for the next meal. The whole family were so well pleased with it, that we discontinued coffee and used Postum entirely.

"I had really been at times very anxious concerning my mother's condition, but we noticed that after using Postum for a short time, she felt so much better than she did prior to its use, and had little trouble with her heart and no sick stomach; that the headaches were not so frequent, and her general condition much improved. This continued until she was as well and hearty as the rest of us.



"I know Postum has benefited myself and the other members of the family, but not in so marked a degree as in the case of my mother, as she was a victim of long standing." Read "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

Ever read the above letter? A new one appears from time to time. They are genuine, true, and full of human intrest.

Adult Bible Classes, Attention!

During the first three months of this year 510 organized Adult Bible classes of our schools received the International Certificate of Recognition. This enrollment made 954 classes to date, with 28,214 pupils enrolled.

The enrollment of the present quarter closed June 25. This leaves two Sundays for all our Adult Bible classes to enroll if they would receive the International Certificate of Recognition in time for the present quarter's report. All of our Bible-school men are urging this matter strongly and we are practically assured of a much larger enrollment than we reported last quarter.

Let every organized Adult Bible class which intends to receive the International Certificate make application at once through one of our state Bible-school men, or through the state superintendent of Adult work. If this is done promptly we shall be able to keep in the lead in the Bible-school work in the matter of organized Adult Bible classes.

A letter from Brother Depew gives the information that in the recent State Sunday-school convention in Illinois, the superintendent of Adult Bible classes, Mr. Miller, reported that we have more certified Adult Bible classes in Illinois than all the other Bible-schools put together.

A visit with L. L. Faris at the Ohio State convention recently indicates that enterprising men are keeping the work in Ohio far in the lead. Let us make the final rally and send in applications for certificates before June 25.

The New Education

It is safe to say that no people on earth are so greatly concerned with the task of education as the Americans. Instruction is not a new function by any means. The ancient Greeks were devoted to the practice of culture. The Romans established great universities, of which those at Alexandria and Tarsus were among the most important. The Saracens planted their universities not only at Damascus, Cairo, Bagdad and Constantinople, but in the Spanish cities of Seville, Salamanca and Grenada. But it was Christian enthusiasm for education which followed the downfall of the western Roman empire with the revival of learning, and sent schoolmasters all over Europe and planted great universities from Padua to Oxford.

Yet no people have ever been so absorbed in the work of education as our own nation. We inherit from England many elements of culture and certain ideals of public instruction. But it is safe to say that the English people do not regard education with any such universal interest as do the Americans. From Germany we derive our highest ideals of university method and thoroughness. And yet America far outstrips Germany in attention to popular education. There are some interests which arouse all our people at times, such as patriotic concern on Memorial Day, Independence Day, or at the national Thanksgiving season. Trade occupies a very large part of our population and industrial affairs engage a great army of workers. Perhaps our highest interest, that of religion, might be said to be a universal concern, and yet we know that only a part of our people are really engaged in religious activities.

But education embraces all in its wide sweep. The little child, just beginning to know the values of life, is placed in school, and only emerges, normally at least, when years of competence and discretion have been reached. Even then the work of education is not complete, for interest in the instruction of others, brothers, sisters, friends, or one's own children and later on one's grandchildren, keep this concern perennially fresh in the minds even of those who are not technically engaged in the tasks of instruction, First and last we are all of us interested in the work of education.

Nor is it strange that an activity so general and so important should develop both in extent and in content with amazing rapidity. Today we are working at what we call a "new education," which differs as radically from the intellectual disciplines of a hundred years ago as does the theology of our present time from that of the schoolmen. Modern education accepts very definitely certain principles as normative and is attempting to give them reality. Among these ideals of the new education the following are important.

Education is the work of the state and not of the church. It is true that the church has always been the patron and inspirer of public instruction. Jesus was a teacher, and Christianity has from the beginning been the interpreter of all educational values. Yet the danger of sectarianism in connection with public instruction has led the founders of our republic to regard it as better that the church should not be the immediate custodian of a child's expanding life, but that the state should exercise that wise supervision which insures competent and balanced training.

The new education insists that all the people shall have the privilege of public instruction. It is not the gift of the state to a particular class. It cannot be permitted that some of the children of the republic shall come into the possession of this, their rightful heritage, while others are secluded in mines and factories, inhibited from those rights which are their native dower. The sentiment that inspires this regulation has now registered itself so completely in the laws of the land that truancy is a diminishing factor in the life of our youth.

It is likewise one of the principles of our age that the whole of the child shall receive attention, rather than merely his mind, as the older education insisted. Today it is recognized that while the child is a unit and is not merely a collection of compartments—body, mind, and soul, as mediaeval psychology taught, yet he does manifest a variety of interests—physical, intellectual, emotional, aesthetic, ethical and religious—and that these must have balanced consideration in a valid and competent scheme of instruction. The physical welfare of children is now an imperative concern of parents and teachers, especially in great cities. The cultivation of a child's disposition, temper, tastes and appetites is perhaps quite as important as the stocking of his memory and the enlightenment of his understanding.

Again education is the result of personality and not of books. Teachers will, of course, employ text-books with wisdom and discretion. Yet teachers themselves are the primary text books of the child, and then all life around becomes a text-book. Nature, art, mechanics, industry, social relations are all laboratories in which the child is really gaining his knowledge of life. The age of mere text-books has passed away, although they will continue to be used as helps and references. It is the instructor who teaches as "one having authority and not as the scribes" with their dependence upon books, that is the best and most inspiring guide.

There is also a growing feeling that education must minister to life in its emphasis upon usable information. The retirement of the classics and other culture studies to a relatively secondary place has been one of the astonishing revolutions wrought by modern pedagogy, to the dismay of the classicists and against the protest of the mere culturists. This movement is both timely and dangerous. There are just reasons why the studies of young people should not be confined to Latin, Greek, logic, mathematics and history as was so largely the case a hundred years ago. The modern cry that education must prepare young men for active life has carried far. It has sometimes degenerated into a demand for a mere bread and butter equipment with so-called "practical" courses which are often the excuses for rather than the ideals of a true education. Without going into the details of a vexing problem, it is sufficient to say that modern education touches the earth much more definitely than did the earlier disciplines.

It is true, once more, that our modern work of education begins with the child where he really lives. It was the fault of the old pedagogy that it assumed for the child a condition which was actually unreal. It condescended to prepare his intellectual food in very small quantities, although it still insisted that that food should be of the same character as that given to an adult. Today the child is being studied in his own realm of life and this principle has revolutionized psychology and pedagogy.

The final item, the most important of all and the one beginning to receive some part of its rightful emphasis, is the moral and spiritual training of our youth. Any system of education which neglects ethics and religion cannot be complete, for these are not additional accomplishments to be regarded as electives like Spanish or painting, but are of the very essence of character. A schoolroom which is devoid of instruction, both personal and formal, on the subject of veracity, honor, chivalry, patience, heroism, brotherliness, altruism, social service, and the sense of divine realities, the consciousness of God and the fact of immortality, has certainly reached only a part of the altitude to which it should attain. It is quite true that there are many teachers who decline to subscribe to this creed. They believe that education should have nothing to do with these matters. They insist that to the parents and to the church must be left all matters of this kind. We should like to emphasize this contention to the extent of renewing the declining sense of obligation on the part of the home and church for ethical and religious instruction. But we still believe that the school, the college, the university have a part in this high task. And we are glad to notice the increasing testimony of educational experts in vindication of the same contention. No child is completely furnished for the work of life whose moral nature and spiritual capacities have been neglected; for "the soul of culture is the culture of the soul."

The Trend of Events

A FREE TRIP TO LONDON

One is allowed to bring through the customs, clothing to the amount of $100. Any one who has tried it knows he can go to London in his old clothes, buy $100 worth of clothing for his trunk and $50 worth for his person and save the price of his steamer fare from New York and return if he will go second class. He will have to buy clothing anyhow and it makes a cheap vacation.

FRIENDS OF A CAUSE, BUT NOT IN COMMON

The Liberal government in England is furthering a vast railroad merger. It will give three of the largest lines right to consolidate. The railroad companies want it because they desire to cooperate and pool advantages; the government wants it because it thinks pooling of interests inevitable and this will help it control them; the national railway employees union want it because they favor nationalization and see in this a great step forward towards it.

THE TARIFF AND OUR DAILY NEEDS

Few American consumers have any idea as to the taxes the tariff lays upon the articles they use most commonly. President Taft is committed to a "revision downward" of the tariff. He is firmly for a protective tariff, but he desires it to simply cover the "difference between labor cost here and abroad with a fair profit to the manufacturer." He made up a list of articles used by workingmen and asked the Treasury Department to give him the rates under the Dingley law and those proposed by the bills now under consideration. It shows that out of forty articles submitted, a raise is proposed on four and a cut on six, and that of the six, one is corn meal, for which there is no competition, and one is for watch movements, while the only substantial cut proposed at all is that on shoes, where it is proposed to lower the tax on a $2.50 pair from 62½c. to 37½c.

THE TAX ON OUR COATS

How many of us know what the tariff tax is on the commonest of our purchases? Here it is on clothing, as given by the Treasury Department to President Taft. In the first column is given the price we pay for the article, in the second the tariff tax:

	Retail Price.	Tariff Tax.
Men's Suits	$15.00	$10.76
Men's Overcoats	15.00	11.86
Woolen Underwear	1.00	.82
Woolen Hose	.50	.25
Cotton Hose,	Per Doz. 1.50	.82½
Women's Cloaks	15.00	9.88
Cotton Dresses	10.00	5.00
Men's Hats	2.00	.98½
Shoes	2.50	.62½

MR. HARRIMAN'S SUBLIME BENEVOLENCE

Mr. Harriman is a remarkable man. He is not, therefore, as white as snow. He is the "Transportation King" and a Prince in the House of High Finance. Here is an illustration of his subtle arts. The home offices of his great railroad lines are located at Salt Lake City. Last winter the benevolent magnate gave every member of the legislature of Utah a pass, good over all lines within the state. He arranged a week-end trip for the entire membership, in a special train of nine cars, diner attached and everything, including meals, free. When a special committee desired to make an inspection trip, accommodation for thirty on special Pullmans was provided. Of course all this benevolence had nothing but the most patriotic and impersonal of motives. The fact that Utah grants corporate and charter privileges to such as Mr. Harriman's railroad companies had no bearing upon them.

SECURING THE SAVINGS

The man who has a little is more concerned usually about keeping it than he is about risking it for the sake of large returns. Hard-earned money does not run easily into the mecurial streams of speculation. In the old countries the governments afford the sure protection needed but they cannot pay the saver more than his money is worth to the whole people, the government itself. Thus interest rates are only about two per cent.

In America we have been so blindly devoted to the idea that government should do nothing that private enterprise can do that we have been unable to change our political creed with the changed conditions that the century since Jefferson has brought. Thus the saver of a few dollars must take the risk of his banker's speculative proclivities and the chance that panics and flurries bring to the speculative stock markets. The small banks do not often deal in speculative securities, but they are tied up in the credit system with the large banks that do and thus may innocently suffer.

Oklahoma arranged a system whereby the state manages a sort of mutual insurance system for the banks. It collects a certain percentage on each bank's deposits, scrutinizes the bank's business methods and securities, just as Uncle Sam does his national banks, and insures, from the above named fund, all depositors against loss. Sixty-eight national banks have taken out charters as state banks as a result of the Attorney General of the United States' ruling they could not benefit by the state law. Now the new attorney general rules they can benefit by a private guarantee company's system and such a company will be organized. Oklahoma's State banks have doubled their deposits and three other states have adopted the idea.

EXPERT (?) TARIFF MAKING

Last September there appeared in the Annals of the American Academy of Political and Social Science, an article entitled, "Tariff Making—Fact and Theory." It was written by Mr. H. E. Miles, of Racine, Wis., vice president of the National association of Manufacturers, and chairman of Central Committee on Expert Tariff Commission. He prefaces his articles by saying he is "a protectionist, a manufacturer, and a Republican," but that he "protests against the abuse of an economic principle." Here are some other things he says:

He asked one member of the committee responsible for making the rates, "upon what underlying principle of measurement the making of rates rests." The members could think of none. Another, the man who "is personally responsible for a schedule that costs the American people from one to two million dollars per week" and he "bit his lips and walked away." The first member than said, "Why, Miles, if anyone down in my district wants anything, I get it for him, and I get all I can, and that is all there is to it." He is only a tariff horse trader.

I went with tariff data to the man most of all responsible for the present tariff situation. Said he, "Do you think we don't know? Take Senator ———, of ———, for instance. He held up the Dingley bill until we gave him and his pals a wholly unwarranted tariff on borax, worth to them over $5,000,000 in money. We had to have his vote."

Mr. Miles explains that Nevada borax is easily mined while that in England is in inferior deposits; that in England borax sells for 2½c. per pound, while in United States "it is 2½c. plus the 5c. duty, or 7½c." He adds, "This senator quickly sold the mines to an English syndicate for $12,000,000." "What he really sold," adds Mr. Miles, "was the right to tax the American people, by act of congress, 5c. per pound, or 200 per cent on its borax over and above a fair price."

GUARANTEEING PROFITS TO THE TRUSTS

Mr. Miles asserts that present tariffs guarantee profits to the trusts. He cites his own business, saying it needs a protection of from 15 to 25 per cent, but that Congress gave them 45 per cent, and adds, "In doing this it permitted, if it did not invite us, to consolidate and to add to our sales prices about 20 per cent and treble our profits, possibly quadruple them. The people can be put wholly at our mercy to the extent of the excess duty."

When the Dingley law was made steel rails were made in Pittsburg at a cost of $12 per ton and in England at a cost of $16. The freight from England was $3.50 per ton. Here Mr. Miles tells us was a "natural protection of 63 per cent." Yet the bill laid on an artificial protection of 65 per cent. The results he adds, were that "Not long after the passage of this bill steel makers, guided by Wall Street promoters, put about $1,000,000,000 of water into one corporation" and "they have transfused the wealth of the people into that watered stock, in an amount not less than $1,000,000 per week, until it has become a most substantial property."

Mr. Miles further tells how the sugar trust refused to furnish the Commission with data upon which it based demands for certain rates, yet was given only a slight cut; how the rates on textiles run from 75 to 165 per cent, while the difference in wage cost between here and England is but 9 per cent; how the glass men, writing their own rates at Mr. McKinley's request to do so and to "make it fair," put pressed glass on the free list, but were given 65 per cent nevertheless; he cites the case of a congressman from a manufacturing district who said, "My people would, I believe, spend $25,000,000 to keep the tariff where it is;" and he concludes that "Today our lawmakers ignore the rights of the consumers and the public in their service of the corporation." This is because each representative fights for the highest rate on the industry from his district and trades with all others to get it. Mr. Miles pleads for a "protective but not a prohibitive tariff."

THE VICTIM OF NERVES

Our consciences are awake to the fact of our bodies. We are beginning to believe that the animal man is worth caring for. The "Temple of the Soul" is receiving religious devotion. Physics is dividing the field with psychics. Chemistry is no longer able to claim all pathological consideration. The reign of mind is acknowledged in the world of materia medica. Christian Science gets recruits because it first cures them of their maladies. It is perfectly useless to point out its theological misconceptions and call it vile theological epithets when it cures people. It is better to try to discover the what and how of it. Its field is found to be the neurologic. What medical practice failed to discover in its devotion to its idols of material science this new "Science" has stumbled onto. Like all great, unexplainable good it becomes religious and a cult is founded on it. Now the Emmanuel Movement comes to strip it of theological mysticisms and, recognizing the humanity in it, to do the same thing in co-operation with physicians, doubting not that to heal men of their diseases is a good and religious work. And it claims to cure 75 per cent of all nervous troubles that asks its help.

Now comes the founding of a Neurological Institute in New York City. It will study this great class of neglected diseases and most prolific cause of a multitude of ailments. It is not for insane or incurable patients, neither for scientific research only. It will take the man of nerves and help him from the first and in all phases of his trouble. It will send trained social workers and nurses into the homes of distressed minds and quiet the fears and suggest ways out of imaginary difficulties and perform a pastoral act to the neuropathetic. It will use all psychic and medical means to relieve the poor victim of nerves. May the day come when the physician shall do all this. Bnt will he not need to be a Christian physician to do it?

Editorial

Professor Charles R. Henderson, of the University of Chicago, who is now in Europe, has received cable advice from the Department of State at Washington, appointing him as American member of the International Prison Commission, to succeed the late Samuel J. Barrows. It is understood that this appointment is gratifying to the representatives of the European governments on the Commission, which has in charge the arrangements for an International Prison Congress in Washington next year.

A writer in the "Survey" calls attention to the moral effects of the earthquake in southern Italy. Mr. William E. Davenport, head worker of the Italian settlement in Brooklyn, likens the case to a broken bone which in an adult means greater hurt and care than the same trouble in a child. Mr. Davenport visited Italy a month after the earthquake and was greatly impressed by the effects of the disaster on the intellectual and moral character of the sufferers. Religious superstition has gone very far in that land. The priests for the most part have used the earthquake as an object lesson upon the dangers of religious negligence. On the other hand the free thinkers have flooded the towns with circulars deriding clerical stupidity. Both errors have resulted in deepening religious unrest and perplexity. And the danger of skepticism in a people who have been taught for generations the immediate and controlling power of God in all human affairs may easily be understood. Probably such experiences furnish the best commentary upon the need of educated religious teaching and especially of a better interpretation of Christianity than today prevails in many communities.

The Christian Courier of Texas, has been printing two strong addresses delivered at the Texas Ministerial Institute this spring, dealing with the question of the Disciples' relation to other religious bodies. Rev. Edwin C. Boynton contended that logic and love and expediency demanded that a church of Disciples receive applicants for membership upon credentials from other evangelical churches without inquiry as to their form of baptism. With equal forcefulness he re-affirmed the historic position of the Disciples that, in obedience to the great Commission, our practice in receiving candidates upon confession of faith could be nothing else than immension. The basic assumption of Mr. Boynton's able paper was that our neighbor churches are churches of Christ. Rev. G. Lyle Smith's paper in review of Mr. Boynton's was equally able and logical. He takes square issue with the basic assumption of the other writer. He says,

"As appears to this writer, the whole strength of the leading paper lies in its recognition of all the religious bodies around us being Churches of Christ. This position, if allowed, seems to me to make the conclusions therein inevitable as to the reception of the non-immersed. The logic of the paper is inevitable, the position tenable, because right, that the preacher, the church, and the non-immersed individual would alike save their consciences and all be in complete consistency, if the position is once allowed that all these denominational bodies around us are, in fact and organization, Churches of Christ. The position of this review is that the sectarian societies, as such, are not Churches of Christ, but that only immersed individuals among them are in fact church members, and as such are entitled to membership in any local congregation, or Church of Christ by reason of that fact, and not at all by reason of being members in good standing within the denominational body from which they may come."

Both papers are conceived in a thoughtful temper and evince an earnest determination to know nothing but the truth, and to do nought save that which will bring most honor to Christ. Mr. Boynton put forward his rather novel view with due modesty, proposing nothing further than a fair statement of a position which he holds tentatively. That the Christian Courier should give space to the publication of articles on so sensitive a subject as this only confirms our earlier opinion that the Texas brethren have almost reached the promised land of religious toleration.

Candace of the Ethiopians

By the courtesy of the Government of the Egyptian Sudan, there has been erected in the Southern Gallery of the British Museum, in close contiguity with the Rosetta Stone, a monument of singular interest to the reader of the Acts of the Apostles, says a writer in the British Weekly. On the death of Cleopatra, thirty years before this era, Egypt was formed into a province of the Roman Empire. At that time, far away in the south, on the island of Meroe, midway between Berber and Khartoum—a duskier queen, bearing the dynastic title of Candace, ruled the Ethiopian realm.

Her first act was a counsel of prudence, that of making a treaty with the Roman prefect. But under his successor she invaded Egyptian territory, and actually put to the sword the Roman garrison in Philæ and Assuan. Although she paid dearly for her temerity, the Cæsars seem to have left the distant power very much to itself. Half a century later another Candace occupied the throne, and her opulence is attested by the fact that her treasurer in chief was able to afford the luxury of a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, in the circumstances swiftly and dramatically related by the travelled and cultivated writer of the Acts. Other Candaces followed for several generations, and their deeds are recorded upon the monuments which they left behind them in the heart of the Sudan. It is one of these monuments that may now be seen in Bloomsbury.

The custom of building resting-places for deceased sovereigns in a pyramidal form, which went out of fashion in remote ages on the Lower Nile, was revived during the first two Christian centuries in the distant kingdom of the Sudan. It is clear the Candace of the Acts, like the other Amazonian rulers of this Nubian people, was interred at her death in a majestic pyramid, replete with funerary chapels, and adorned with sculptured scenes and hieroglyphic records, after the ancient manner of Gizeh and Sakkara, round about the hoary city of Memphis, at the apex of the Delta. A sandstone relief from the south wall of one of these chapels—the identity of the queen is unknown—has been removed bodily and erected with scrupulous care in the Museum.

It depicts Candace amid every circumstance of pomp and sovereignty. Seated upon a lion throne, beneath a canopy of rich adornment she wears upon her head the national cap of the Sudan, and the characteristic apparel of tropical Africa, which may be traced in the dress of to-day, reveals the fact that in this monument a genuine attempt at local portraiture has been made. In her hands the queen holds a sceptre. At her side is seated her consort, and about her may be seen priests and courtiers, members of her own family and attendants, sharing in the ceremonial observances of the sacrifice to Osiris which marks the funerary feast. In conformity with tradition the feet of the queen rest upon captives who represent her conquests.

The Low Ebb of Religious Consciousness

Does the Present Day Church Express the Rich Possibilities of Christ's Own Christianity?

Last week we said that the outstanding weakness of the modern church is its lack of consciousness.

We have received communications asking for further explanation of what such a statement could mean. We agree that the remark does not carry with it its own interpretation and we mean to devote our space just now to making it clear.

But first let us look back and note again the main things we have considered in the last two articles.

We have been striving to make it plain that our criticism is not directed toward evangelists, as such, but toward the system or method which they use to do their work. We do not think for a moment of disputing the fact that good is done by our conventional procedure in evangelism. Despite its overt faults and vices, which all right minded men condemn, our evangelism is accomplishing much that is good.

But it is accomplishing its good at the expense of the best. The use of the typical method of revivalism eclipses the richer possibilities of Christianity in the personal life and creates a church incapable of grappling social duty with effectiveness.

Without undertaking to point out specifically what the richer and deeper possibilities of Christianity might be in personal life and social service, we were content to affirm broadly that the full meanings of faith in Christ's own experience should be possessed by his disciples. That they are not possessed even approximately by the modern church is due, we affirmed, to two causes:

First, that conventional Christianity directs its thinking toward doctrines about Christ's person rather than toward the truth upon which his life was based.

The other cause, and the one with which we have to do in our present study is that our evangelistic method, the method by which men are brought into the church, does not appeal directly to consciousness but to feeling and impulse. And the appeal to feeling and impulse which does not vitalize itself in consciousness is artificial, producing a weak church and shallow spiritual life.

Because: a church whose members are gained by appeals to feeling and impulse must continually resort to appeals of the same sort if it holds them.

All of which means that the Christianity of such a church has not homed itself in the souls of its members. Their motives and incentives lie outside themselves in the organization instead of inside the soul where Christ's motives were found.

In a word the church today lacks religious consciousness. We have benevolent feelings, we do good deeds, we practice religious ceremonies. But we do not possess the rich personal experience that Christ had because we do not see what he saw.

We resort to clever tricks for working up enthusiasm because our hearts do not have open connection with a big enough truth to create and sustain enthusiasm from within.

Like the woman of Samaria, we are continually "coming hither to draw," when all the time there is the possibility of possessing a well in the soul whose waters spring up into abiding life.

That we are truly describing the deep lack in present day religion will be testified to by every pastor who has learned to measure his success in terms of the inner life of his people rather than in terms of the outer appearances of his organization. Such a pastor is sensitively aware of the unresponsiveness of his people to the opportunities for real spiritual enrichment.

The widespread neglect of Bible study has its significance in this, that our typical church member fails to conceive his religion as rooted in his own individualized perception of spiritual truth. Else he would set himself systematically to the task of understanding the great laws that underlie the spiritual and moral life.

In the Sunday-school, too, the evidences abound that not vital instruction in the truth but something else is the thing aimed at. Big attendance, noisy enthusiasm, the club spirit in class organization,—these and other values like them absorb the endeavor of the workers so that oftimes the child is lost in the very machinery that has been devised to save him.

No more telling illustration of the unspirituality of the characteristic procedure could be pointed out than the so-called Teacher Training movement. Here was an idea pregnant with mighty possibilities.

Probably no practical proposition has been made to the church in the past century that has possessed more significance than this: that we systematically train those who are to teach religious truth to our children.

Why has this movement exhausted itself in many churches where its singular success raised both church and pastor into prominence? Why has it not rather established itself as a permanent institution and method of the church instead of an adventure or an episode in a season's program?

Manifestly the answer is that neither the leaders of the movement nor the churches conceived it as a spiritual movement, but as an institutional device. Its value lay in its size, its enthusiasm, the dramatic and game qualities of its drills and so forth. It really was a new kind of church sociable, giving people something to do, bringing them together, making them acquainted—and certainly doing them no harm.

In the selection of the textbook spiritual considerations played little part. The important questions were not, What book will put our students into possession of the truth upon which the soul of Jesus fed? and, What book will explain to them best the nature of the children to whom they are afterward to commit this truth? The important question was, What book will be the most interesting? will attract the most people? will lend itself most cleverly to dramatic pedagogy? will hold the class together until the term is finished?

There is nothing wrong in these questions. But they are not the big questions. They betray the point of view to be institutional, not spiritual, the point of view of an administrator, not of a teacher; of an ecclesiastic, not of a prophet.

Yet a further illustration of the lack of religious consciousness in the present day church is found in that modest little service called the prayer meeting.

Ideally this is one of the most characteristic institutions of a church of Christ's disciples. Democracy, social intimacy, informality, earnestness, studiousness, communion with God—all these enter into the ideal conception of the prayer meeting.

The prayer meeting brings souls together in the freemasonry of faith. It is big with blessing for every one who enters it in the true spirit.

If we had no such institution and some one should propose it, it would captivate the imagination of the church instantly as an institution of the first importance.

Think of it, Christian people would say, think of the uplift and enrichment of soul to be had by getting together in the midst of the week and telling one another the things of the heart!

We need one another in faith as well as in service. Therefore, how beautiful it will be to meet upon the common level of Christian experience to encourage and to get courage in communication with those of like faith and like failures with ourselves. Ideally the prayer meeting is the typical church meeting.

But actually it is the withered arm of the church organism. It is attended by a handful who go through loyalty rather than for profit. Its speeches are reluctant and trite. Its prayers are confined to the few. The meeting lacks eagerness, expectancy, thoughtfulness, spiritual awareness.

In a word, the prayer-meeting is an outstanding proof that the fundamental lack of the present day church is religious consciousness. No mentality goes into it.

There are exceptions to this description, we gratefully concede, but all will agree that our words fit the general state of things accurately.

Now we believe that to modern successful revivalism is to be traced the responsibility for the low ebb of spiritual consciousness in the present day church. This will contradict the conceptions of many at the very root. For our accustomed recourse in a local church whose spiritual vitality has run low is to get up a revival.

Our thesis is that the church has habituated itself to revivalistic standards and methods so long that it has been rendered incapable of the finer spirituality that flows from a steady perception of Christian truth.

We shall have to cut our study short just here and resume it at this point next week.

"In everything give thanks" is an injunction that can be obeyed as long as in everything and everywhere we retain a sense of the unchanged love of God. The joy of this religion is guaranteed perpetually to the trusting soul by every gracious attribute of Him whose mercy endureth forever.—Selected.

Mary Elizabeth Willett

Mrs. Mary E. Willett, beloved mother of Professor Herbert L. Willett, passed to her reward Thursday, June 17, 1909, after an illness of more than three months. She had rounded out her three score years and ten, possessing up to her last illness all her faculties in remarkable strength and lucidity. She was the mother of four sons, of whom the three growing to manhood gave themselves, in answer to her prayer, to the ministry. Of these the two younger had no sooner put their hands to their life-task than their life was cut off. Bereft of her husband eleven years ago, Mother Willett has since made her home with her eldest son in Chicago where her wise and gracious and youthful nature has more than compensated the tender regard in which she was ever considered. She had been a member of the Hyde Park Church of Disciples until a year ago, when she transferred her membership to the Memorial Church, of which her son is minister. A charter member of the church of Disciples in Ionia, Michigan, she came under the gracious influence of the ideals and personality of Isaac Errett in the temper of whose faith she strove ever to live and to rear her children. A simple service was conducted at the residence on Saturday, June 19, by Dr. Errett Gates, assisted by Dr. E. S. Ames, of the Hyde Park Church and Dr. R. N. Van Doren, Associate Pastor of Memorial Church. Interment was made at Ionia, Michigan. C. C. M.

The Visitor

The June season is not only sacred to weddings and brides but also to graduating occasions. That venerable misnomer "commencement day" still prevails as the accepted designation of the closing event in the school year. If it were understood that originally degrees were conferred in connection with the opening of the following academic year rather than at the close of the current one, less confusion would be produced in the mind of one to whom the term seems wholly inappropriate.

The Visitor has recently had the opportunity of attending a number of these school events. Some of them were high school graduating exercises, others were college commencements. It is a delightful and gratifying sight to look upon a company of eager, enthusiastic and happy students completing with credit the work which for four years they have been busily accomplishing. The occasion is always replete with significance. Parents, friends, sweethearts are the witnesses of the happy event. Flowers, diplomas, gifts are everywhere in evidence. It is like a fresh sailing of the Argo in search of the Golden Fleece. The Visitor has watched with a good deal of interest the proportion of boys and girls respectively in these graduating classes. It is generally the case that girls are more numerous. This is perhaps due to the lure of life and business which calls many a boy away from the class-room when he is only partly through his studies. Parents seem to be less interested in seeing a boy finish his school work, perhaps because he is somewhat earlier capable of sharing in the production of a family income. The result is seen in the preponderance of women in college and even in many of the universities.

It is always a pleasure to meet the local Disciples on occasions when commencement duties bring the Visitor to cities where we have churches; and where, in such states as Missouri, could there be found a town in which the Disciples are not represented? On one recent trip, Louisiana, Hannibal, and Maryville were visited and the condition of our churches in thoses places was noted as vigorous and aggressive. At Hannibal, where Levi Marshall has been the pastor for more than twelve years, a new church has just been erected in the most growing and promising section of the city and a pastor installed. This strengthening of the cause by the increase of needed churches is an example worthy of imitation. It is true, of course, that not in every place is there room for new churches of our own order without undue encroachment upon the work of our brethren of other communions. The spirit of union must lead us to a careful study of the field before any work of this kind is undertaken. But where there is genuine virgin soil and an open door, there is every reason for satisfaction in the increase of our churches.

A recent visit to Kansas City was the occasion for a delightful gathering at the South Prospect Church, where Bro. Donaldson is the pastor. The preachers of Kansas City and vicinity gather occasionally for a dinner followed by toasts and an address. On this occasion a splendid group of Disciples, including a number of ministers' wives, was present. Such patriarchs as T. P. Haley, W. T. Moore, and Professor Monser were there, and many younger men—the leaders in the Christian work of that portion of the state. Such fellowship is an inspiration to all who share it. With such men as Richardson, Jenkins and Combs in the leading pulpits, such oversight as the veterans of the cause in that region can afford and such activity as the churches manifest, there is every reason to believe that much greater things are in store for Kansas City Disciples than the past has known.

A lecture at the Linnwood Boulevard Church afforded an opportunity of seeing the plans for the completion of the fine edifice, now well under way. The building will be a splendid structure of stone, whose auditorium will compare favorably with anything in the brotherhood. The congregation has for several years worshipped in the lecture room, but expects to be in possession of the upper floor in the autumn. Kansas City has some generous givers, at whose head stands R. A. Long, the patron of every good cause among us. But his example has been followed by others in that city and with the happiest results. On a recent Sunday Mr. Long announced a conditional gift of $50,000 for a new Sunday-school building for the Independence Boulevard Church. James Small has preached for this congregation during the absence of Dr. Combs, who is now on his way home from his European journey.

Another sort of commencement was that at Lawrence, the seat of the University of Kansas. This vigorous young institution, splendidly located on a commanding eminence just outside the city, is rapidly increasing its equipment as well as its student list. Under the aggressive leadership of Chancellor Strong the University has taken its place among the best of the state institutions. Two laboratories are now under way and others have been recently completed. The baccalaureate service was held in the gymnasium, which seats comfortably more than two thousand persons, and the city churches of Lawrence manifested their interest in the occasion by closing their services for that evening. The Bible Chair work, which Professor W. C. Payne has built up to such admirable proportions, is becoming a genuine power in the University life. The members of the faculty hold Professor Payne and his work in high esteem. 225 students were enrolled in the courses offered by Professor and Mrs. Payne during the past year. The Bible Chair building, which is both a residence and a class-room structure, is a fitting addition to the group of structures on the University height. Professor Payne is being called out for an increasing amount of biblical lecture work, as his merits in this field are known. The Christian Church in Lawrence, of which Bro. Milton is the pastor, is in possession of a handsome edifice recently completed at a cost of $40,000. The Disciples may well be proud of their representation in that growing educational center of the Sun-flower State.

Do—Say

Two brothers once lived down this way,
And one was Do and one was Say.
If streets were dirty, taxes high,
Or schools too crowded, Say would cry
"Lord! what a town!" but Brother Do
Would set to work to make things new.

And while Do worked, Say would cry:
"He does it wrong. I know that I Could do it right." So all the day
Was heard the clack of Brother Say.
But this one fact from none was hid,
Say always talked, Do always did.

"Out as Far as Bethany"

By O. H. Philips

Early Saturday morning, June 12, 1909, a party of us slipped away from smoky Pittsburgh to visit the site of the Brush Run Church, and go on as far as Bethany. The party consisted of W. R. Warren, W. H. Hanna, J. D. Dabney, C. L. Thurgood and wife, J. C. Crawford and wife, J. A. Joyce and wife, Geo. W. Knepper Thos. Hughes, F. A. Wight, Edwin Errett, Roger Addy, Wallace Tharp and O. H. Philips. E. A. Cole and R. G. White joined us at West Middletown, and Mrs. J. A. Armstrong of Solon, Ohio, and Mrs. Camille Hupp of West Alexander, met us down at the Buffalo, where we ate our dinner. The day was selected because it was the ninety-seventh anniversary of the baptizing of the Campbells.

Our first stop was made at West Middletown, a quiet town situated on a high hill. Here we met John Davis France and his most estimable wife, who keep a hotel here, and who very kindly refreshed a few of us who were unlucky enough to start without breakfast. While we rested here, Mrs. Cotton, age 87 years, and Mrs. Stewart, age 84 years, entertained us by very pleasing reminiscences of the early days. Both had heard Campbell preach, and Mrs. Cotton reproduced in a splendid way a sermon that Alexander Campbell had preached on the Tabernacle. When questioned it was found that she remembered the message, but could recall very little concerning the messenger. One thing she did affirm, that Alexander Campbell was a very much misrepresented man.

From the hotel we went down to the frame stable now owned by a colored man whose name is John H. Kelly. This building contains the timbers of the old Brush Run church building, and judging from the rough-hewed timbers 6 by 4, and the broad upright boards, it was by no means a handsome building, and when filled would not have contained more than a hundred people. Still, as rough as it appears, we all felt that it should be secured by our brethren and removed to Bethany and there be used to house relics of the first days.

Seventeen of us stood on the site of the old Brush Run building just two miles out from West Middleton. Our feet rested upon the hard limestone foundation, the foundation suggestive of the convictions of the Irish folk that entered the homely frame building that rested here almost a hundred years ago. With bared heads we listened to the earnest prayer of our aged brother, R. G. White, after singing "Blest Be the Tie that Binds." Above us the deep blue sky flecked with light summer clouds. From the leafy depths of the woods around us could be heard the song of care-free birds. Ever and anon the bleating of sheep was wafted across an adjacent field. All else, how still. Century oaks looked at us curiously and whispered to their mates, but not even our nature-loving Brother Knepper could persuade them to tell the story of that long past. Most silent of all was that oak tree where the youthful Campbell one morning in September, 1810, uttered a prophetic message from the text. "Though thy beginnings be small, yet shall thy latter end greatly increase." What a man this Alexander Campbell was, anyway? By faith lifting a corner of the curtain of coming days and telling the few folk gathered there, that after a while there would be a multitude.

We picnicked down by the Buffalo, and abandoned ourselves to the joy of the occasion. Then we went to the scene of the baptizing of the Campbells. Where the old Buffalo flows around a corner and moves at right angles toward the narrow roadway, right in the line of three great trees, is the place in the stream where the seven candidates were buried with Christ by baptism into his death and rose to walk in newness of life. Two of these were Thomas and Alexander Campbell. As we stood in the hot sun on this the 97th anniversary day, and looked into the quiet stream, we felt encompassed about by witnesses. Many a one had we buried in other waters with many looking on, but this natural baptistry had a glory all its own. For both of these men, and the others, went beneath the baptismal waters rather to fulfill a "Thus saith the Lord" than to confess their sins. For this reason there seemed to us a Jordanic sacredness at this quiet spot.

Our pilgrimage ended at Bethany. Wrenched and twisted by the rough roads we came to rest a bit in the quiet God's acre where so many of the Pioneers lie. There are the graves of the Campbells, the Pendletons, Trible, Richardson, and many more, and their works do follow after them. We all felt as our leal Brother Tharp that as far as true men can make ground holy, this little cemetery is a sacred spot. And why not? Is there not a sacredness inhering in men who never falter in a great trust, and do not the very places where they toiled, and finally rest, take on something of the sacredness of the men? So we rested awhile in this quiet place, and let our minds run back over the history of these splendid pioneers who built perhaps wiser than they knew. And then too we thought of that greater One who, after a toilsome day, came to another Bethany and rested his tired head on the pillow of kindly affection in the supreme Bethany home. And for the nonce we forgot all our light talk while thoughts too deep for words filled our souls.

What a fitting place for the long slumber. Just below the homestead where Alexander Campbell breathed out his last. Nearby the little study never meant for the lover of ease, but the worker, the hard worker. Its very angularity suggests the man who rough-hewed great thoughts, who hadn't time for the niceties of rhetorical finish, but who poured out great sentences pregnant with thought, satisfied when they were understood while he left the less virile thinkers the work of polishing.

Not far from this study, hidden among the leafy trees is the village of Bethany. Above all, like some stern monastery rises the stately buildings of the college, a great monument to the far-seeing leaders of this movement. Never finely equipped, and always wrestling with the problem of finance, yet the lordliest minds of the restoration had their lips touched by the live coal from off God's altar, and went out as mighty evangelists of a great plea. Hundreds, poor in this world's goods, skimping their way through, were touched by the fine personalities of the class rooms, and above all, by the masterful spirit of Alexander Campbell, and went out as new men, bearing with them a nameless something that no other schools among us have been able to give.

We came back to Pittsburgh late that Saturday, but we had all been baptized in the running stream of sacred memories. Our Brother Knepper found the atmosphere, our Brother Tharp was touched by the holiness of holy men, and our Brother Thurgood gathered something out of all the contemporaneous things that he found along the way, and we all voted it a day long to be remembered.

And those who are coming down to the Centennial in October will get a preparation for it by slipping down a day or two earlier and running over the paths our fathers trod, and going out as far as Bethany.

Views of Life

By George A. Campbell

GEORGE MEREDITH.

George Meredith is gone. The dean of Westminster would not allow him to be buried in the abbey with the nation's great.

At the time of his death he was easily the first literary man in England. Few novelists have surpassed him in any age. His analyses of human character are scarcely equalled.

How fine his treatment of "The Egotist." He was great enough and good enough to have rested with England's great in Westminster abbey.

He stood for an ideal during his entire literary career. He was long in reaching recognition. His style was involved. But through all his struggles he never threw a sop to win the plaudits of the crowd. He did not buy his way to fame; he earned it. He never said "Give the people what they want." That principle or lack of principle has led to our irresponsible journalism and cheap literature of the day. He patiently wrote and calmly waited. What a splendid example to our age! We sorely need men of ideals and men who can hold them without rewards and in the face of clamoring opposition. His view of life was wholesome, clean and confident. It would have been a worthy tribute to a noble, great and staunch man if the dean had allowed the burial to take place in Westminster.

But perhaps it little matters; for neither his reputation nor his influence can be affected much by the decision of any functionary.

"SOME NEW LITERARY VALUATIONS."

The literary world today is divided into those that are for and those that are against Tolstoy. So when I saw that William Cleaver Wilkinson had a chapter, in his recent book, "Some New Literary Valuations," on the great Russian, I turned at once to see whether he was for or against. He votes affirmatively with the enthusiasm of a party politician. I said the literary world was divided into the two opening camps. Indeed, so are the religious and economic worlds. Surely it would not be exaggeration to say that Tolstoy is the dean of the world's living authors.

Dr. Wilkinson regards him as the greatest novelist that has written with a great moral passion. In him he sees the realist and idealist beautifully and strongly blended. He thinks him sincere, earnest, artistic and possessing a great "quantity of power." While Goethe was the great egoist, Tolstoy stands for the unselfish life.

The author contends that his practical judgment is unerring; but thinks his speculative judgment is faulty. This is the only criticism that the book passes upon the writer of "War and Peace."

Our ex-President, who now hunts God's beasts of the forest, recently said that the reason why the Russian government did not suppress Tolstoy was that he was so impractical. Dr. Wilkinson thinks Russia dare not molest him because he is a world-voice and a world-force. Chesterton says that the ideas of Tolstoy, which are those of Jesus, could be lived if we all had more humor and more pluck.

It is popular to call Tolstoy a pessimist. Indeed, it is quite the thing with some to call every man who has a vision of something better than we have at present, a pessimist. Buchanan has voiced the street censure of Tolstoy in these rather ingenious lines:

"There's Tolstoy, towering in his place
O'er all the rest by head and shoulders,
No sunshine on that noble face
Which nature meant to charm beholders!
Mad with his self-made martyr shirt,
Obscene, through hatred of obsceneness,
He from a pulpit built of dirt
Shrieks his Apocalypse of cleanness."

The author relates that when George Kennan visited Tolstoy he had spent the morning in spreading manure on the farm of a poor peasant widow. I heard Miss Jane Addams tell how Tolstoy led her to resolve to do some physical labor every day. The simplicity with which the great man lives preaches mightily to our luxurious age.

Dr. Wilkinson is for Tolstoy. That is enough to say to the wise. The book contains other essays on Howells, Matthew Arnold, Tennyson, Stedman, and John Morely as critic of Voltaire and Diderot. (New York: Funk and Wagnalls. 1908. $1.50.)

"SOME MEMORIES."

"Some Memories," by the late Robert Collyer, have in them a most heartening atmosphere. Collyer was a big hearted man's man. He toiled by the sweat of his brow up to the pulpit. The story of this man, or any man, who was called from the anvil to an active and influential city pulpit is worth reading. Collyer had the face of a preacher and the heart of a saint, a happy combination. He started a Methodist in England; but a member, a shoemaker, after hearing one of his first efforts, said to him, "I think thou will never make a preacher like what we want. Thou wants to reason over much and that will never do. We want our preachers to preach from the heart, not from the head; to say, 'Thus saith the Lord' and be sure about it. Thy preaching may do for some folks, but it wi' not do for us." Accordingly, he found his way to the Unitarians; but he never ceased to keep in touch with his Methodist friends of early days, from whom he ever thought he got his true ordination to preach.

The book is of the chatty sort. The humor of the blacksmith-preacher appears on almost every page; also the pathos. In the Introduction occurs this happy parry between father and son. The small son after turning over a sermon manuscript of his father, addressed the latter thus, "Papa, do you write your sermons by what you call inspiration?" The father answered, "I hope so, my son"; and at once the boy replied, "Why, then, do you cross so much out?"

Mr. Collyer admits that he had not the mother wit to answer.

In his Chicago pastorate, Mr. Collyer wielded an influence of great good. He was recognized as a vital personality struggling for the young city's upbuilding. He built a noble church edifice and rebuilt it after the fire, by his untiring and commanding influence. Many may not know that the corner stone of this church was brought from Geneva, the scene of Servetus' burning.

There are some memories of the civil war that are good. Once he and the great evangelist, Moody, clashed before an audience of soldiers in their representations of the character of God. A deep feeling of reverence pervades the book. (Boston: American Unitarian Society, 1909. $1.25.)

What the Colleges are Doing

Commencement Festivities, Reviews of Past, and Prospects for Coming Year

Hiram College

A brief review of the year's work at Hiram may interest the readers of the Christian Century. Analyzing the progress made, perhaps the most important fact is the successful issue of the campaign for $100,000 new endowment. While not adequate for present needs, to say nothing of opportunities of enlargement, it constitutes the best possible pledge of the future growth and prosperity of the college.

The year has also shown the phenomenal increase in actual attendance of fifty students per term. A larger proportion of the students than usual are enrolled in the college proper. The new catalog lists ninety-seven Freshmen, twenty-five more than shown by any previous catalog.

The Wharton Memorial Home for the establishment of which the College and the Foreign Society are co-operating, has made excellent progress. A suitable building with fine grounds has been secured, and the Home will be opened October 1. The children of our foreign missionaries will here find home and care during the period when they must be in this country for the sake of education amid Christian surroundings.

Courses have been materially strengthened. The preparatory course has been lengthened to four years. The college now meets in every particular the educational requirements of the Ohio College Association, the National Education Association, and the Carnegie Foundation for the Advancement of Teaching.

The adoption of the new course in Missions under the direction of Prof. Charles T. Paul makes a most important forward step in missionary preparation among the Disciples of Christ. The course will be inaugurated with the college year 1909-10. It is based on correct principles and embodies the best thought of the missionary world today. The course will include: a study of phonetics, fundamental to all language study, and elementary courses in the languages of a number of the principal mission fields; a course in elementary medical practice for missionaries, including a study of tropical diseases with a view both to their prevention and cure; courses in anthropology, comparative religions, and the geography, history and science of missions; and the study of special missionary problems.

In conclusion, Hiram is looking with confidence to the future. There is reason to expect within a few years large addition to her material resources and an increase in attendance for which it will tax the ability of the college and town to provide; enlargement and strengthening of courses and increase of equipment in realization of the announced policy of President Bates "to set and maintain educational standards equal to those of the best institutions of our country; and a corresponding increase in the moral and spiritual assets of the college, which shall enable her to be in ever increasing measure a factor in the progress of the Kingdom of God." J. O. Newcomb.

Hamilton College

The fortieth annual session of Hamilton College closed on May 26, having during the year a full enrollment of students from all over the middle-West and South. Commencement week was a splendid close to a good year's work. The baccalaureate sermon was preached by the Reverend Vernon Stauffer of Angola, Indiana, at the Broadway Christian Church. The music, including the processional, the solo, quartet and chorus work, was given by the students, under the direction of the faculty of music. The Commencement address, upon the theme "Vision and Service," was given by Dr. Edward L. Powell, of Louisville. The Home-coming of the Alumnae gave an added tone of joy to the season, a very large per cent of Hamilton's 653 alumnae having come to spend a few days as the guests of their Alma Mater. Among the numerous notable social events connected therewith, were the lawn fete given by Mr. and Mrs. Joseph W. Porter, the banquet given by the local alumnae association, and the reception given by Mrs. St.-Clair, the retiring President of the College.

In the retirement, there was a unique blending of the sadness of farewell and the gladness of an ovation, given her in appreciation of the most excellent work she had done. The presentation of loving cups and other memorials were numerous, and yet were but the outward attempt to express the real admiration which all Lexington holds for the woman whose service has meant so much to the city.

She leaves to resume the presidency of Christian College in Columbia, Mo. Nothing but a sense of duty caused her to sever relations that were so delightful. She has won many friends and her departure is deeply and sincerely regretted not only in college circles but in social as well. Her activities were not confined to her work in the college, but were graciously dispensed in the praiseworthy efforts of women's clubs for the culture and elevation of the community in general. No tribute was ever paid more genuinely or deservedly than the resolutions passed unanimously and subscribed to by each of the trustees of the college:

"The relation of the Board of trustees of Hamilton College, Lexington, Ky., with its retiring president, Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair, who has for the past six years, so ably and satisfactorily discharged her responsible duties has been unmarred by a single dissonant note. Her leadership has been so wise, her ideals of our standard of scholarship and the improvement of our buildings and grounds, as well as in the splendid literary and Christian attainment of the young women who have been under her care, all conspire to cause deep and sincere regret because we can no longer retain her as presiding officer of her alma mater whose call she answered at a time so critical in its history as to need a progressive and wise leader. Therefore be it Resolved: First: That we unanimously testify our sense of deep regret that she leaves us to resume the presidency of Christian College to which her sense of duty takes her.

Second: That we bear our testimony to her superior ability as a teacher, her splendid character as a woman and her blameless life as a Christian.

Third: That we acknowledge the debt of gratitude justly due her for placing our college on the high plane of scholarship which it has now attained, and for the enlargement and adornment of our buildings and grounds, chiefly the result of her unselfish devotion.

Fourth: That a copy of these resolutions engrossed be presented her and that they be entered upon our records as a testimonial of our appreciation on this the fifth day of May, ninteen hundred nine.

Mrs. St. Clair's successor is Hubert Gibson Shearin, A. M., Ph. D., a Yale man, having received the doctorate in 1902. After a term of study in England and Europe, he accepted the professorship of English in Transylvania University, a portion of which work he will retain in addition to his new administrative duties as the head of Hamilton College. During the past four years he has found time to contribute work of literary and critical character to such journals as The Archive, of Berlin; Anglia, of Leipzig; The English Review, of England; Modern Language Notes, of Baltimore; The Journal of Philology, Putnam's Monthly, etc. He is also a member of the editorial staff of the Library of Southern Literature and of the New Wordsworth Concordance. He is a member of the Academy of Sciences, Arts and Letters, of the Modern Language Association and of the Filson Club for historical research.

The faculty of Hamilton College consists of twenty-five members chosen from the best Universities of America and Europe, such as Vassar, Yale, Wellesley, Berlin, Leipzig, Chicago, Munich, Columbia, etc. The courses of study have been gradually raised during the past few years until it is now fully abreast of the educational movement of the times. Its curriculum is strictly standardized, since its requirements for admission and for completion, are so adjusted as to lead up to various stages of advanced university work. The opening within the past year of the new Carnegie Hall of Science, erected at a cost of $60,000, offers unsurpassed facilities for full and symmetrical training.

In all, the policy pursued by the trustees in seeing to it that every cent of the income from various sources remains within the College to strengthen and enlarge its equipment and teaching force, is bringing a natural harvest of prosperity and progress. The unalloyed success of the past is an earnest for the continued success of the future.

The Bible College of Missouri

This young institution has completed twelve years of its history. As colleges go among us its progress has been rapid. For some time after the inauguration of the work it was looked upon as a somewhat doubtful experiment. Time has amply justified the expectation of those who from the beginning had faith in the possibilities of Biblical and Theological learning in affiliation with our state schools. In the one dozen years of its life the Bible College of Missouri can point to the following results.

1. Approximately 2000 students have received instruction within its class-rooms and have gained more reasonable and satisfying views of the Bible and of the Christian religion than they would otherwise have had. Hundreds of these young people will become efficient workers in the Sunday-schools, church officers and leaders of moral and religious life in their various communities. They have been forever rendered immune to any superficial attacks upon their Christian faith by reason of the fact that they have been taught to distinguish the forms of the religious life and faith from its eternal substance. This is missionary work done in the most strategic of all fields.

2. The College has given six missionaries to the foreign work and twelve others are under pledge or appointment. The missionary enthusiasm is always burning here. This is due partly to the influence of the college itself upon its students and partly to the strong missionary zeal of the Christian Associations of the University of Missouri in which our students are active workers.

3. Forty men who have received instruction in the Bible College are ministers in our homeland and are actively supporting all our co-operative enterprises.

4. There were in the College last year twenty-four ministerial and missionary students. The former are all engaged, with few exceptions, in pastoral and evangelistic work with the churches of the surrounding country, as their studies will permit, and have done acceptable work. There has always been a larger demand for efficient student preaching than the school has been able to supply. In several instances strong young men have been induced through their study of the Scriptures and their contact with Bible College Instructors and students, to give themselves to the Christian ministry. The universities will become more and more the best recruiting ground for the ministry as such institutions as the Bible College multiply and grow strong in faculty and resources.

The attitude of the University of Missouri toward our work is wholly favorable. This is evinced by the liberal interchange of credits which is allowed. In this regard the Bible College is put upon practically the same basis as the other professional schools. A student in the university can elect nine hours of work in the Bible College for which he will receive credit toward his A. B. degree. The continued friendliness of the university is conditioned only upon the maintenance in the Bible College of high standards of scholarship and efficiency of instruction.

In order to embrace the great opportunities which are here open to us it is imperative that we at once increase our resources. We now have only two endowed chairs and these not adequately. We need four instructors at once, and without them the work will suffer. Bro. Long of Kansas City, who is president of our Board, has offered conditionally to give $50,000. The condition is that the rest of the state of Missouri give a like amount. Our hopes are pinned to the accomplishment of this endeavor, now under way, to meet Bro. Long's proposition. We have faith that it will be done. We appeal to the brethren all over the state to receive Bro. Edwards, the Bible College representative, and to help him in his great and vital work. It is the day of large things for us in Missouri if we fail not through unbelief.

Charles M. Sharpe, Acting Dean.

Disciples' Divinity House

The total number of Disciples in the Divinity School of the University during the year that has just closed aggregated twenty-nine. Of this number, three completed the full course and received the B. D. degree. These were W. D. Endres, H. M. Garn and C. R. Walford. W. S. Lockhart received the A. M. degree.

One of our number, E. A. Henry, spent the year in study in Jerusalem.

No special effort was made to increase the endowment, so that the financial condition remains as it was at the beginning of the year. The adjustment of income to expenditure is such that no current indebtedness is allowed to accumulate.

One course of study in the history or doctrines of the Disciples is offered each quarter during the year, but it is optional with the student whether it is taken or not. One course on "The History and Principles of Christian Union" was given during the year by Dr. Gates. Other courses were given by Dr. Willett in the department of Old Testament Language and Literature, and by Dr. Gates in the department of Church History.

The outlook for an increased attendance of Disciples in the Divinity School during the Summer is encouraging. The Summer Quarter opens Monday, June 21.

Butler College

The fifty-fourth annual commencement of Butler College marked a forward step in the history of the institution. Two years ago pledges for the endowment fund amounting to a little over $250,000.00 were taken in a strenuous campaign participated in by many friends of the college. One hundred thousand dollars in comparatively small pledges was received in order to meet the conditions on which Messrs. Irwin, Reeves and Carnegie were to make up the balance of a quarter million.

The recent panic has made the collection of these pledges a slow and arduous task; but on the morning of commencement day President Howe was able to announce that the $100,000.00 was in the bank; that Messrs. Irwin and Reeves had already paid in their pledges; and that Mr. Carnegie would make up the balance as soon as the formal exhibition of the securities on hand could be made to his business agent.

President Howe added that the faculty and trustees were by no means content with the present endowment; but that it was their purpose to push forward until the resources of the college should reach at least a million dollars. He also announced a change in the form of organization of the college, whereby instead of a stock company, its board of trustees shall become a self perpetuating body in conformity with the requirements of the Carnegie Foundation. One of the advantages thus to be gained is the pensioning of retired members of the faculty who have taught the required number of years.

Nineteen young men and women received the degree of Bachelor of Arts and the M. A. degree was conferred on W. D. Willoughby and C M. Burkhart, both able young ministers. Three also of those to receive the batchelor's degree were ministerial students. The commencement address by Prof. James R. Angell of the University of Chicago was unusual in its simplicity and directness. Prof. Angell has a brisk, frank, conversational style that quite wins the hearts of his audience, as well as it holds their attention.

The subject of his address was "Mental Hygiene." Prof. Angell took the position that the various mental healing movements owed their vogue to a lack of knowledge of right mental life on the part of a large majority of the community. He said that the valuable principle in all of these movements was the winning of the patient's attention from self to some vital outside principle. He said that the need of mental health was more real today than that of physical perfection, because it was less recognized. The way to overcome hypochondria, excessive irritability and various mental disorders, according to Prof. Angell, is to get some strong objective interest outside of self. This is to be more than mere unselfishness. It must be a vigorous and positive effort to contribute to the welfare of society. Such an interest in life is the best possession any man or woman can enjoy; and the speaker closed by wishing each graduate a full measure of the right purpose in life.

The past year has been marked by the best attendance in the history of the College. Including the Summer School, 507 different pupils have been enrolled. This with the greatly increased endowment and the vigorous and popular administration of President Howe promises much for the future of Butler.

Drake University

The twenty-seventh year of the history of Drake University closed with the annual commencement exercises June 16. The year has been one of the best in the history of the school. At the opening of the year the new library was ready for use, thus making possible more satisfactory work than ever before in all department of the school. Kerp Medical College, one of the oldest medical schools in the Mississippi Valley, has voluntarily become a part of the University and has removed to Des Moines. The great University Church auditorium, completed in May, makes possible gatherings of the friends of the university on special occasions in more satisfactory manner than in the past.

The faculty has been enlarged and strengthened and at least one member, Professor D. W. Morehouse, head of the department of astronomy, has won for himself world-wide recognition through the discovery of the Morehouse comet last August.

The student body has been larger than ever before, there being a total enrollment of more than eighteen hundred different students, with a total of more than 350 graduates from all departments for the year. The commencement days were most happy days, filled with the usual festivities of such occasions and closing with by far the greatest and most enthusiastic banquet the university has ever known, every possible place being sold the day before the banquet was held.

At the close of the commencement exercises, which were held in the great auditorium of the church, President Hill M. Bell reviewed the most notable events of the year, closing with the announcement of a gift of $50,000 to the university by the president of the board of trustees, Hon. Theodore Perry Shonts.

The year has closed with a large degree of success, the future seems bright, and the university faculty, students, alumni, and friends are committed to a greater work than ever before in the service of God and his work on earth.

Oklahoma Christian University

The youngest child in our educational family of colleges has just completed its second session, with a total enrollment of 312 different students, seventy-two of whom were ministerial students, gathered from about eighteen different states besides Canada and Australia. Several students came very late in the year whose names were not included, and we are entitled to report seventy-five ministerial students as the enrollment for the second session. This is little short of phenomenal. It places our school fourth in number of ministerial students among our schools, and the indications are that next year we will take third place. Does some one ask how this can be accounted for? I answer, our location has much to do with it. We are in the geographical center of, at least, four states in which there is no school of our people, namely, Oklahoma, K5ansas, Arkansas and Colorado. We are nearer to Northern Texas and Southwestern Missouri than are the schools of our in those states, in short, there is no school of our people within a radius of four hundred miles, embracing a country ich almost beyond imagination and rapidly filling up with an intelligent, progressive people. There ae largely more than 100,000 Disciples naturally tributary to this school. It is destined to become, baring accidents or mismanagement, one of the greatest schools of our brotherhood. This is the universal conviction of all who have studied the situation.

We herewith submit the schools and colleges that are in successful operation, together with enrollment in each.

Last fall we began a campaign for temporay endowment (so called) which simply is a subscription running through five years for current expenses. We have secured about $45,000 in pledges for this pupose, and the large pat of this was completed by March 1, as we have not been pushing this campaign much since that time, because we have reached what would amply provide for our current expenses. However, we will continue this form of work somewhat longer, as all surplus from this source can go into the permanent endowment.

We had planned to begin our permanent endowment campaign by April 1, but the Enid Investment and Development Company still owe us considerable sum on bonus and asked for until July 1, to complete their contract. They assure us that the balance on bonus will be paid by that time without any question. We will then be in shape to prosecute the permanent endowment campaign, and we already nave several liberal pledges promised as a beginning for that work.

The University holds forty acres of land. Twenty being reserved for campus and the other twenty will probably be placed on the market and sold off in lots. At the rate lots are selling at the present time this twenty acres is worth upwards of $40,000. Our buildings and equipment are worth approximately $125,000. There is still due us in tuition, or the balance that the Development Company owes us on scholarships, about $25,000. The total value of our property, including buildings, land, and equipment is approximately $175,000.

The building that has been done near the University is really wonderful. Scores of houses have gone up within the last eighteen months and many more are in process of erection at the present time. We have a street car line to the University campus, giving us fifteen minute service. The city water mains are now being laid to our campus and arrangements are being made to extend the city sewer system to our grounds. We can reach any of the depots from our campus by street car from fifteen to twenty minutes. Enid is one of the best railroad centers in the Southwest, having radius leading out in ten or eleven different directions.

The future is bright with promise. The enrollment next year, if conditions remain favorable, will be far in excess of the past year. Inquiries concerning the school are coming from every direction. Our people are evidently beginning to feel that Oklahoma Christian University is destined to take a prominent place among the educational institutions of our brotherhood, and why should this not be so? Our location is ideal, and we have an elevation of about 1,500 feet giving us a bracing atmosphere. We have got excellent railroad facilities, a flourishing city of sixteen or eighteen thousand people that is growing with marvelous rapidity. We already have many miles of the finest asphalt pavement. The country for hundreds of miles in every direction consists of rich prairie land destined to hold a dense population, in fact, there is a family on nearly every quarter section at the present time. The people in general are wide awake and enterprising. What better place could there be for a general school such as this? Its possibilities are wonderful to contemplate.

Cotner University

The commencement week at Bethany, Nebraska, is over and never in the history of the school has there been a brighter outlook for the work than now. During the year sixty candidates completed their course and received the honors of the university during commencement season. Eighteen received the B. A. degree and eight the M. D. degree, while the others received certificates and diplomas from the departments of the institution. Ten received certificates from the department of education of the state of Nebraska, having the recognition bestowed upon them in finishing courses in education as is bestowed upon graduates of our university.

With the teachers, doctors and other graduates, eight strong young men received their A. B., who had finished the Sacred Literature course. This course is one of the strongest in the curriculum of the school has made of these men studious, practical ministers of the Word. They have all been called to important fields of labor.

Within the past two years $10,000 has been added to the property of the university in buildings and about $3,000 invested in additional library and laboratory equipment.

Field Secretary T. H. Adams has added about $12,000 to the endowment which has reached nearly $50,000 now.

It was necessary to add a member to the music faculty and also one to the commercial faculty to meet the demands of increasing growth. The university faculties now number fifty-two members.

Our great Centennial movement for endowment and students is to be pushed by an additional secretary, Mr. Harry G. Knowles, who served so successfully as an assistant in the evangelistic force of Chas. Reign Scoville. He will work with a stereopticon through Nebraska and adjacent territory showing scenes of our beautiful college town and also of the university.

The outlook for the work of Cotner University is exceedingly bright and we ask all friends to lift financially on the Centennial Endowment and attendance.

Eureka College

Eureka College has just closed a successful year. The meeting of the Board of Trustees was the best for years and the alumni association reached high-water mark in its annual gathering. The attendance for the year has been about the same as for several years. In the Bible department we are above the average for ten years and the spirit is fine. The students have done excellent work and the year closed with good prospect for the coming year. We expect quite an increase in attendance this fall.

The endowment campaign is the chief interest at present. This campaign is in the hands of a special committee consisting of A. J. Elliott of Peoria, W. B. Stroud of Eureka and F. W. Burnham of Springfield. The aim is to raise $125,000 by September 1,1910. The amount pledged so far is $17,725, but many men of means in Illinois have promised to contribute before the end of the campaign. The alumni association took definite action in the matter at the recent meeting and will seek to raise quite a large sum.

Eureka College is a Christian school. Her aim is truth for the cause of Christ. Our courses of study offer splendid opportunities for culture along many lines. In the alumni association are to be found 109 ministers, sixty teachers, six bankers, nineteen physicians, twenty-four lawyers, ten missionaries, twenty-nine commercial pursuits, ten in public service and reform work, five newspaper men and others in various professions and pursuits. Eureka College offers the young people of our homes educational advantages as good as the best, and seeks to do it in the name and spirit of Christ. This is Christian education.

But we have a special word for the Bible department. The total enrollment in this department for the year was forty-five. The average for ten years has been forty; we are five above the average. We have had forty-two young men in school the past year looking to the ministry. The course of study has been strengthened by additional courses in missions and comparative religion, as well as Christian evidences. The courses in Old Testament, laws and customs of Israel, early and later prophets are especially strong. The increasing interest in Bible study among the churches of the state makes the work done in our colleges all the more important and necessary. The department of Sunday-school pedagogy offers two years' work, which is unsurpassed by any of the schools of the West. When the student supplements the work in this department by the general courses in Bible study, the preparation is the equivalent of eastern schools of religious pedagogy. We feel confident that no college offers better work in a like period than is given in our three year course in the Bible department.

The lectureship under the auspices of the Ministerial Association held a most profitable session this year. Under the able leadership of Brother Frank Richardson, the association and community were led into a wealth of truth interpreted through the experience of a long and fruitful ministry. The missionary spirit of the college was never better. The great church in Eureka is the embodiment of the missionary spirit. Twenty-six young men and women are members of the Volunteer Movement. This is the American home of Dr. Royal Dye and the influence of his great work on the Congo is powerful in Eureka.

We expect great things and are attempting great things. We are entering upon a better day for the financial support of the college and we beseech the churches of Illinois to help us in our work. H. H. Peters.

Christian College

Christian College at Columbia, Mo., will begin its fifty-ninth year next September, and is again under the able leadership of Mrs. Luella Wilcox St. Clair, who recently left the presidency at Hamilton College, Lexington, Ky., to return to her former charge at Columbia. Mrs. St. Clair was for eight years at the headship of Christian College, the last four years sharing the executive office with Mrs. W. T. Moore, who recently retired from active school work on account of ill health.

Christian College was well born and as this is the Centennial year of our church, and therefore a year of historical memories. it may be of interest to recall that Christian College holds the first charter granted by the Missouri Legislature for the collegiate education of women. The names of Dr. Samuel Hatch, Prof. Henry White of Bacon College, Harrodsburg, Ky., D. P. Henderson and James Shannon, president of the Missouri State University, from 1850 to 1857, now of sainted memory, were connected with the founding of this historic old college.

John Augustus Williams, an educator of rare power, was the first president and gave the institution a noble beginning. Then came L. B. Wilkes who served as president for two years, followed by J. K. Rogers who, for twenty years, guided the growing institution with great wisdom, keeping it at the head of all colleges for women in the rapidly developing Mississippi valley.

For six years the scholarly and gifted George S. Bryant held the executive office, and was succeeded by Prof. W. A. Oldham who after nine years of conscientious and successful service resigned the presidency to return to the ministry. Prof. F. P. St. Clair, who had made a brilliant record in a Kentucky college for women, was next in office, but his untimely death occurred in November of the first year of his administration and he was succeeded by his widow, Luella Wilcox St. Clair.

Mrs. St. Clair ably administered the affairs of the college for the next four years and finding it necessary to resign the presidency on account of a severe illness, Mrs. W. T. Moore was elected to succeed her and remained in office for the next twelve years. Under the combined administration of Mrs. Moore and Mrs. St. Clair the most constructive work in the history of the college was accomplished. Great building plans were carried forward to a successful consummation and the growth of the school in numbers, in scholastic advancement and on all vital points was most marked.

The future of Christian College is rich with promise, and all who know of Mrs. St. Clair's successful administrative work, both in Kentucky and Missouri, believe that the college is in safe and wise hands. If properly equipped for the work, women are peculiarly adapted for the headship of a boarding school for young women. The home life is a prominent feature of such a school and a woman, better than any man, knows the needs of girls and during the formative period can, by wisely directed influences, place the stamp upon the future woman, who, in turn, decides the future of homes, educational enterprises and all that makes for the onward march of civilization. Emerson once said, "What is civilization? I answer, the power of good women." It is therefore to such institutions as Christian College that we must look for the best school training for our young women.

Mrs. St. Clair has surrounded herself by an able and highly trained corps of teachers, and parents may well entrust their daughters to the care and educational influences of this famous old institution which opens its doors for the 59th year next September, the 14th.

The undersigned, having been appointed a committee to express the appreciation of the Board of Trustees of Christian College for Mrs. W. T. Moore and her work on the occasion of her resignation as president of the institution, beg leave to submit the following:

Whereas, Mrs. W. T. Moore has been compelled by reason of ill health to resign her position as president of Christian College, and the same has been accepted; and

Whereas, She has served the college as president for twelve years, eight years of that time alone, and four years sharing the responsibility with Mrs. Luella W. St. Clair; and

Whereas, She served the institution all these years with untiring fidelity and with rare courage and business enterprise, the present splendid buildings being the result of her initiative; therefore

Resolved, 1. That we hereby express our hearty appreciation of the service she has rendered to this institution, and to the cause of Christian education, by the high ideals of life that she has held before the young ladies who have come under her instruction, and by the inspiration of her own example of unselfish devotion to the welfare of the students, and of the college over which she has presided.

Resolved, 2. That we deeply regret the physical infirmity which compels her resignation, while we can but admire the heroism

Philotheans to Celebrate

The Philothean Literary Society of the College of the Bible at Lexington is planning to celebrate its Semi-Centennial anniversary this fall at Pittsburg. This Society was organized in 1859 and has had a long and honorable history. It numbers among its old members some of the most prominent men in our brotherhood. The celebration will be twofold. First, they will have a banquet and reunion at Pittsburg during the Centennial Convention, which all old Philotheans are asked to attend. They also purpose to erect a memorial to the Society by equipping a room in the hospital at Batang, Thibet, the most remote mission station in the world. For this they plan to raise at least $500.00 by subscriptions from old and present members. They already have a good start. All old Philotheans are asked to contribute, and to send their names if they can attend the banquet. The Committee will also appreciate it if those who were in the Society between 1863 and 1887 will send a list of those who were in the Society during their membership. Send all communications to,

Christian Temple Seminary

F. D. Power of Washington delivered the literary address before the students of the Christian Temple Seminary at their commencement, June 16. There were ten graduates this year. One goes to the foreign field, having already been accepted. Two others are considering it. Fourteen of the young people of the Christian Temple will enter the College of the Bible, Kentucky; Bethany, W. Va., and Milligan, Tenn., this fall. All of these will enter the ministry or the foreign field. There have been ninety-eight additions to the Temple at the regular services since January 1. The fourth mission church of the Temple, Wilhelm Park—expects to have its building completed by September 1.

The Home for the Children of Missionaries

We are gratified to be able to announce that through the enterprise of Hiram College the Foreign Society will be able to open its new home for the children of missionaries at the beginning of the fall session. F. W. Norton has led the forces in this splendid achievement. It is a charming place, convenient to the college, commodious, comfortable, and in every way suited to the purpose for which it has been provided. This great institution is dedicated to the memory of G. L. Wharton, who gave his life to India, and it will be known as The Wharton Memorial Home.

Here the children of our missionaries will have a real home indeed. With every possible care and protection in this home for their children, our missionaries will be free from all anxiety and care as to the well being and training of their children. A suitable matron will have charge. This arrangement and announcement will bring cheer and comfort to the hearts of our missionaries with whom the problem of the education of their children is so overwhelming. The children will enjoy free tuition in Hiram College. The college authorities have been wise and generous in making ample provision for the great need. The home and free tuition for the children have all been arranged without cost to the Foreign Society. On behalf of the missionary force we tender most grateful thanks.

Friday, October 1, the home will probably be formally opened. We hope to be able to make fuller and more definite announcements in the near future.

Kansas City's Centennial Dedication

The Jackson Ave. Christian Church of Kansas City, Mo., was dedicated Sunday, June 13, by F. M. Rains of Cincinnati. The building cost $35,000 and is of Carthage cut stone, with tile roof and art windows. Oak finish in the interior. It is Kansas City's largest Christian church. It is thoroughly modern, including Akron style Sunday-school room 52x84, with gallery. Modern gymnasium installed by Mrs. Julia G. Hurt as a memorial of her two sons. There are class and club rooms, ladies parlor, with ante rooms. Kitchen completely furnished and dining room. This church was erected by sacrifice and hard work, coupled with great faith in God. Fire and bank failure took almost all they had of the former building.

The Aid Society pledged $2,000 and on Monday following Bro. R. A. Long sent his check for $500 and Mrs. R. A. Long gave hers for $100 to apply on their aid pledge.

There are 700 members with 449 present at Sunday-school the first day in new rooms. Bro. Scoville is coming to us in September and a great meeting is in store for this great city. Yours in Hope, Frank L. Bowen.

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XXI.

Sergeant Stimson Confirms His Suspicions.

It was late in the afternoon when Colonel Barrington drove up to Winston's homestead. He had his niece and sister with him, and when he pulled up his team, all three were glad of the little breeze that came down from the blueness of the north and rippled the whitened grass. It had blown over leagues of sun-bleached prairie, and the great desolation beyond the pines of the Saskatchewan, but had not wholly lost the faint, wholesome chill it brought from the Pole.

There was no cloud in the vault of ether, and slanting sun-rays beat fiercely down upon the prairie, until the fibrous dust grew fiery and the eyes ached from the glare of the vast stretch of silvery gray. The latter was, however, relieved by stronger color in front of the party, for blazing gold on the dazzling stubble, the oat sheaves rolled away in long rows that diminished and melted into each other, until they cut the blue of the sky in a delicate filigree. Oats had moved up in value in sympathy with wheat, and the good soil had most abundantly redeemed its promise that year. Colonel Barrington, however, sighed a little as he looked at them, and remembered that such a harvest might have been his.

"We will get down and walk towards the wheat," he said. "It is a good crop and Lance is to be envied."

"Still," said Miss Barrington, "he deserved it, and those sheaves stand for more than the toil that brought them there."

"Of course!" said the Colonel, with a curious little smile. "For rashness, I fancied, when they showed the first blade above the clod, but I am less sure of it now. Well, the wheat is even finer."

A man who came up took charge of the horses, and the party walked in silence towards the wheat. It stretched before them in a vast parallelogram, and while the oats were the pale gold of the austral there was the tint of the ruddier metal of their own Northwest in this. It stood tall and stately, murmuring as the sea does, until it rolled before a stronger puff of breeze in waves of ochre, through which the warm bronze gleamed when its rhythmic patter swelled into deep-toned harmonies. There was that in the elfin music and blaze of color which appealed to the sensual ear and eye, and something which struck deeper still, as it did in the days men poured libations on the fruitful soil, and white-robed priests blessed it, when the world was young.

Maud Barrington felt it vaguely, but she recognized more clearly, as her aunt had done, the faith and daring of the sower. The earth was very bountiful, but that wheat had not come there of itself; and she knew the man who had called it up and done more than bear his share of the primeval curse which, however, was apparently more or less evaded at Silverdale. Even when the issue appeared hopeless, the courage that held him resolute in the face of others' fears, and the greatness of his projects, had appealed to her, and it almost counted for less that he had achieved success. Then glancing further across the billowing grain she saw him—still, as it seemed it had always been with him, amid the stress and dust of strenuous endeavor.

Once more, as she had seen them when the furrows were bare at seed time, and there was apparently only ruin in store for those who raised the Eastern people's bread, lines of dusty teams came plodding down the rise. They advanced in echelon keeping their time and distance with a military precision, but in place of the harrows, the tossing arms of the binders flashed and swung. The wheat went down before them, their wake was strewn with gleaming sheaves, and one man came foremost swaying in the driving-seat of a rattling matchine. His face was the color of a Blackfeet's, and she could see the darkness of his neck above the loose-fronted shirt, and a bare blackened arm that was raised to hold the tired beasts to their task. Their trampling, and the crash and rattle that swelled the low crescendo, drowned the murmur of the wheat, until one of the machines stood still, and the leader, turning a moment in his saddle, held up a hand. Then those that came behind swung into changed formation, passed, and fell into indented line again, while Colonel Barrington nodded with grim approval.

"It is very well done," he said. "The best of harvesters! No newcomers yonder. They're capable Manitoba men. I don't know where he got them, and, in any other year, one would have wondered where he would find the means of paying them. We have never seen farming of this kind at Silverdale."

He seemed to sigh a little, while his hand closed on the bridle, and Maud Barrington fancied she understood his thoughts just then.

"Nobody can be always right, and the good years do not come alone," she said. "You will plow every acre next year."

Barrington smiled dryly. "I'm afraid that will be a little late, my dear. Any one can follow, but since, when everybody's crop is good, the price comes down, the man who gets the prize is the one who shows the way."

"He was content to face the risk," said Miss Barrington.

"Of course," said the Colonel quietly. "I should be the last to make light of his foresight and courage. Indeed, I am glad I can acknowledge it, in more ways than one, for I have felt lately that I am getting an old man. Still, there is one with greater capacities ready to step into my shoes, and though it was long before I could overcome my prejudice against him, I think I should now be content to let him have them. Whatever Lance may have been, he was born a gentleman, and blood is bound to tell."

Maud Barrington, who was of patricians parentage, and would not at one time have questioned this assertion, wondered why she felt less sure of it just then.

"But if he had not been, would not what he has done be sufficient to vouch for him?" she said.

Barrington smiled a little, and the girl felt that her question was useless as she glanced at him. He sat very straight in his saddle, immaculate in dress, with a gloved hand on his hip, and a stamp which he had inherited, with the thinly-covered pride that usually accompanies it from generations of a similar type, on his clean-cut face. It was evidently needless to look for any sympathy with that view from him.

"My dear," he said, "there are things at which the others can beat us; but, after all, I do not think they are worth the most, and while Lance has occasionally exhibited a few undesirable characteristics, no doubt acquired in this country, and has not always been blameless, the fact that he is a Courthorne at once covers and accounts for a good deal."

Then Winston recognized them, and made a sign to one of the men behind him as he hauled his binder clear of the wheat. He had dismounted in another minute, and came towards them, with the jacket he had not wholly succeeded in struggling into, loose about his shoulders.

"It is almost time I gave my team a rest," he said. "Will you come with me to the house?"

"No," said Colonel Barrington. "We only stopped in passing. The crop will harvest well."

"Yes," said Winston, turning with a little smile to Miss Barrington. "Better than I expected, and prices are still moving up. You will remember, madam, who it was wished me good fortune. It has undeniably come!"

"Then," said the white-haired lady, "next year I will do as much again, though it will be a little unnecessary, because you have my good wishes all the time. Still, you are too prosaic to fancy they can have anything to do with—this."

She pointed to the wheat, but, though Winston smiled again, there was a curious expression in his face as she glanced at her niece.

"I certainly do, and your good-will has made a greater difference than you realize to me," he said.

Miss Barrington looked at him steadily. "Lance," she said, "there is something about you and your speeches that occasionally puzzles me. Now, of course, that was the only rejoinder you could make, but I fancied you meant it."

"I did," said Winston, with a trace of grimness in his smile. "Still, isn't it better to tell any one too little rather than too much?"

"Well," said Miss Barrington, "you are going to be franker with me by and by. Now, my brother has been endeavoring to convince us that you owe your success to qualities inherited from bygone Courthornes."

Winston did not answer for a moment, and then he laughed. "I fancy Colonel Barrington is wrong," he said. "Don't you think there are latent capabilities in every man, though only one here and there gets an opportunity of using them? In any case, wouldn't it be pleasanter for any one to feel that his virtues were his own and not those of his family?"

Miss Barrington's eyes twinkled, but she shook her head. "That," she said, "would be distinctly wrong of him, but I fancy it is time we were getting on."

In another few minutes Colonel Barrington took up the reins, and as they drove slowly past the wheat, his niece had another view of the toiling teams. They were moving on tirelessly with their leader in front of them, and the raps of the knives, trample of hoofs, and clash of the binders' wooden arms once more stirred her. She had heard those sounds often before, and attached no significance to them, but now she knew a little of the stress and effort that preceded them, she could hear through the turmoil the exultant note of victory.

Then the wagon rolled more slowly up the rise, and had passed from view behind it, when a mounted man rode up to Winston with an envelope in his hand.

(Copyright, 1907, by F. A. Stokes Co.)

"Mr. Macdonald was in at the settlement and the telegraph clerk gave it to him," he said. "He told me to come along with it."

Winston opened the message, and his face grew grim as he read, "Send me five hundred dollars. Urgent."

Then he thrust it into his pocket, and went on with his harvesting when he had thanked the man. He also worked until dusk was creeping up across the prairie before he concerned himself further about the affair, and then the note he wrote was laconic.

"Enclosed you will find fifty dollars, sent only because you may be ill. In case of necessity you can forward your doctor's or hotel bills," it ran.

It was with a wry smile he watched a man ride off towards the settlement with it. "I shall not be sorry when the climax comes," he said. "The strain is telling."

In the meanwhile Sergeant Stimson had been quietly renewing his acquaintance with certain ranchers and herders of sheep scattered across the Albertan prairie some six hundred miles away. They found him more communicative and cordial than he used to be. Now the lonely ranchers have as a rule few opportunities of friendly talk with anybody, and as they responded to the sergeant's geniality, he became acquainted with a good many facts, some of which confirmed certain vague suspicions of his, though others astonished him. In consequence of this he rode one night with two or three troopers of a Western squadron.

His apparent business was somewhat prosaic. Musquash, the Blackfeet, in place of remaining quietly on his reserve, had in a state of inebriation reverted to the primitive customs of his race, and taking the trail, not only annexed some of his white neighbors' ponies and badly frightened their wives, but drove off a steer with which he feasted his people. The owner following came upon the hide, and Musquash, seeing it was too late to remove the brand from it, expressed his contrition, and pleaded in extenuation that he was rather worthy of sympathy than blame, because he would never have laid hands on what was not his had not a white man sold him deleterious liquor. As no white man is allowed to supply an Indian with alcohol in any form, the wardens of the prairie took a somewhat similar view of the case, and Stimson was, from motives which he did not mention, especially anxious to get his grip upon the other offender.

The night when they rode out was very dark, and they spent half of it beneath a birch bluff, seeing nothing whatever, and only hearing a coyote howl. It almost appeared there was something wrong with the information supplied them respecting the probable running of another load of prohibited whisky, and towards morning Stimson rode up to the young commissioned officer.

"The man who brought us word has either played their usual trick, and sent us here while his friends take the other trail, or somebody saw us ride out and went south to tell the boys," he said. "Now you might consider it advisable that I and one of the troopers should head for the ford at Willow Hollow, sir."

"Yes," said the young officer, who was quite aware that there were as yet many things connected with his duties he did not know. "Now I come to think of it, Sergeant, I do. We'll give you two hours, and then, if you don't turn up, ride over after you; it's pretty shivery waiting for nothing here."

Stimson saluted and shook his bridle, and rather less than an hour later faintly discerned a rattle of wheels that rose from a long way off across the prairie. Then he used the spur, and by and by it became evident that the drumming of their horses' feet had carried far, for, though the rattle grew a little louder, there was no doubt that whoever drove the wagon had no desire to be overtaken. Still, two horses cannot haul a vehicle over a rutted trail as fast as one can carry a man, and when the wardens of the prairie raced towards the black wall of birches that rose higher in front of them, the sound of wheels seemed very near. It, however, ceased suddenly, and was followed by a drumming that could only have been made by a galloping horse.

"One beast!" said the Sergeant. "Well, they'd have two men, any way, in that wagon. Get down and picket. We'll find the other fellow somewhere in the bluff."

They came upon him within five minutes endeavoring to cut loose the remaining horse from the entangled harness in such desperate haste that he did not hear them until Stimson grasped his shoulder.

"Hold out your hands," he said. "You have your carbine ready, trooper?"

The man made no resistance, and Stimson laughed when the handcuffs were on.

"I don't know that I mind telling you," said the prisoner. "It was a low down trick he played on me. We got down to take out the horses when we saw we couldn't get away from you, and I'd a blanket girthed round the best of them, when he said he'd hold him while I tried what I could do with the other. Well, I let him, and the first thing I knew he was off at a gallop, leaving me with the other horse, which two men couldn't handle. You'll find him rustling south over the Montana trail."

"Mount and ride!" said Stimson, and when his companion galloped off, turned once more to his prisoner.

"You'll have a lantern somewhere, and I'd like a look at you," he said. "If you're the man I expect, I'm glad I found you."

"It's in the wagon," said the other dejectedly.

Stimson got a light, and when he had released and picketed the plunging horse, held it so that he could see his prisoner. Then he nodded with evident contentment.

"You may as well sit down. We've got to have a talk," he said.

"Well," said the other, "I'd help you to catch Harmon if I could, but I can prove he hired me to drive him over to Kemp's in the wagon, and you'd find it difficult to show I knew what there was in the packages he took along."

Stimson smiled. "Still," he said, "I think it could be done, and I've another count against you. You had one or two deals with the boys some little while ago."

"I'm not afraid of your fixing up against me anything I did then," said the other man.

"No?" said Stimson. "Now, I guess you're wrong, and it might be a good deal more serious than whisky-running. One night a man crawled up to your homstead through the snow, and you took him in."

He saw the sudden fear in his companion's face before he turned it from the lantern.

"It has happened quite a few times," said the latter. "We don't turn any stranger out in this country."

"Of course!" said the Sergeant gravely, though he felt a little thrill of content as he saw the shot, he had been by no means sure of, had told. "That man, however, had lost his horse in the river, and it was the one he got from you that took him out of the country. Now, if we could show you knew what he had done, it might go as far as hanging somebody."

The man was evidently not a confirmed law breaker, but merely one of the small farmers who were willing to pick up a few dollars by assisting the whisky-runners now and then, and he abandoned all resistance.

"Sergeant," he said, "it was most a week before I knew, and if anybody had told me at the time, I'd have turned him out to freeze before I'd have let him have a horse of mine."

"That wouldn't go very far if we brought the charge against you," said Stimson grimly. "If you'd sent us word when you did know, we'd have had him."

"Well," said the man, "he was across the frontier by that time, and I don't know that most folks would have done it, if they'd had the warning the boys sent me."

Stimson appeared to consider for almost a minute, and then gravely rapped his companion's arm.

"It seems to me that the sooner you and I have an understanding, the better it will be for you," he said.

They were some time arriving at it, and the Sergeant's superiors might not have been pleased with all he promised during the discussion. Still, he was flying at a higher game, and had to sacrifice a little, while he knew his man.

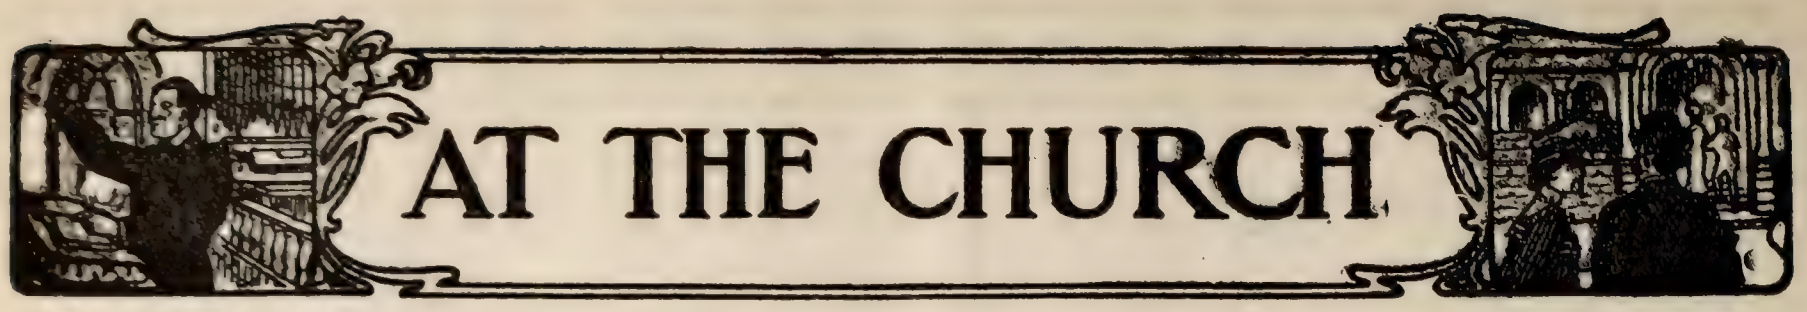
"We'll fix it up without you, as far as we can, but if we want you to give evidence that the man who lost his horse in the river was not Farmer Winston, we'll know where to find you," he said. "You'll have to take your chance of being tried with him if we find you're trying to get out of the country."

It was half an hour later when the rest of the troopers arrived and Stimson had some talk with their officer aside.

"A little out of the usual course, isn't it?" said the latter. "I don't know that I'd have countenanced it, so to speak, off my own bat at all, but I had a tolerably plain hint that you were to use your discretion over this affair. After all, one has to stretch a point or two occcasionally."

"Yes, sir," said Stimson. "A good many now and then."

The officer smiled a little and went back to the rest. "Two of you will ride after the other rascal," he said. "Now, look here, my man, the first time my troopers, who'll call around quite frequently, don't find you about your homestead, you'll land yourself in a tolerably serious difficulty. In the meanwhile,, I'm sorry we can't bring a charge of whisky-running against you, but another time be careful who you hire your wagon to."



Then there was a rapid drumming of hoofs as two troopers went off at a gallop, while when the rest turned back towards the outpost Stimson rode with them quietly content.

To be continued.

He is the one quiet figure upon whom rests the preservation of order, and the civil branches of the government look to him to impose their liberal rule upon the empire and to deal promptly with persons or factions dangerous to the state.

Sunday School Lesson

Entering Europe*

The second missionary journey of the apostle Paul was begun under circumstances which might have thrown a cloud over the bright prospects of the church. Barnabas and Paul had been close friends and colleagues on the first journey. Barnabas had started as the leader of the company that included himself, Paul, and Mark. Gradually, however the leadership changed and Paul became the acknowledged head of the enterprise, about the time that Mark returned to Jerusalem. That defection of the young man, who afterwards became the writer of the second Gospel, was greatly regretted by Paul and must have been a serious disappointment to his ardent hopes for effective work. His own illness, which followed soon after, was an added distress to him, and perhaps he felt that something of that difficulty might have been avoided if Mark had remained faithful to his original plan.

John Mark.

When, therefore, Paul and Barnabas, after some stay in Antioch, felt that they should go back and revisit the churches which they had established, the question naturally arose as to their companions. It was always better to take some one else with them, especially a younger man, who could be of service in the work. Barnabas wished to take Mark, who was a relative of his and for whom he probably cherished a strong personal affection. Mark had apparently come to regret his hasty departure from the apostles on their former journey, and had now returned from Jerusalem to Antioch ready to go with them whithersoever they might desire. Barnabas no doubt felt that it was only giving the younger man a reasonable opportunity to prove his loyalty after his first mistake.

The Disagreement.

But Paul was in no mood for further experiments. He had been deeply hurt by Mark's conduct on the former occasion and did not wish to repeat the experience. He felt that the cause committed to them was too important to be jeopardized in any way by volatile and irresponsible conduct. Both Paul and Barnabas were right, each in his own way. We cannot but sympathize with Barnabas' desire to give Mark another chance. Perhaps, indeed, our sympathy falls rather with him than with Paul, whose final decision must have caused both Barnabas and Mark the deepest pain. In fact, the controversy between the two leaders became sharp enough to justify Luke in describing it as a "paroxysm." It is a painful illustration of the fact that the apostles who could be trusted in all matters which pertained to the great principles of the gospel were not always of the same mind upon questions of detail or expediency. Paul's disagreement with Peter at Antioch, of which he speaks in his epistle to the Galatians is another case in point.

But such instances only prove the fact that with all their limitations of judgment, these men never departed from their ideal of loyalty to the Master and devotion to his work. Our ideas of their inspiration must be large enough to include these facts of mental and temperamental limitation. And indeed such a broader view of inspiration has recognized the necessity of eliminating all elements of mere mechanical divine direction, and of emphasizing the engaged and devoted personalities of these great men.

Barnabas and Mark.

Barnabas, not to be defeated in his plan of evangelistic work, took his young kinsman, Mark, and departed to their old field, his native land of Cyprus. We hear of him no more in connection with this career of apostolic preaching, but Paul later refers to him in a kindly spirit and shows that no lingering animosity prevailed between the two men. Mark also in later years became a helper of Paul and is mentioned affectionately in the last of the great apostle's writings. But both to Paul and Barnabas the separation must have been the cause of many painful reflections. No matter where either of them went along the familiar track of their former work, the question would certainly be raised by all their friends as to where the other man was and why he did not come.

Paul and Silas.

With the same instinct of getting back to familiar and paternal ground, Paul, choosing as his companion another young member of the Jerusalem church, Silas or Silvanus, departed by land northward around the corner of the Mediterranean Sea to his own province of Cilicia. It is not inappropriate in connection with this lesson, which falls to be studied on our national birthday, to recall the patriotic interest of both Barnabas and Paul in their own home lands. Barnabas had directed the earliest foreign missionary work of the Christian church to his own island of Cyprus, for which he probably felt all the affection of a patriot. On the other hand, Paul had followed his conversion with several years of unrecorded missionary work in the province of Cilicia, of which Tarsus, his native city, was the principle place. Later on, in speaking before the Jewish council at Jerusalem of his origin, he declares that he was a citizen of Tarsus, a city of no mean importance. There is an example of the patriotism which is due to the loyal appreciation of one's home and people.

Patriotism.

Jesus felt this same sentiment. To him Palestine was the most attractive country of the world, because he loved its people and believed that they had a future if they would only rise to claim it. He never went beyond the limits of that little territory where his lot was cast. Jerusalem was to him the most precious of spots. He loved it as Isaiah had loved it, but with deeper insight into its glories and sins. To the national sentiment which Jesus felt, Paul added something of that pride in the Roman empire which lifted him from the levels of a mere Cilician patriot to broad appreciation of imperial opportunities. When he said quietly to the attendants who were preparing to scourge him at the time of his arrest in Jerusalem, "Is it lawful for you to scourge a man who is a Roman citizen and uncondemned?" we can understand that there was a true appreciation of the privileges which Rome had conferred upon him as a free-born citizen of the empire. No study of the New Testament would be complete without a just appreciation of the love which our Lord and his apostles felt for the lands of their birth and the political institutions under which they were reared. If they, with those limitations which that age embodied, had cause to be proud of their people, how much more have we!

Cilician Churches.

Paul and Silas visited the churches of Syria and Cilicia. These churches no doubt owed their origin to Paul's evangelistic work during those silent years which we are tempted to regard as a mere preparation for the serious work of his apostleship. Yet to him those years were the very essence of his ministry as one sent forth by Jesus Christ. He had no idea of any wider work awaiting him. His missionary activities in the home field of his own and neighboring province are a conspicuous example of a man definitely devoted to a small task, becoming thereby fitted for a vaster ministry. These churches, Paul's own children in the faith, the missionaries now comforted with instruction in the truths of the gospel.

Galatian Churches.

Then they journeyed on toward the West in the direction of those cities visited by Paul and Barnabas on the first journey. Derbe was first to be reached, and later they came to Lystra, where Paul had been stoned in fury by the Jewish zealots and left by them outside the city gates, apparently dead. In this very city he now found and baptized a young man destined to play an important part in the future of Christianity. The name of Timothy is intimately associated with most of Paul's later life, and two of the epistles, which certainly owe some part of their content to the apostle Paul, bear his name. Timothy had received a careful Jewish education from his grandmother, Lois, and his mother, Eunice, though his father was a Greek. Paul circumcised him in order that there might be no trouble with the Jews, and when he departed from Lystra he took the young man with him. Timothy's excellent reputation in the region is witnessed both in Luke's narrative and in Paul's letter to him. They bore with them copies of the letter which had been prepared by the Jerusalem leaders at the time of the conference, setting forth the right of the Gentiles to enter the church upon the same terms as Jews.

The Mind of the Spirit.

Still onward went Paul and his two companions, Silas and Timothy. They passed through Phrigia and Galatia, stopping, no doubt, at Antioch of Pisidia, one of the Galatian churches later addressed in Paul's epistle. The plans of the evangelists were not always successfully carried out. They had wanted to go into the province of Asia, but were unable to do so; nor could they find it practicable to go up to Bithynia, lying along the Black Sea. These hindrances, which prevented their entrance into these regions, they interpreted as divine tokens. It was the will of the Spirit that they should pass these regions by, promising, as they were, for missionary effort. This did not mean that such districts were left without the gospel, for in later years the provincial governor, Pliny, writing to the Emperor Trajan, gives ample testimony of the widespread presence and influence of Christianity in his province. And we know that in Thyatira, Sardis and Philadelphia, cities of Asia, the gospel was soon planted, as is proved by the fact that the churches of those cities are addressed by the writer of Revelation as among the seven churches of Asia.

The Journey to Europe.

The missionaries soon came down to the sea coast at Troas, the Troy of classic story, and here, perhaps by reason of Paul's affliction, they made the acquaintance of Luke, the young physician from Philippi. It was here, seemingly the western boundary of the Semitic world, that Paul, perhaps through the influence of Luke, came to understand how vast a world lay beyond the Aegean Sea. When, therefore, in a dream, he saw the vision of a Macedonian calling him to come to that region with his message, he took it as a divine call, and accompanied by his two friends and also by Luke, started on that memorable journey which landed him first at Neapolis and then at Philippi, and resulted in the conversion of Lydia, the Jewess, who perhaps later on carried back the gospel to her own home in Thyatira across the sea.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

CHRIST'S GIFT OF REST.

Topic, June 30. Matt. 11:28-30.

Do we in America need rest? Take the testimony of a leading psychologist: "We say that so many of our fellow-countrymen collapse, and have to be sent abroad to rest their nerves, because they work so hard. I suspect that this is an immense mistake. I suspect that neither the nature nor the amount of our work is accountable for the frequency and severity of our breakdowns, but that the cause lies rather in those absurd felings of hurry and having no time, that anxiety of feature and solicitude for results, that lack of inner harmony and ease, in short, by which with us the work is so apt to be accompanied, and from which a European who should do the same work would nine times out of ten be free."

Deliverance from Burdensome Traditions.

Rites and restrictions which no man could observe to the satisfying of his conscience were held to be binding on the people to whom the Lord spoke. He bade them look at reality, not at the fictions of religion. How ought men to act toward a God who loves them? How ought they to treat their brothers? Any one who considers these questions long enough to get their meaning will see clearly the absurdity of much that has been thought to be a part of God's requirement. And with the passing of unnecessary and vexatious restrictions will also pass much of the worry that kills body and soul. Christ can give rest to the hurried and anxious American. He can show us that despite our boast of freedom we are the slaves of foolish customs that consume our energy and give us sleepless nights and days of wearing toil, and at last broken health and despair.—If we give heed to him, we shall cease to exalt to the place of supreme virtue; wasteful and wicked habits.

The Rest of Work.

The Master has no comfortable seats in his vineyard for idlers. He would have us do more work than we are doing. It is for this reason that worry is sinful, it wastes precious time and energy. Holy laziness has no support in the teaching of Jesus. His was a busy life and his faithful servants have never been idlers. Vanity and vexation of spirit are the reward of some kinds of effort. Jesus invites us to effort that satisfies. John G. Paton, after fifty years of labor in the New Hebrides, has not left on record any complaint that an active life is disappointing. Those who do from the heart the work of the kingdom have the assurance that their labors are not in vain. The disappointed and restless man is the one who would be thought wise and great or who thinks that the gratification of the gross appetites is the only motive that can appeal to sane men. Incense is not burned at the shrines of those whose sole ambition is to be worshipped by the admiring multitude and the pleasure seeker finds the world badly constructed for his purpose. Both classes ultimately exclaim, "What a weariness it is to live!" Men who work with right motives grow strong in their work and exult in their strength.

The Cure for Unhealthy-Mindedness.

A super-sensitive conscience disturbs the peace of many who think they are trying to please God. These persons stop several times a day and dissect their motives. They are afraid they will have the wrong feeling when they go to church, visit the sick, or speak with the discouraged. They have a diseased conscience. Their imaginations create perplexity where there ought to be certainty. Jesus bids them look at the work set for them to do. It is well to take stock of motives now and then, but the healthy-minded man teaches the ignorant, rebukes the hypocrite, reforms abuses without stopping to weigh motives at every turn. A good conscience comes from right action, not from morbid introspection. To those who worry about their standing with God there is a like word of exhortation. God promises his blessing to those who serve.

With the Workers

The church at Hannibal, Mo., has called C. E. Wagner to become their pastor.

Carl Guise has been called to the pastorate of the First Church, Horton, Kansas.

"Doublers" is the name applied in several of our Sunday-schools to those who bring in a new scholar.

Ten elders and deacons are to be ordained at Atlanta, Ga., June 20, when R. Linn Cave will conduct the service.

J. R. Blunt will soon close his work at Marionville, Mo., to enter upon the task with the church in South Joplin, Mo.

C. C. Neal, who did a successful work at Helena, Montana, is soon to take up work with the church at Salt Lake City.

D. W. Moore, Carthage, Mo., is preaching in a meeting at Aurora, which was begun by G. L. Snively, who had to leave it on account of illness.

Beginning July 8, the church at Cameron, Mo., will hold a meeting in which Chas. E. McVey will lead the singing. Meetings will be held in a tent.

F. F. Grim, Secretary of the New Mexico Missionary Society, who formerly kept the wheels moving in the Christian Century office, has been holding a meeting at Lordsburg, Arizona.

E. T. MacFarland, pastor of the Fourth Church, St. Louis, received a call to the church at Tabor, Texas, but declined it, preferring to remain with the church for which he has worked so long and successfully.

The church at Norfolk, Neb., will hold a meeting next November when they will have the assistance of Edward Clutter as evangelist. The pastor, R. J. Lucas, is carefully preparing for this work of the autumn.

The church at Benjamin, Texas, has been damaged by a recent cyclone to the extent of $3,000. The church is building a modern seven-room parsonage which will be ready for the occupancy of the pastor, J. E. Chase, about the first of July.

Sunday, June 6, was observed by the church at Ann Arbor, Mich., as Centennial Day. This church, organized in 1887, has grown to have a membership of 170, and is in prosperous condition. At the service letters were read by the pastor, O. E. Tomes, from the former pastors of the church. Special music was rendered by the choir under the direction of Prof. R. H. Kemp, and $1,000 pledged for repairs on the church.

J. Martin Rhodes was assisted by Miss Lizzie Goodlander of Drakeville in a three weeks' meeting in Mystic, Iowa, which resulted in ninety-five additions to the church, seventy-nine of them being by baptism. It is the greatest ingathering ever had there in one meeting. Plans are being laid for a great meeting in the month of October. Since all cannot go to Pittsburg it will be encouraging to know that those who cannot go will be winning souls for the Master.

The newly elected officers of the Christian Endeavor Society of the Lenox Ave. Church, New York City, were ushered into office with a beautiful and effective service conducted by W. A. Harp, pastor of the church. Such meeting must help toward a keener appreciation of the responsibilities of offices in church organizations. The Lenox Ave. Church has discontinued its evening services for the summer, and special attention is being given to the morning service to make it as attractive as possible.

An increasing number of the Disciples of the East are spending their summers at Bethany Beach, which is controlled by the Disciples, and kept entirely free from all objectionable features so common at summer resorts. Among those who have cottages at the Beach are: L. A. Drexler, Braddock, Pa.; Congressman Graham, Pittsburg; Prof. Hagerman, Lexington, Ky.; F. D. Power, W. R. Errett, W. S. Kidd, T. E. Cramblett, Robt. Latimer, and W. A. Dinker, of Pittsburg. All Disciples are invited to spend their summer with the Disciples at Bethany Beach.

Angola, Ind., June 21—Thirty-five accessions today, twenty-five last night, 190 in eight days of invitation. This county meeting plan is a success. We hold meetings in country churches in the afternoons and in tabernacle at county seat at night. All are receiving members. The Angola church, Brother Stauffer, pastor, and Brother Preston, assistant, are powers for good and for God in this county.—Chas. Reign Scoville.

Children's Day at Howett St. Church, Peoria, was a splendid success, with the largest attendance both morning and evening in the history of the church. Morning attendance in the Bible-school was 292, and the offering for the day $125.00. M. W. Rotchford, the superintendent, with his corps of splendid teachers, has worked earnestly to realize the great result. The Primary Class, under Miss Simonson, had 102 present. The church has installed a new baptistry and there were two immersions the first Sunday in June. The minister, William Price, will spend two months in England during the summer. During his absence, Charles Adams, a Eureka student, will have charge of the work.

The Men's Progressive Bible Class of Paola, Kans., gave a banquet in celebration of its first anniversary, June 8. The class was organized with twenty members, and now has an enrollment of fifty-five. There has been a steady and thorough growth from the beginning. The banquet was a complete success. B. T. Wharton, of Marshall, Mo., who was pastor here for seven years before going to Marshall twelve years ago, was the guest of honor and gave an inspiring address. W. S. Lowe is the class teacher.

George Fowler, pastor of the church at Roswell, New Mexico, is pushing the work with vigor. The church has just paid a debt of $3,500.00 and made decided gains in all missionary offerings.

Inland Empire Day, July 4

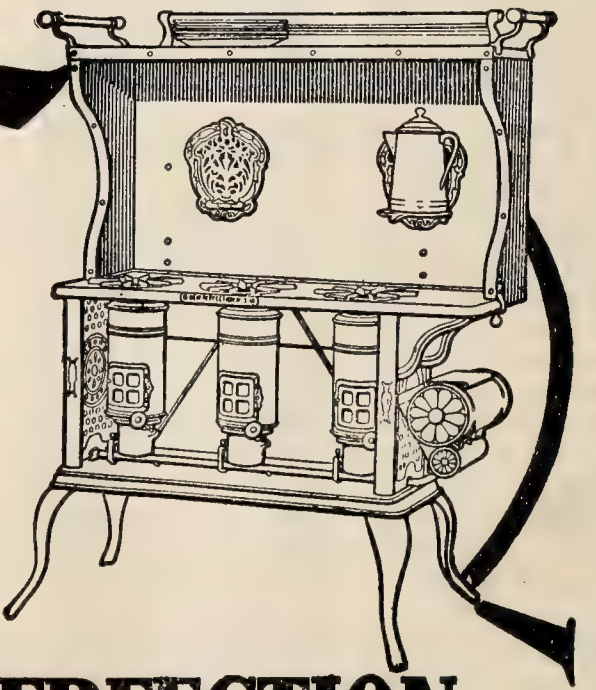
This is the last call before Inland Empire Day. More orders for programs have been filled than last year. Everything indicates a general observance of the day by our Endeavor Societies. No doubt at this reading many societies that have made no preparations can take up the matter and on very short notice have a good day, or at least take an offering.

Remember the territory evangelized by the Inland Empire fund is East Washington, Idaho, Montana, Wyoming and the Dakotas.

Our receipts this year from the Endeavor Societies could be increased by at least one-fourth if the societies would start a movement the last few days before Inland Empire Day to stir up the Endeavorers and the people generally to increase their offerings. Many societies are preparing to give $5.00 who could raise $15 or $20 just as easily with a little effort.

Let us all pray that this may be the greatest day in American Missions in the history of our society, Endeavorers.

Remit your offering promptly. Send same to The American Christian Missionary Society, Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.



Do not forget to take a picture of your decorations and send it in with the offering, competing for the Conquest Flag.

Remember that the society making the largest cash offering during the year, Sept. 30, 1908, to Sept. 30, 1909, will receive the Centennial Banner. H. A. Denton.

With the Workers

B. F. Clay has resigned at Nampa, Idaho, and expects to enter the evangelistic field.

Brooks Brothers are in a meeting at East Dallas, Texas, which is said to be doing well.

W. E. Amsbaugh has closed his work with the church at Shenandoah, Ohio.

The church at Rock Creek, Ohio, has called to its pastorate W. F. Wills, of Michigan.

C. C. Wilson, who recently returned from Honolulu, is being welcomed as pastor of the North Side Church, Cincinnati.

The veteran dedicator of Wabash, Ind., L. L. Carpenter, has been assisting in a meeting at Tippecanoe, Ohio.

The church at Harrison, Ohio, is without a preacher, M. G. Long having closed his work there.

The last of June, Roy Brown, will close his work with the church at Bellefontaine, Ohio.

The churches of Summit County, Ohio, are planning for a county organization which will be affiliated with the O. C. M. S.

A good practice of the Sunday-school of the First Church, Warren, Ohio, is the publication in the weekly paper the names of the new members enrolled each Sunday.

J. A. Serena and his assistant, Miss Anna Meldrum, are leading the church at Syracuse in careful preparation for the state convention to be held in that church.

At Fallsburg, Ohio, the church has just held a meeting in which they had the assistance of S. L. Bristor of Utica. There were nineteen additions to the church.

On account of the illness of Mrs. Breeden, it is reported that H. O. Breeden will not go to California for the summer, but will remain at Ipava, Ill.

The pastor of the church at Ames, Iowa, John T. Houster, is the possessor of an automobile, a fine opportunity for service in the church. There are many preachers who would like to know how it was done.

Dr. Herbert Martin, New York; Peter Ainslie, Baltimore; R. H. Miller, Buffalo; Marion Stevenson, St. Louis, will be among those heard at the New York State Convention at Syracuse, June 29 to July 2.

The Baccalaureate sermon at Texas Christian University was delivered by L. D. Anderson of Palestine, Texas, an alumnus of the institution. The theme of the sermon was "The Royalty of Humanity."

F. E. Day, the pastor, made careful preparation for the meeting which has just been held in the church at Fall City, Neb., and the first evening of the meeting with Lockhart and Linnt there were fifteen additions to the church.

J. E. Lynn celebrated the fifth anniversary of his service with the church at Warren, Ohio, June 6. We congratulate the church and preacher. More long pastorates means better churches and better preachers.

At Blacksburg, Va., where the Christian Church found its building too small to accommodate the evening audiences, they rented the Baptist church, in which the Netz sisters sang the first Sunday evening in June.

At Commerce and Cooper, Texas, there are two churches which want a pastor who will divide his service between them, making his home at the former place. The church can pay from $1,200 to $1,500 per year. Those interested should write A. L. Day, Commerce.

James A. Challanger, pastor of the First Church, Windsor, Mo., is pleased over the fact that a large number of the attendants at their Sunday-school are members of the adult Bible classes, which are thoroughly organized and working systematically.

Percy Wilson is pastor-elect of the Wabash Ave. Church, Akron, Ohio, but will not begin work until September. Until he arrives the pulpit will be supplied by Prof. Snoddy, of Hiram.

Iowa State Convention at Davenport, June 21-24. S. M. Perkins and the church at Davenport extend a hearty welcome to the people of the state. The Christian Union of last week gives views of the pastor, the church building and other places of interest.

F. A. Sword, evangelist, is in a meeting with the church at Deer Creek, Illinois, where D. A. Lindsay, the pastor, has the work well in hand.

The Sunday-school at Artesia, New Mexico, gave $130.00 for Foreign Missions the second Sunday in June. Under the leadership of Arthur Stout the church is doing a fine work.

Peter Ainslie, who delivered the baccalaureate sermon at Milligan College, Tenn., says "President Kershner is one of the most scholarly men we have in any of our colleges. The school has entered upon a new era of prosperity. It is beautifully located and has a fine student body."

The graduating class of the High School, Springfield, Ill., were the guests of the First Church at the evening service, Sunday, June 18, a baccalaureate sermon being preached by F. W. Burnham, the trusted pastor of the church. Mr. Burnham's subject was, "Education and the Social Consciousness."

There were seventy-five delegates to the New Mexico-West Texas convention held at El Paso, Texas. Considering the long distances the people have to travel in this greatest of states, this representation was counted a good one. Careful preparation had been made by H. B. Robison, pastor, and the church at El Paso.

The Commencement at Cotner University this year was the most interesting in many years. The graduating class was the largest in the history of the University. The past year has been marked by harmony and enthusiasm. The commencement address was delivered by Burris A. Jenkins, Kansas City. The alumni address was "James A. Garfield, the Christian," by Hugh Lomax, of Kansas.

The New York Ministerial Association and the State Missionary Convention are to be held at Syracuse, June 29 to July 1. To the first of these meetings will be devoted one afternoon and evening, during which Peter Ainslie, of Baltimore, will deliver two addresses of a devotional nature, and President G. B. Stewart of Auburn Theological Seminary will give an address on "The Manifold Activities of the Minister."

Mr. John Mitchell, an enterprising business man of Waco, Texas, and a friend of education and especially of the Texas Christian University, awarded a prize of fifty dollars to the winner in the College Oratorical contest. The winner this year was Bonner Frizzell, of Athens, Texas. His subject was "Awakening China—America's Obligation and Opportunity." Other contestants were, D. E. Tomlinson, Hillsboro; G. W. Stevenson, Cooper; B. B. Wade, Elgin; B. H. Bloor, N. C. Carr, and John C. Welch.

Some of the things prepared for those who attend the Iowa state convention are: "State Missions," J. Fred Jones, Illinois; "Broad View of Brotherhood Work," P. C. Macfarlane; "Brotherhood and Social and Cultural Work," J. B. Hostetter; "Men for the Ministry," A. M. Haggard; "Brothers of Christ," Finis Idleman; and many other addresses by such men as L. H. Otto, E. A. Hastings, Prof. A. S. Athern, H. E. VanHorn, President Bell, W. R. Warren, Walter Menzies and others.

The Ohio State Convention elected for its officers next year, President, I. J. Cahill, Dayton; Vice Pres., Geo. Darsie, Akron; Cor. Sec'y, H. N. Miller, Cleveland. The following are the board of managers: H. F. McMillin, W. H. Cowdery, Noyes P. Gallup, J. P. Allison, A. R. Teachout, S. M. Parks, E. S. DeMiller, Cleveland; M. L. Buckley, Collinwood; Robert Place, Bowling Green; S. H. Bartlett, Painesville; Lathrop Cooley, Medina; M. E. Chatley, Ravenna; John P. Sala, Elyria; P. H. Welshimer, Canton; one member from Southern Ohio to be chosen by the Board.

The cause of the Disciples of Christ has had a wonderful development in Kansas City, Mo., and Kansas. With strong and hearty co-operation they have gone from victory to victory. The latest accomplishment is the erection and dedication of a beautiful stone church at Jackson and Seventeenth streets. The dedicatory services were held June 13, with the sermon by F. M. Rains, Cincinnati, Ohio. The union of effort in Kansas City was shown by the presence of the pastors of the several churches of Greater Kansas City. Frank L. Bowen is the pastor of the church. This is called Kansas City's Centennial Dedication.

A Ministerial Institute will be held at Drake University June 28 to July 2, for the benefit of the students of the Bible College, but open to all ministers. The lectures are free. The subjects of the lectures are as follows: Professor Henry A. Sanders, "The Relation of the Freer Manuscripts to the Text Problems of the Old Testament," "The Freer Gospels and the Text Problems of the New Testament," "A Fifth Century School of Writing and the Fragments of Paul's Epistles in the Freer Collection," "The Early Monastic Home of the Freer Manuscripts." Thomas W. Grafton, "The Pastor and His Church," "The Pastor and His Helpers," "The Pastor and the Revival," "The Pastor and the Boy Problem," "The Pastor and His Tenure of Office." Rev. O. W. Fifer, "The Neglect of Christ." Frederick O. Norton, "The Text of the New Testament." Charles S. Medbury, "The Deeper Significance of the Centennial." F. F. Fitch, "The Boy; Who Shall Have Him?" "The Price of Success," "A Twentieth Century Institution," "The Training of a Teacher." D. R. Dungan, "The Roman Letter." Professor Sherman Kirk, "The Gospel of Mark." Hezzie E. Van Horn, "The Incarnation and Evolution." Alfred M. Haggard, "Higher Criticism by an Amateur." Ambrose D. Veatch, "The Sphere of Prophetic Activity." John M. Horn, "The Emmanuel Movement." James T. Nichols, "The Problem of the Church Paper." Barton S. Denny, "State Missions." James H. Ragan, "The Needs of the Small Church." Finis Idleman, "The Downtown Church and Its Problems."

DOCTOR KNEW
Had Tried It Himself.

The doctor who has tried Postum knows that it is an easy, certain, and pleasant way out of the coffee habit and all of the ails following, and he prescribes it for his patients as did a physician of Prospertown, N. J.

One of his patients says:

"During the summer just past I suffered terribly with a heavy feeling at the pit of my stomach and dizzy feelings in my head, and then a blindness would come over my eyes so I would have to sit down. I would get so nervous I could hardly control my feelings.

"Finally I spoke to our family physician about it, and he asked if I drank much coffee and mother told him that I did. He told me to immediately stop drinking coffee and drink Postum in its place as he and his family had used Postum and found it a powerful rebuilder and delicious food drink.

"I hesitated for a time, disliking the idea of having to give up my coffee but finally I got a package and found it to be all the doctor said.

"Since drinking Postum in place of coffee my dizziness, blindness and nervousness are all gone, my bowels are regular and I am again well and strong. That is a short statement of what Postum has done for me."

Centennial Bulletin

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

Before you do anything else, Pray!
While you do everything else, Pray!
After you have done everything else, Pray!

You have to pray because you need omnipotent help in your work. (If this is not true of what you are doing, quit it and get a man's job!) You ought to pray, "O give thanks unto Jehovah, for he is good; for his loving kindness endureth forever!" You like to pray. "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God!" Increasing joy is found day by day in prayer that follows and realizes the model, "Our Father!"

The history celebrated by the Centennial was so begun and wrought in prayer that it should call us to our kneees in emulation.

The fruitage of the century we celebrate is so rich and abundant that it ought to move us to devout thanksgiving.

The tasks undertaken for the Centennial are so hard and great that only God's power is equal to them.

Within a hundred miles of any but the most lonely church is at least one congregation that has already laid hold of the heavenly help and overcome to achieve some great Centennial Aim. With such glorious object lessons, why will you halt and whine "We can't?"

Have you abandoned the Lord's Table and closed up the Baptistry? No? Then you have more fellowship than you have realized in the great Centennial victories! For every baptism is unmistakable committal to Christ, and every communion is a reconsecration. These silent prayers are the mightiest of all. Here are the roots of the tree of life. But don't stop short of the fruit, and a full share in the perennial succession of seed-time and harvest-reaping to sow as well as to eat!

Pray for the Centennial.

That every preacher and teacher may be bold to set high aims and steadfast to see them achieved;

That every speaker in a Centennial hall or pulpit may proclaim a message that will ring round the world to the everlasting glory of the Christ;

That God's people of all names and divisions may be at last, immediately and wholly stirred to answer the Savior's Prayer.

Allegheny County Christian Endeavor Union and the Centennial.

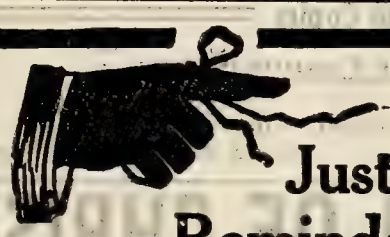
At a meeting of the Advisory Council of the Allegheny County Christian Endeavor Union last night, J. D. Dabney was asked to tell about the Centennial. When he had finished the story by a unanimous and enthusiastic vote representatives of 180 Christian Endeavor Societies volunteered whatever assistance might be asked of them to make the great meeting a success.

Baptists and the Centennial.

Be sure to read "A notable Centennial," an editorial from the "Watchman" of Boston. It represents fairly the attitude of hundreds of thousands of Baptists, and will make the hearts of all who have been praying and laboring for the unity of God's people sing for joy.

The Last West.

It is imposible for one who has not visited those regions to realize the vast development of the Inland Empire. In the rush to California, and to the rich lands immediately adjoining the Coast in Oregon and Washington, these enormous stretches of mountains and valleys were run over. Now irrigation either directly provided or closely supervised by the National Government is working greater wonders than any magician ever dreamed on a scale of continental vastness. The need of missionary assistance is immediate and colossal. The returns from missionary investments are as quick and abundant as the growth of Alfalfa under irrigation. Let the wide-awake members of our churches who have fellowship in Christian Endeavor work to recognize this Centennial opportunity with a worthy observance of Inland Empire Day, which fitly falls on the National Birthday, July 4.



A NOTABLE CENTENNIAL.

One hundred years, from nothing to eleven thousand churches and 1,205,000 members. This is one of the most remarkable growths of any Christian body in the entire history of Christianity; and we have been studying to discover the causes of it. "To practice that simple, original form of Christianity, expressly exhibited upon the sacred page, without attempting to inculcate [illegible] of point is "Every Christian an Evangelist." One of the Centennial mottoes is "Each to win one." Another point on which much emphasis is laid is the giving of not less than one-tenth of income to the Lord. Out of this four-fold and fertile soil of prayer, personal evangelism, intelligence and benevolence, the great prosperity of the Disciples of Christ appears to have grown.

As a body they are characterized by great activity in Sunday-school work. One of the Centennial mottoes is "All the church in the Bible school, and more." Many of their churches have every member enrolled for special Bible Study. They also lay strong emphasis on training teachers for Sunday-school work, and in proportion to their numbers they have more trained Bible School teachers than any other body. They also make a great point of special and organized work for men. Their "Brotherhood" is one of the most important of their organizations, and they have more organized men's Bible classes than any other religious body. They also place much stress on training men for the ministry, and "An offering from every Disciple to some Christian College," is another of their Centennial Aims. In this centennial year they have placed the definite standards before themselves: "10,000 trained men for the ministry, 50,000 trained teachers for the Bible Schools, $2,000,000 contributions for missions, and $10,000,000 added to the assets of the churches" in payments of debts, building new houses of worship, and endowments of colleges and ministerial sustentation funds.

This vigorous, alert, progressive and growing body of Christians celebrate their centennial in Pittsburg, Pa., Oct. 11-19. They expect to have fifty thousand Disciples present, and the Carnegie Music hall, Duquesne hall seating 8000 and the new baseball building which can be divided into three auditoriums, accommodating four to five thousand each, have been engaged for the meetings as well as several churches in the vicinity of Bad Food and Good Health Won't Mix.

The human stomach stands much abuse but it won't return good health if you give it bad food.

If you feed right you will feel right, for proper food and a good mind is the sure road to health.

"A year ago I became much alarmed about my health for I began to suffer after each meal no matter how little I ate," says a Denver woman.

"I lost my appetite and the very thought of food grew distasteful, with the result that I was not nourished and got weak and thin.

"My home cares were very heavy, for be-can know each of his fellows and is sure to have ample attention from the faculty. He is an individual and is so treated. This is largely impossible in those institutions whose undergraduate bodies are numbered by the thousand. Numerous writers are calling attention to this very obvious advantage of our smaller American colleges.

Nowhere is this helpful condition better combined with high standards for faculty and students and with the numerous advantages of an especially fortunate location than at Butler. Situated in the quiet residence suburb of Irvington, yet within twenty minutes street car ride of all the metropolitan advantages of Indianapolis, it would be almost impossible to overstate the opportunities thus open to the ambitious student.

Schenley Park entrance. As we have said before the Disciples are a purely Baptist people. The New Testament is their sole guide for faith and practice in religion. They require exact obedience to the teachings of the scriptures in belief and ordinances. Their prosperity like that of the Baptists, has sprung out of their close adherence to the Word of God. The exaltation of the personal Christ is the great theme of their preaching. Their methods of work and development are an illuminating example of intelligence and enterprise; and their prosperity cannot be other than a pleasure to every devout believer in the supreme authority of the Bible and in the deity of Jesus Christ.

The Watchman, (Baptist) Boston.

From the Home Board

H. A. Denton has just returned from Texas and New Mexico where he presented Home Missions and encouraged the frontier congregations.

W. J. Wright has been visiting the Ontario and Michigan Conventions laying the corner stone of a ne wbuilding in Priceton, W. Va., and will this week attend the Missionary Conventions in Minnesota and South Dakota.

Geo. B. Ranshaw has been taking the May Offering with such splendid churches as Birmingham, Ala., Jacksonville and Springfield, Ill., Evanston, O., presenting Home Missions at the Ohio, Missouri and Iowa Conventions; holding a Home Missionary rally at Knoxville, Ill.

The offerings for Home Missions for the week ending June 12 totaled $9,000. The offerings from the churches alone averaged over $1,000 a day. Many of the big churches have not yet sent in the cash. But we hear great reports from all. This will be our greatest year beyond any doubt.

Twelve hundred dollars in individual offeelings swelled the grand total for Home Missions last week. If the many splendid opportunities for establishing the cause in the new towns in the West were better known, we feel sure that scores of our weal hy people would support a missionary on the Home Field.

Secretary Lenton is pushing Inland Empire Day. With a great American theme upon a great American birthday, the Endeavorers ought to have a great service. Programs are being applied for in quantities which insure a very general observance.

The new Exercise for Children's Day for Home Missions has been prepared by Charles M. Fillmore of Indianapolis, and is now in the hands of the printers. It differs somewhat from the programs furnished in previous years in that most of the songs are prepared for the schools at large, thus insuring ease of both preparation and rendition. Supplies will be ready about August 1.

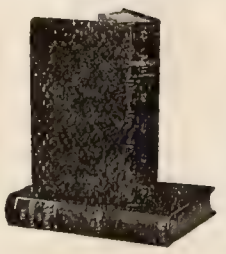
The Home Secretaries request the churches and schools to remit offerings as promptly as possible. Mone yborrowed from the banks in the early Spring when the income was scant, necessitates considerable interest charge. Prompt remittances will help us to cut down the interest and to keep things moving.

Great interest has been awakened by the letter sent out by S. M. Cooper asking 200 men to contribute $100 each to an emergency fund to be called the Business Men's Centennial Fund. A goodly number of responses have been received. The Evangelization of America is itself the greatest business proposition before the churches today, and business men should be the first to tackle it.

Another Great Gain

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first fifteen days of June amounted to $18,477, a gain over the corresponding time last year of $4,850. The churches as churches gained $2,960, the Sunday-schools $1,479. There was also a gain in the number of contributing churches and Sunday-schools.

The total receip s from October 1, 1908, to June 15, amounted to $155,225, a gain of $34,390. This is the largest gain in the history of the Foreign Society for the corresponding time. The churches as churches have gained $12,550, and the Sunday-schools $1,576, individual gifts $9,817, annuity gifts $14,034; but there has been a loss in bequests of nearly $5,000.



These encouraging gains will nerve the friends to press on and win one of the greatest victories in the history of our brotherhood. Remember this is the Centennial year. Let the Children's Day offerings and other gifts come thick and fast. Now is the time to keep up the battle of dollars.

ACROSS THE COLLEGE CAMPUS—HIRAM, OHIO.

HIRAM COLLEGE

believes in the distinctive mission of the Christian College. As a college, its purpose is to maintain the highest educational standards, and to seek genuineness rather than bigness. As a Christian college, it holds to the supreme value of Christian faith and character, and seeks to inspire in its students the Christian ideal of service. It possesses the characteristic advantages of the small college in that most vital factor in education—the personal contact and acquaintance of teacher with student. With a location unexcelled for health and natural beauty, with a faculty of exceptional character and experience, and with a splendid student-group of earnest young people, Hiram invites the consideration of young men and women of ambition and energy, who want a thorough education under the most favorable conditions.

A NEW COURSE IN MISSIONS.

A new and notable course in Missions has been adopted and will be immediately inaugurated under the direction of Prof. Charles T. Paul. Chinese, Russian, and other foreign languages, anthropology, phonetics, comparative religions, and the history and science of missions are among the features which will make this course unique and invaluable to candidates for the mission field at home or abroad.

WHO MAY WITH PROFIT ATTEND HIRAM.

1. Any young man or woman, whatever his or her prospective vocation, who wants culture, vision, or training for Christian citizenship and service.
2. Young people preparing for any kind of missionary work.
3. Young men preparing for the ministry.
4. Men already in the ministry who want the mental and spiritual quickening of one or more years at college.
5. Young people preparing to teach.
6. Those preparing for law, medicine or other profession, who want the invaluable preliminary culture of college training.
7. Young men or women who expect to enter the business world, and are ambitious to be more than machines.
8. Students of music.
9. Aspirants for any career in which public speaking plays an important part.
10. Engineering students, seeking the fundamental preliminary training necessary.
11. Young women who aspire to the noblest heights of Christian womanhood.
12. Young people preparing for Christian service as Bible-school leaders and teachers, pastoral helpers, social settlement workers, Y. M. C. A. and Y. W. C. A. secretaries, or workers in other special fields.

BULLETINS AND INFORMATION.

A most attractive illustrated bulletin has been published, showing many scenes of college life and the college surroundings. This and the new catalog, giving detailed information regarding the various courses, expenses, etc., will be mailed free. Requests for special information will receive prompt and careful attention. Correspondence is invited from all interested persons. Address,

BUTLER---A REAL COLLEGE

Neither a university nor an academy; but a small college of the best type, holding firmly to the highest educational ideals.

With $250,000.00 recently added to her endowment, Butler is well equipped for the work leading to the A. B. and A. M. degrees. Special courses for ministerial students and for teachers are included, the latter being accredited by the Indiana State Board of Education so that graduates are admitted to teach without examination.

The advantages a thorough-going small college, like Butler, offers to the student who desires to get the most out of his four years of academic training are many. Every student can know each of his fellows and is sure to have ample attention from the faculty. He is an individual and is so treated. This is largely impossible in those institutions whose undergraduate bodies are numbered by the thousand. Numerous writers are calling attention to this very obvious advantage of our smaller American colleges.

Nowhere is this helpful condition better combined with high standards for faculty and students and with the numerous advantages of an especially fortunate location than at Butler. Situated in the quiet residence suburb of Irvington, yet within twenty minutes street car ride of all the metropolitan advantages of Indianapolis, it would be almost impossible to overstate the opportunities thus open to the ambitious student.

BARRELS OF AIR BURNED AS FUEL

New, Remarkable Stove—Ohioan's Great Invention—Consumes 395 Barrels of Air to One Gallon of common Kerosene oil making oil-gas—the New Fuel that looks and burns like gas!

Wood, coal and oil all cost money. ONLY FREE FUEL IS AIR! Unlimited supply—no trust in control. Air belongs to rich and poor alike. We can't burn air alone but see here! Our wonderful stove burns air and gas—very little gas—principally air. Takes its fuel almost entirely from the atmosphere. Ideal for summer use.

A miniature gas works—penny fuel for every family—save 1-3 to 1-2 on cost—saves dirt and drudgery—no more coal or wood to carry—ashes unknown—absolute safety.

SEE HOW SIMPLE! TURN A KNOB—TOUCH A MATCH—FIRE IS ON. TURN AGAIN—FIRE IS OFF! THAT'S ALL.

Astonishing but true—time-tested—proven facts—circulars give startling details—overwhelming evidence.

NO SUCH STOVE SOLD IN STORES—UNLIKE ANYTHING YOU'VE SEEN OR HEARD OF.

A genius of Cincinnati has invented a new, scientific oil-gas generator that is proving a blessing to women folks, enabling them to cook with gas—relieving them of drudgery. Makes cooking and housework a delight and at the same time often saves 1-3 to ½ in cost of fuel.

How often have readers remarked that they would give anything to get rid of the drudgery of using the dirty coal and wood stoves—also the smoky oil wick stoves and their gasoline stoves which are so dangerous and liable to cause explosions or fire at any time.

Well, that day has arrived and a fine substitute has been discovered and every family can now have gas fuel for cooking, baking and heating and not have their kitchens a hot, fiery furnace in summer, and be carrying coal and ashes—ruining their looks and health.

THOUSANDS A WEEK.

Upon calling at the factory we found that this invention has caused a remarkable excitement all over the U. S.—that the factory is already rushed with thousands of orders and evidently the Company's representatives and agents are making big profits as they offer splendid inducements.

Sectional Cut of Generator

As will be noticed from the engraving, this OIL-GAS GENERATOR is entirely different from any other stove—although its construction is very simple—may be easily and safely operated and is built on the latest scientific principles, having no valves, which is a marked improvement, as all valves are liable to leak, carbonize, clog up or overflow.

By simply moving a knob the oil is automatically fed to a small, steel burner bowl or retort where it is instantly changed into gas, which is drawn upwards between two red hot perforated steel chimneys, thoroughly mixed with air and consumed, giving a bright blue flame—hottest gas fire, similar in color and heating power to natural gas.

This invention has been fully protected in the U. S. Patent Office and is known as the HARRISON VALVELESS, WICKLESS, AUTOMATIC OIL-GAS GENERATOR—the only one yet discovered that consumes the carbon and by-products of the oil.

The extremely small amount of Kerosene Oil that is needed to produce so large a volume of gas make it one of the most economical fuels on earth and the reason for the great success of this Generator is based on the well known fact of the enormous expansiveness of oil-gas when mixed with oxygen or common air.

Oil-gas is proving so cheap that 15c to 30c a week should furnish fuel gas for cooking for a small family.

Kerosene oil from which oil-gas is made may be purchased in every grocery—is cheap and a gallon of it will furnish a hot, blue flame gas fire in the burner for about 18 hours, and as a stove is only used 3 or 4 hours a day in most families for cooking, the expense of operating would be but little.

In addition to its cheapness is added the comfort, cleanliness—absence of soot, coal, dirt, ashes, etc.

What pleasure to just turn on the oil—light the gas—a hot fire ready to cook. When through, turn it off. Just think; a little kerosene oil—one match—light—a beautiful blue gas flame—hottest fire—always ready—quick meals—a gas stove in your home.

It generates the gas only as needed—is not complicated, but simple—easily operated and another feature is its PERFECT SAFETY.

NOT DANGEROUS LIKE GASOLINE.

And liable to explode and cause fire at any moment. This stove is so safe that you could drop a match in the oil tank and it would go out.

This Oil-Gas Stove does any kind of cooking that a coal or gas range will do—invaluable for the kitchen, laundry—summer cottage—washing—ironing—camping, etc. Splendid for canning fruit—with a portable oven placed over the burner splendid baking can be done.

ANOTHER IMPORTANT FEATURE.

Is the invention of a small Radiator Attachment which if placed over the burner makes a desirable heating stove during the fall and winter so that the old cook stove may be done away with entirely.

While at the factory in Cincinnati, the writer was shown thousands of letters from customers who were using this wonderful oil-gas stove, showing that it is not an experiment but a positive success and giving splendid satisfaction and as a few extracts may be interesting they are here produced.

L. S. Norris, of Vt., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Generators are wonderful savers of fuel—at least 50% to 75% over wood and coal."

Mr. H. Howe, of N. Y., writes: "I find the Harrison is the first and only perfect oil-gas stove I have ever seen—so simple anyone can safely use it. It is what I have wanted for years. Certainly, a blessing to human kind."

Mr. E. D. Arnold, of Nebr., writes: "That he saved $4.25 a month for fuel by using the Harrison Oil-Gas Stove. That his gas range cost him $5.50 per month and the Harrison only $1.25 per month."

J. A. Shafer, of Pa., writes: "The Harrison Oil-Gas Stove makes an intense heat from a small quantity of oil—entirely free from smoke or smell—great improvement over any other oil stove. Has a perfect arrangement for combustion—can scarcely be distinguished from a natural gas fire."

Mr. H. B. Thompson, of Ohio, writes: "I congratulate you on such a grand invention to aid the poor in this time of high fuel. The mechanism is so simple—easily operated—no danger. The color of the gas flame is beautiful dark blue, and so hot seems almost double as powerful as gasoline."

Mrs. J. L. Hamilton, writes: "Am delighted—Oil-Gas Stoves so much nicer and cheaper than others—no wood, coal, ashes, smoke, no pipe, no wick, cannot explode."

Hon Ira Eble, J. P., of Wis., writes: "Well pleased with the Harrison—far ahead of gasoline. No smoke or dirt—no trouble. Is perfectly safe—no danger of explosion like gasoline."

Chas. L. Dendeke, of N. Y., writes: "It is a pleasure to be the owner of your wonderful Oil-Gas Stove—no coal yard, plumbing — ashes or dust. One match lights the stove and in 10 minutes breakfast is ready. No danger from an explosion—no smoke—no dirt—simply turn it off and expense ceases. For cheapness it has no equal."

Agents are doing fine—Making big money.

WONDERFUL QUICK SELLER.

Geo. Robertson, of Maine, writes: Am delighted with Oil-Gas, so are my friends—took 12 orders in 3 days."

A. B. Slimp, of Texas, writes: "I want the agency—In a day and a half took over a dozen orders."

Edward Wilson, of Mo., writes: "The Harrison very satisfactory—Sold 5 stoves first day I had mine."

J. H. Halman, of Tenn., writes: "Already have 70 orders."

This is certainly a good chance to make money this summer.

Hundreds of other prominent people highly endorse and recommend oil-gas fuel and there certainly seems to be no doubt that it is a wonderful improvement over other stoves.

The writer personally saw these Oil-Gas Stoves in operation—in fact, uses one in his own home—is delighted with its working and after a thorough investigation can say that this Harrison Oil-Gas Stove made by the Cincinnati firm is the only perfect burner of its kind.

It is made in three sizes, 1, 2 or 3 generators to a stove. They are made of steel throughout—thoroughly tested before shipping—sent out complete—ready for use as soon as received—nicely finished with nickel trimmings and as there seems to be nothing about it to wear out, they should last for years. Ideal for summer use. They seem to satisfy and delight every user and the makers fully guarantee them.

HOW TO GET ONE.

All who want to enjoy the pleasures of a gas stove—the cheapest, cleanest and safest fuel—save 1-3 to 1-2 on fuel bills and do their cooking, baking, ironing and canning fruit at small expense should have one of these remarkable stoves.

Space prevents a more detailed description, but these oil-gas stoves will bear out the most exacting demand for durability and satisfactory properties.

If you will write to the only makers, The World Mfg. Co., 429 World Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio, and ask for their illustrated pamphlet describing this invention and also letters from hundreds of delighted users you will receive much valuable information.

The price of these Stoves is remarkably low, only $3.25 up. And it is indeed, difficult to imagine where that amount of money could be invested in anything else that would bring such saving in fuel bills, so much good health and satisfaction to our wives.

DON'T FAIL TO WRITE TODAY.

For full information regarding this splendid invention.

The World Mfg. Co., is composed of prominent business men of Cincinnati, is perfectly responsible and reliable, capital $100,000.00 and will do just as they agree. The stoves are just as represented and fully warranted.

Don't fail to write for Catalogue.

$40.00 Weekly and Expenses.

The firm offers splendid inducements to agents and an energetic man or woman having spare time can get a good position, paying big wages by writing them at once and mentioning this paper.

A wonderful wave of excitement has swept over the country, for where shown these Oil-Gas Stoves have caused great excitement. Oil-Gas fuel is so economical and delightful that the sales of these Stoves last month were enormous and the factory is rushed with thousands of orders.

Many have spare time, or are out of employment and others are not making a great deal of money, and they should write to the firm and secure an agency for this invention. Exhibit this stove before 8 or 10 people and you excite their curiosity and should be able to sell 5 or 8 and make $10.00 to $15.00 a day. Why should people live in penury or suffer hardships for the want of plenty of money when an opportunity of this sort is open?

Chicago Church Notes

A number of our churches had Children's Day on the second Sunday in the month. There is every indication of an unusually large offering in Chicago this year.

We have succeeded in raising an additional sum of money for the work at Bolenge. After completing a thousand dollars to send some new missionaries with Dr. Dye, a purse of $185 is being raised to send back the native that returned with Dr. Dye. This native has been helping Mrs. Dye in the work of translation.

A musical entertainment of ambitious proportions was given at the West End Church recently.

The Hyde Park Sunday-school and the Sheffield Avenue Sunday-school each prepared their own Children's Day exercises. Dr. Ames had their exercise printed and has some sample copies left to distribute.

Irving Park has a federation of men's clubs from all the churches, including the Catholic. They are banded together to clean up the politics of that section of the city. A member of the Christian church is President of the federation.

The Congregational church at Douglas Park has made overtures to our church on the subject of union. The two committees of the respective churches meet this week for conference.

The Evanston Sunday-school has a team playing winning base ball and will organize a tennis club and prepare a court soon.

An Analysis of Revivalistic Method

A Study of the Essentially Hypnotic Principle in Revivalistic Procedure

In our study of revivalism it has been made clear so far that there are richer possibilities in Christianity than the modern church is expressing.

What the church today most lacks, we have seen, is a vital consciousness of the sources of power and character with which the soul of Christ the Master had such open and intimate connection.

Our thesis, stated in our study of last week, is that our revivalistic method, the method by which we are most of us brought into the church and which we mostly use to bring others into the church, is responsible for the low order of spiritual life which obtains in our churches.

Modern revivalism produces an inferior order of Christian experience, and the continued use of the revivalistic method renders the church incapable of utilizing or even of perceiving a method by which a higher order of Christian experience might be produced.

It sets up false standards. It gets results by artificial means. It manipulates, but it does not instruct.

And it cannot instruct, for the state of mind which its characteristic work induces is not one of thoughtfulness.

The power of the revivalistic method lies in the situation it organizes, not in the individual soul's perception of vital truth.

What distinguishes the revivalist from the pastor? Is he superior to the pastor in the culture and grasp of his mind? Not at all.

Is the revivalist a more spiritually minded man than the pastor? Certainly no one will claim for him any such preëminence.

Is he, then, a more lucid interpreter of the truth than the pastor? Is he a better teacher? No.

Does he hold up a more inspiring ideal of life than the pastor is accustomed to present? By no means.

What is it, then, that distinguishes the revivalist from the pastor?

This: the successful revivalist has learned the art of controlling a congregation as a whole. The unit with which he deals is the crowd, not the individual soul.

And the crowd has a soul of its own just as an individual has a soul of his own. The methods by which a "master of assemblies" can get at this crowd-soul, to move it, are just as definite as the methods by which one can get at the individual soul.

The revivalist is a man who has found the way to the soul of the crowd. The average pastor either does not know the way or else, knowing it, knows also that the Christianity of Christ has no business there.

The revivalist may not be conscious of his method; he may proceed instinctively, and, perhaps, be all the more successful for not being aware of just what he is doing. But that his distinction from the pastor lies in his possession of the power of controlling men en masse, an analysis of any revival meeting will reveal.

Take for example the revivalistic device of voting the people up and down on this question and on that. "Stand up if you will accept Christ." "Stand up if you have any desire at all in your heart for salvation." Stand up of you want us to pray for you." "All who want to go to heaven, stand up."

The result of this crowd movement in whatever direction the preacher may determine is to set up a form of crowd-hypnotism with the preacher in control and the ordinary inhibitions of the individual broken down. The instructive rebellion of the intelligent man to such a practice is overborne by his sense of embarrassment in case he does not yield, and so he commits himself to the will of the preacher.

Or take again the device of leading the individual from one slight step to succeeding steps of increasing importance. It is a method oftimes adopted when the evangelist's patience has been exhausted in an effort to get converts outright.

The appeal goes forth from the pulpit for those who wish to be prayed for to raise their hands. A number of unsuspecting hands go up. Immediately they are noted by the "personal workers" who go to them and engage earnestly in conversation.

A second request is made for those who raised their hands to stand up before the prayer in their behalf is offered. Once upon their feet they are invited to come forward and, with the assistance of the personal workers, many of them are brought to the front seat where they are given cards to sign stating that they purpose to live the Christian life. Whereupon the public confession of faith is taken by the evangelist.

Another method often used by the revivalist to get at the soul of the crowd is to adopt at the opening of his meeting a policy of abuse in preaching. The evangelist abuses everybody in general and in particular. It may be the church members or the ministers or the "sects" or polite society, so-called, or the city administration. He wins at once a reputation for bravery, nerve.

This, of course, is the trick of every demagogue and charlatan, the trick adopted with such amazing success by the late Dr. Dowie, who won his power by his pastmastership in the art of abuse. People like it. It excites curiosity and it always results, if it is cleverly executed, in winning the soul of the crowd.

The use of the so-called personal workers' organization in the typical revival illuminates the essential method of such meetings. There is hardly a successful evangelist at work today who does not depend mainly upon this personal work during the singing of the invitation songs.

No leader deceives himself with the idea that, amid the confusion and excitement of the hour, these personal workers could possibly sink an intelligible idea in any unsaved soul. The evangelist does not use personal workers as persons to seek and save the souls of other persons. He uses them as a factor in de-individualizing (it is an outlandish word!) the people and creating the crowd-soul.

What the evangelist wants is to get the situation broken up. He wants confusion, movement, a swaying of the crowd, excitement and curiosity and a sense of expectancy, lifting the crowd to a tiptoe of feeling, while he the while, above the buzz and roar and chatter, is wildly swinging his arms and shouting his perspiring exhortation to the throng.

The effect is to work chaos in the mind of each person similar to that exhibited by the crowd as a whole. Ideas are confused, logical connection is broken down, the sense of reality is lost, natural inhibitions are overcome, a certain feeling of detachment is induced and the individual finds himself caught up by the powerful currents of social feeling.

He is out and out momentary a victim of a hypnitized social situation, and the simplest thing in the world, the almost inevitable thing for him, is to go forward or stand up or do whatever the leader suggests.

But all this means the temporary breaking down of the structure of his own personality, the invasion of his personal right as a man to do his own thinking about God and his soul upon the basis of his own intelligence.

No informed evangelist who genuinely loves men as individuals and seeks to open up a well of living water in their inner souls will be the instrument of creating this hypnotic situation in the name of Christ.

If he is interested in building up a church, he might be deluded into the notion that this kind of success really builds up the

If he expects large donations at the close of his meetings there is no surer way to get them than to start in the people the habit of yielding to crowd suggestion.

But if he is genuinely and sincerely trying to make the highest type of men, and to put them into the control of Jesus Christ he will indignantly eschew all such methods. He will see that they work through an uncanny, hypnotic and unspiritual principle and cannot advance far the Kingdom of God.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

PRINCE ITO'S WORK

Ito, the first of living Japanese statesmen, has finished his work as Resident-General of Korea and returned to Tokio to become president of the Privy-Council. Under the Japanese form of government this is the first position in the affairs of the nation. The emperor pledges him the obedience of the people. Time was when this position meant more in England, but in the evolution of government the appointees of the monarch count progressively for less and officials elected by the people count for more. Japan is emerging. The parliament is not yet supreme. The mikado is not yet responsible to parliament. It is gravely discussed, however, and time is not far distant when he will be. Ito will be the active representative of the mikado instead of the prime minister. He will be chief adviser and administrator of the mikado's will, which means that the mikado will give official sanction to Ito's will much of the time.

In the '80s Ito welcomed western learning, especially science and medicine, but plainly told us our religion was not needed. He thought Japanese religion quite competent to care for Japanese needs. Today he never fails to speak a good word for Christianity. He has contributed generously to Y. M. C. A. work in Seoul, presided at the formal ceremonies of opening the Seoul building, and advised the youth of both Korea and Japan that they could do no better than to live up to the sublime precepts of the Man of Nazareth. He is today one of that increasing number of Japanese leaders who are seeing that Japan cannot conserve western material progress without a soul of western morality and that there can be no moral life assured aside from that religion assures.

Ito will continue to rule Korea. It will be done under the forms of diplomacy, but it will be effectual until Korea is "assimilated."

DEPARTYIZING CITY GOVERNMENT

City government is delivered into the hands of machine and boss rule by party elections. National issues have nothing to do with city administration. The most promising crusade is that which is endeavoring to departyize city government. Colorado Springs has taken the most radical step. Its new charter requires nominations by petition and each petitioner and the nominee must swear that the candidate is not a party candidate. The petitions cannot be filed on a blanket sheet, but must be by at least twenty-five individual certificates. On the ballot there will be no party marks. There will be a council of five of which one will be mayor and each of the five will be the administrative head of a department of public works.

A CITY REFERENDUM

Portland, Ore., has given the referendum a trial. There were thirty-five issues proposed. A discriminating vote carried thirteen of them and rejected twenty-two. The result does not show any radical tendency. The Des Moines plan of city government was defeated by a majority of two to one. It was bitterly opposed by all franchise corporations and the politicians. Their slogan was that it would be dangerous to put the administration of great sums of money into the hands of so small a number of men. The proposal that franchise holders should make quarterly reports was carried by a like vote of two to one. This certainly shows discrimination. The vehicle tax ordinance was defeated while on the other hand the proposal that the cost of water mains should be assessed to property benefiting was also defeated. Reform gained little, but it is better to get a fundamental principle like a successful use of the referendum, established, than it is to gain any particular reform.

TOM JOHNSON AND THREE CENT FARES

Tom Johnson has turned the enemy's flank and has the strategic position on the field again. He was generally believed to be defeated in his long battle for a three cent fare in Cleveland. In a referendum vote, after long and, to the common mind, rather confusing negotiations, he was defeated by 600 votes out of a total of 80,000. It was a close majority, but enough to count a defeat. The street car company conducted a characteristic "vested interest" election and many things were done that would not bear the light of good citizenship. Feeling secure in their victory they repudiated certain "gentlemen's agreements" and prepared for a resumption of power. Mayor Tom has always sought to be magnaminous to the corporation and was thus imposed upon in these late repudiations of "gentlemen's agreements." He now announces that it will be war to the knife hilt. He seems to have the advantage of position. The Supreme Court has decided that all the company's franchises expire within the next three years and the better part of them next January. They are now willing to beg for terms because the council stands firmly by the mayor. The mayor has the support of the council in proposing an ordinance for referendum that will provide for bids for the expired franchises on the basis of a flat three cent fare with a limit of 6 per cent dividends and provision that the city may take over the lines, at any time the legislature gives it authority, at $1.10 for every dollar actually invested. This is the clear cut issue forged out for the people after a nine years' campaign, and if they fail to ratify it, it will be because they either lack interest or prefer to pay a street monopoly five cents rather than pay three cents for a municipal enterprise.

STAMPS, TAGS, CARNATIONS AND CHARITY

The Red Cross devised the plan of selling stamps at Christmas tide for the help of its crusade on tuberculosis. They sold 15,000,000 and realized a net sum of $138,244. It aroused much interest in the cities and enlisted many givers. Tag-Day has for some time been a favorite expedient for hospital charity. The newspapers and churches and various societies give the day and undertaking publicity and tags are sold, all who buy wearing them during the day. Only a small sum is charged, but any sum is gladly received. It lends popular favor and civic pride to the undertaking and makes approach easy for those who solicit. It also becomes the "thing" to do with society and arouses enthusiasm for the object served. Recently Lynn, Mass., had a "carnation day," substituting the beautiful flower for the conventional tag. Everybody who would, wore the buttonhole decoration and $3,000 was realized. Louisville tried organizing a mammoth committee of 3,000 women to procure ten cents from each inhabitant of the city. They secured $3,100 or only a little over one dollar per worker. It would have been easier to have paid it than to get others to give it, but they doubtless would have failed to do that and the publicity given the crusade against the white plague would have been lost.

TOO MANY LAWS—NOT ENOUGH LAW

One wonders what becomes of the mass of laws added each year to the statute books. The Wisconsin legislature has closed a five months session and passed 581 bills. The governor vetoed twenty-six on grounds of unconstitutionality. This leaves 555 new laws; 1,567 bills were introduced. How many old laws were repealed, how many of the bills were emendations to existing laws, and how many were necessary routine bills, such as appropriations, does not appear, but with liberal allowance there must yet remain a vast accession to the code of the state. It would be interesting to analyze them and find how many were fundamental and how many expedients. It has been well said that we need more law and fewer laws.

WAS ROGERS PHILANTHROPIC?

The question uppermost with many curious minds has been, "how much did H. H. Rogers leave?" The wag remarks that he left all he had, not a cent went with him. It is probable that he left $80,000,000, a greater sum than Jay Gould left. But millions by the fifties and hundreds are much more common today than in the days of Gould, and excite less wonder. Whatever Mr. Rogers left he signalized his departure for another world by no notable benefactions. He had a provincial pride in his birthplace and enriched it with buildings and pavement which the citizens were amply able to furnish for themselves. This was not benevolence, but a sort of personal vanity, an endowing of the spot where the ego of the giver was nurtured. A man cannot well give wisely when he becomes philanthropist only at the time he makes his will. Russell Sage wisely left it to his philanthropic wife and Carnegie has devoted his declining years as assiduously to spending as he did his earlier years to getting. Mr. Rogers was more nearly the antithesis of the philanthropic than he was philanthropist.

THE SUGAR TRUST'S CONFESSION

The American Sugar Refining Company, the euphonious title of the notorious sugar trust, ruined its rival, the Pennsylvania Refining Company, by manipulation of a loan made through private parties, secured by voting rights in stock. The ruined company sued and the trust has settled. The sum paid is a secret, but is supposed to have been $10,000,000. How much is of less moment than the confession of guilt in making the settlement by means of a cash payment. The Attorney General of the United States is preparing to prosecute the trust as a final nemesis of recent revelations.

THE ILLINOIS BATTLE CRY

The Anti-Saloon League has raised aloft its fighting banner and given the battle cry of county option. The legislature that has just adjourned was frankly the worst the state has had for many years. The speaker had been able to mollify the temperance leaders into a passive attitude in his campaign for reëlection. He might have been impartial while himself voting with the liquor forces, as he did at the last session, but his election could only be obtained this session by an unholy combination of his machine cohorts with those of the notorious liquor dealers' attorney and leader of the Democratic machine cohorts, Lee O'Neal Brown. Thus he became the tool of the liquor forces and appointed a License Committee of saloon advocates. This committee reported out a bill that would nullify the present township option law and put it through the house, but refused a hearing even to temperance measures. The senate held up the above bill as a part of the obstructive program played by each house against the other and the cause won a victory in preventing a defeat. Before another year is gone every township in the state that has voted dry will be eligible for another vote on the proposition. It will be the testing time and the temperance forces will operate under the handicap of the tendency to reverse decisions. The league sounds a forward note. That is good fighting tactics.

LOCAL OPTION PROGRESS

Indiana has concluded her county option elections for the present. There are now seventy dry counties. County contests will begin in Washington soon. This will be a strike in new territory and bids fair to win. Washington will lead in redeeming the far west from the soot-covered map. Mahoning County, Ohio, held a notable election recently. It contains the manufacturing city of Youngstown, with 80,000 inhabitants. It has a large factory working population of unpronouncable names. Yet county prohibition was defeated by only a little over 1,000 votes.

SOME TEMPERANCE AMMUNITION

The Illinois Issue furnishes some shimose and shrapnel in the shape of facts that argue for dry territory. It uses the entire state of Illinois and analyzes it under three heads as is shown below. In every case the statistics of crime, insanity, poverty, and divorce show increase with the increasing number of saloons, while those for school attendance show a decrease as the saloons increase. Most telling is the fact that taxes increase with the increase of saloon licenses. Here is another testimony that the tax problem is not one of how to get more money, but how to spend honestly and economically and for the public good what we do get.

The table here given speaks for itself.

The following tables were compiled from the Official Report of the United States and the various departments of the State of Illinois—the latest year for which complete figures can be had.

Class I—(0-100 saloons per 100,000) 50 counties. (Class II—(100-200 saloons per 100,000) 30 counties. Class III—(200 or more saloons per 100,000) 22 counties.

	Class I.	Class II	Class III
Average number of saloons per 100,000	46	143	392
Admitted to jail for 100,000	206	347	435
Inmates of penitentiary per 100,000	33	47	60
Inmates in Reform and St. Charles schools per 100,000	20	27	28
Insane in asylums and almshouses per 100,000	203	218	250
Percentage of school attendance	78	72	66
Average tax rate	4.59	4.71	5.06
Taxes collected per capita	8.72	10.34	11.34
Divorces per 100,000	84	97	147

A Study of Two Southern Illinois Counties.

Edwards County has been without saloons for years. Alexander County has always been one of the wettest counties in the state.

	Edwards County	Alexander County
Average number of saloons for 100,000	0	200
Admitted to jail for 100,000	29	982
Inmates of penitentiary for 100,000	3	361
Inmates in reform and St. Charles schools per 100,000	0	66
Insane in asylums and almshouses for 100,000	193	300
Percentage of school attendance	83	57
Average tax rate	3.90	5.66
Taxes collected per capita	5.30	12.02
Divorces per 100,000	50	180

Conclusions: 1. This table embraces all of the State of Illinois: 2. Criminals, insane, taxes and divorces increase as saloons increase; 3. School attendance decreases as saloons increase; 4. And there is no exception to the rule.

The Inner Life of the Old Testament

On close study the great men of the Old Testament are seen to be not so much the militant and tireless contenders for better things that we have pictured them, but rather men who dwell much in silence and meditation, nurturing the powers of action in the quiet of the mighty hills, only to come forth in great movements like lions of the Lord, to fall upon his foes. Even in seemingly stormy lives like those of Samuel and Elijah how few are the scenes of contest, and how long are the intervals of calm. How brief are the volumes which record the public rebukes and exhortations of Amos, Hosea, Micah and Zephaniah; and though these must be merely the survivals of a much larger body of utterances, yet they imply long years of meditation on the sins of the people and the will of God, and are the rich gifts which only come from the deep and silent places of great souls. Isaiah's months of solitude while a hostile Ahaz devised his foolish plans for the Assyrian alliance, Ezekiel's two years of speechless brooding over the downfall of the city of God, and Jeremiah's heartbroken vow that he would speak no more in the divine name, afford glimpses of those wells of silence and of prayer out of which the water of life was drawn for the thirsting nation. Only such brooders of the quiet hours have found out the secret of God, and lived in the joy of the life within. To them alone are the waters of life revealed far in the depths. Others fail, for they have nothing to draw with and the well is deep.

Nor are the prophets the only companions of the inner way. A host of witnesses attests that joy in the fellowship of God which only the saints know. Sometimes their words are naive and childlike in their sense of solitary obedience, as when Caleb, the stout and unspent hero of eighty years says, "My brethren that went up with me made the heart of the people to melt, but I wholly followed the Lord my God." Sometimes there is a note of solemn warning in the confession of faith, as when Joshua, victorious over the clans of Canaan, speaks to Israel in the words, "Now, therefore, fear the Lord, and serve him in sincerity and truth, and if it seem evil to you, choose ye this day whom ye will serve. But as for me and my house, we will serve the Lord." Again, it is a king, Hezekiah, who on his bed of sickness, praises God for deliverance from the gates of death, and the lengthening of life, which means added years of prayer,

> "O Lord, I am oppressed, be thou my surety,
> It was for my peace that I had great bitterness,
> But thou hast in love to my soul delivered it.
> Thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back,
> The grave cannot praise thee, death cannot celebrate thee.
> The living, the living, he shall praise thee, as I do this day.
> The father to the children shall make known thy truth."

Reformers working at the task of reëstablishing Jerusalem yield to God the praise for every royal favor from Persian monarchs, as when Ezra writes in his journal, "Blessed be the Lord, the God of our fathers, which hath put such a thing as this into the King's heart, to beautify the house of the Lord which is in Jerusalem." Of the acts of devotion which marked the long journey to Judah he says, "Then I proclaimed a fast there at the river Ahava, that we might humble ourselves before our God, to seek of him a straight way for us and for our little ones."

Nehemiah, that great and humble-hearted man, with the sympathy of a mother, the fearlessness of a warrior, the generosity of a prince, the wisdom of a master-builder and the piety of a mystic, in the intervals of his labors with trowel and sword on the rising walls of Jerusalem, takes time to set down in his private book of days these words of childlike insistence that he shall not be forgotten of the Lord, "Remember unto me, O my God, for good, all I have done for this people." "Remember me, O my God, and wipe not out my good deeds which I have done for the house of my God and for the observances thereof." "Remember me, O my God, for good."

And what shall one say more, "For time would fail to tell of Gideon, Barak, Samson, of Jephthah, who through faith, this sense of God's reality and help, this power of the inner life, subdued kingdoms, wrought righteousness, obtained promises, stopped the mouths of lions, quenched the power of fire, escaped the edge of the sword, from weakness were made strong, waxed mighty in war, put to flight armies of aliens." These are the convincing proofs that behind the heroism and the urgencies of the Old Testament there lay the secret of the life with God. These men were not mere adventurers. Had such been the case, the world would long ago have forgotten them. It was not in the tumult of battle nor amid the shoutings of kings and captains that their glory was won. But rather in the silence where the still small voice is heard. There were kindled the altar fires of the soul,

"The tumult and the shouting dies,
The captains and the kings depart
Still stands thine ancient sacrifice
A humble and a contrite heart."

They were pilgrims to the city of God, albeit they were pilgrims of the dawn. They saw as in a mirror, dimly, but they were content to wait for for the day when they should see face to face.

The Baptist preachers of Chicago spoiled a fine editorial we had prepared for this week on "The Broadening Church." At their first meeting for consideration of the case of Professor George B. Foster, they passed a resolution affirming their belief in certain evangelical doctrines and repudiated the teaching of Professor Foster, but they declined to cast him out of their association. Whereupon our pen was moved to set down certain things that we imagined were significant in connection with this case. It seemed to us that there was much more significance in what they did not do than in what they did do. Of course nobody would suspect the Baptist ministers of helding to the views Dr. Foster has expressed. As yet we have to hear of the first minister in evangelical ranks who defends the positions the professor has taken. He is the most radical innovator any evangelical denomination has had to deal with. Compared with him Briggs, Swing, H. P. Smith, McGiffert, Crapsey, Bowne and the rest, are shining lights of orthodoxy. Most heretics are limited to two or three items in their offending,. Here is a man, however, who offends orthodoxy in the definition of almost every cardinal concept of historic Christianity. And yet the Baptist preachers have traveled so far toward the goal of religious tolaration that they refuse to cast him out. Certainly the church is broadening and the kingdom coming and the age-long fight between religion and science is ended if the Baptists can stretch their principle of liberty so as to take in Professor Foster. We had gone about that far in our editorial when the news came that at a subsequent meeting the preachers had thrown the heretic out by a vote of 40 to 10!

The work of the National Bible School Association of which Marion Stevenson is superintendent, deserves to be called especially to the attention of the brotherhood just now. The calendar is so crowded with "days" and interests of various sorts that this most vital enterprise is easily overlooked. During July and August, however, our hearts are free to consider the improvement of our schools, both in upbuilding and in the improvement of its instructional function. They who best see the problem of the modern church attach more and more importance to the work of the Sunday-school. It must not be left to run itself. The times demand equipped leaders here. The character and effectiveness of the church of tomorrow depends upon the thoroughness with which the Sunday-school does its work today. In Mr. Stevenson our schools have a capable leader. The reports that come from his meetings in local schools indicate that his work is stimulating and helpful. Our great brotherhood will not fail to hold up his hands.

The bass note with which all variations in the music of this commencement season harmonize is that of service. Hardly a commencement oration, certainly not a baccalaureate sermon, has been delivered in this year of grace, 1909, except running through it all was the theme of the obligation of culture to serve human welfare. How, in the sound of such a mighty chorus of voices, any person can be so utterly stupid as to be anxious lest our colleges are undermining church or home or state, passes our comprehension. There is an obvious irony in the fact that a certain Mr. Bolce should be writing his series of articles about "Blasting at the Rock of Ages," or some such title, while the very men against whom he makes his outlandish charges are every week speaking before college audiences on behalf of a higher morality than the world ever knew.

That the remarkable development of missionary responsibility and zeal among Disciples of Christ in the last ten years is a substantial and serious growth is evidenced by the encouraging gains made in the offerings of our societies up to date in this Centennial year. Every mail brings encouragement to the American society, and the foreign officers report to us that their receipts are in excess of last year by $42,595, or 32 per cent. Every pastor and Sunday-school superintendent should see to it that the offering is sent in promptly. And now we turn toward Church Extension. Let every church name for itself the particular day of September on which it will be most desirable to take the offering and begin now and work it up with vim.

Certainly our "funny column" does not contain a richer joke than that actual occurrence at the Baptist Ministers' Conference the other day. A minister was reviewing Professor Foster's book. He was enumerating the items of his indictment of the book and, among the rest, mentioned this, "The book says that if a man declares he believes the Bible literally he is a 'knave.'" Someone interrupted him with a request to repeat the word. "Knave," responded the reveiwer. "Spell it, please," came from the floor. "K-n-a-v-e," with a world of assurance in his tone. Thereupon the brother from the floor rose up, holding a copy of the book in his hand and read the statement which showed the word to be "naive"! Without apology or even a faint flush of embarrassment, the critic proceeded with his tirade.

Rev. Lathrop Cooley, one of the honored pioneer preachers of Ohio, delivered an address on Alexander Campbell, at Paynesville, Ohio, March 10, 1866, shortly after the death of the venerable leader of the reformation. This address was published in a convenient pamphlet at the request of the elders of the Paynesville church, where the original address was delivered, and it has now been republished in this centennial year at the request of the Ministerial Association of the Disciples of Christ in Cleveland. It is a document of unusual interest coming, as it does, from the moment of the great leader's death.

Credo

I believe in one God, just, merciful and holy: eternal in being, infinite in wisdom, unchangeable in purpose, adorable in majesty, ineffable in perfection; forever blessing and forever blessed. I believe in God as the absolute and only good: in whom their is peace beyond all unrest; harmony beyond all discord; victory beyond all defeat: I believe that the whole creation is moving towards the fulness of his glory, and that he is forever reconciling the world unto himself. I believe in a divine universe, revealing the eternal mind unto a perfect day; radiant with the beauty of God; the temple of his holiness, built and still building; the word of his wisdom, spoken and speaking forever; the habitation of souls: I believe in the reign of love: I believe in the everlasting gospel of the kingdom of God—everlasting and therfore ever-renewed, ever-living in its essence and therefore ever-changing in its form. I believe that I am in God; and of God; that he is mine and that I am his; that from him I came forth and to him I return; that by him I am thoroughly known, righteously judged, and graciously loved. I believe that man is free and responsible; immortal and divine; becoming better, wise in becoming wiser, dying to live: and I believe in the inexhaustible riches of eternal truth, immutable in of one nature with God; imperfect but called to perfection; good in essence, but endless in progression and all-comprehensive in diversity. This I believe: a covenant and a promise; a light of the life that is; an assurance of life to come; true but incomplete; sufficing for present knowledge, but falling short of the glory that shall be revealed: I believe that other words will be given, though we cannot bear them now: and I look for the fuller vision yet to be; and for the endless transformation of all souls into the nearer likeness of God.—Printed anonymously in the Hibbert Journal.

THE LEADERS OF THE MOVEMENT.

The account of the success of the Disciples would not be complete without reference to the personalities that initiated the movement. Other men as leaders would have created a different history to record. It can not be understood entirely apart from Thomas and Alexander Campbell, any more than the German Reformation can be understood apart from Luther and Melanchthon, or the Scottish Reformation apart from Knox.

Men of Talent.

First of all, they were talented men. Both of the Campbells possessed elements of native ability which would have distinguished them in any calling. They were destined by endowment to be leaders of men. They could have made even a weak cause partially successful. The story of Thomas Campbell's life before coming to America bears witness to his distinction. He was set apart by his fellows in Ireland as a leader among them. He was trusted and looked up to by those who knew him best. A conclusive instance of this was the leadership bestowed upon him in the New World by that company of immigrants who had been his neighbors in the Old World. They were the ones who followed him when he left the Seceder Church, and became the nucleus of the Christian Association of Washington.

The Declaration and Address is the only significant literary remains of Thomas Campbell, but it bears witness to a rare order of intellectual genius. It discloses his personality as completely as any biographical narrative has done. Its dignity of style and courtesy of address, betray these qualities in the author; as its classic chasteness of language and its gentleness of spirit with firmness of conviction, reveal the dominant purity and courage of his character.

Alexander Campbell.

But his son Alexander was more highly endowed by nature for intellectual leadership and mastery of men than the father. He impressed men in all walks of life with his giant nature. At twenty-two years of age leadership and defence of a religious movement passed from father to son. The father was gradually eclipsed by his more brilliant son, and though he lived for nearly half a century beyond the writing of the Declaration and Address, he produced nothing that has been found worthy of a place beside it.

As a theological writer and public speaker, and as a master of men, Alexander Campbell was one of the greatest leaders in the history of the church. He accomplished his work by the sheer logical force of his intellect and power of moral persuasion. He was not an organizer and did not depend upon ecclesiastical machinery. His cause, his ideas and his principles, were urged and defended in an open forum. Both in the newspaper and upon the public platform before audiences of all his fellow-citizens, he was obliged to meet and vanquish every enemy.

Value of Public Debate.

Such a method of defence and advocacy was truly American. It was copied from the political sphere where men argued their principles in the open and made their appeal for the popular suffrage. Public religious debates were not common among the conflicting sects of the time. But Campbell early chose this method for propagating his ideas, and made the debate a prevailing custom if not almost an institution among his followers. Speaking of this peculiar genius of Campbell, Prof. A. H. Newman says: "He was possessed of a powerful personality and was one of the ablest debaters of his age. In the use of caricature and sarcasm he has rarely been surpassed. Throughout the regions he chose for the propagation of his views the number of Baptist ministers who could in any way approach him in argumentative power, or in ability to sway the masses of the people, was very small."

Educated Men.

They were educated men.

The native endowments of these leaders were enhanced by such education as the time afforded. The formal education of Thomas Campbell was more complete than that of Alexander; but the son supplemented his education by private discipline, which left him in no wise behind his father. The educational bent was strong in both. They were both organizers of schools and colleges and life-long teachers. They knew the languages and literatures of ancient Greece and Rome, the unfailing marks of educated men in their day; and they knew the modern authors and books in all fields of English learning.

German learning was just beginning to be made known to the English speaking world in the formative period of their education. It was not until the second quarter of the nineteenth century that the ideas and writings of German philosophers and scholars were introduced to English readers. By that time the intellectual bent of the Campbells had become fixed, and their careers unchangeably marked out. They show no acquaintance with those creative religious thinkers of Germany who have molded modern religious thought in both Europe and America.

Consecrated Men.

They were consecrated and devout men.

Their love of the Christian Religion and devotion to human well-being left no doubt of their sincerity and piety upon the minds of men. They were devoted to human well-being according to their light and according to the needs and humanitarian forms of their age. It was intellectual and educational. The age of modern practical and missionary philanthropy was just opening.

The needs of men which appealed to the Campbells and were the outgrowth of their own experience were religious needs. They sought and applied a remedy to the needs they saw. They were philanthropists in that sense, and consecrated themselves wholly to the redemption of the church and of society from the evils that afflicted them.

Such were the men who laid the foundations of a further reformation of the church, and by the strength and nobility of their characters won the attention and the respect of men for their principles. Lesser lights would have buried the movement in their own obscurity and feebleness.

They drew to their support in the early days many men of like parts with themselves: Adamson Bentley, Walter Scott, P. S. Fall, John Smith, Jacob Creath, Barton W. Stone, Wm. Hayden, J. T. Johnson. These men commended their cause by the characters and gifts they bore, and drew to themselves in the newly opening western country the best men of the community.

The movement had on its side from the beginning a winning combination of enlightenment and respectability, with the courage and assurance of the truth.

A Classification of Church Members

By William Oeschger

This classification is not made so much for the benefit of the present generation as it is for the future church sociologist who may wish to make comparisons between the members of the churches in their day and the members of the churches today, in this our Centennial year. The classification that is here made is the result of a pretty wide induction of the facts as they exist in "Old Indiany," the center of our brotherhood. The membership in our churches in this year of our Lord, 1909 (future generations will please take note of the year when making comparison), may be divided into four distinct and well-defined classes. They may be designated as Nonesters, Somesters, Onceters, and Twiceters. Of the Nonesters it may be said that they never come to church. They are members of the church, but are never found at any of its services. It is needless to say to the present generation that the members of this class are also Nonesters when it comes to giving of their means to the support of the kingdom of God. They have no part or lot in that kind of work. The Nonester is consistent. He votes a straight ticket. He does not ask much from the church. All he wants is a letter from the church when he moves into another community, stating that he was a member of the church at so and so in full fellowship and good standing.

The second class, the Somesters, have some things about them that the Nonesters did not possess. The Somesters do come to church sometimes. They always come when they feel like coming. They come sometimes when the weather just suits them. They come sometimes when their is no other place to go to, which might give them more pleasure than the church service gives them. The Somesters do not go to church out of a sense of duty or a desire to worship God. They are to be seen at church mostly on special occasions, unless the special occasion be a time when missions hold the board, then of course they do not feel like coming to church. When it comes to supporting the church they are Somesters also. Some of them pledge something for the church and pay something of the something that they have pledged if they do not need the money for something else. It is a case of something with these Somesters, but just what that something will be it is sometimes very hard to tell.

In the third class, the Onceters, we have a class that for once makes a grade of 100 per cent on deportment. This class is to be found at church once on every Sunday. They always come to the morning service. They are rarely ever seen at the evening service. They are literally "children of the light." They cannot find their way to the church after it gets dark. They do not seem to be able to go about after the sun goes down on Sunday evenings. These Onceters are a fine lot of people. They have great financial and social influence in the community. They possess moral strength and financial ability, and most of them are willing to part with it to a goodly extent for the kingdom of God. They give of their money, and of their time, except on Sunday evenings, to the church. They have a constitutional aversion against going to church on Sunday nights. They are fixed for "once," and nothing can move them.

Like Moody's mule. "They are established in one thing, going to church only once a day and no more." With these Onceters it is "once." The Twiceters, the fourth class, is a class that can find its way to the church twice every Sunday. Were I to give them another name I would call them "The Pastor's Delight." They have no fear of the darkness nor of the light. No night is so dark but that they can find their way to the house of God. The Word of God is a lamp to their feet and a light to their pathway. They walk in the light of life, and hence there are no Sunday nights dark and stormy enough to keep them away from the sanctuary. These Twiceters are a great comfort to the minister. Of their means they give freely to the cause of Christ, and of their time they are never sparing. These Twiceters love God. Were Jesus crucified again on earth they would be last at the cross and first at the tomb. The Twiceters are the chief hoisters in the kingdom of God. If all the Nonesters, and all the Somesters, and all the Onceters, would become Twiceters, the kingdom for which Christ prayed when he said, "Thy Kingdom come," would come before this present generation passed to its reward. May the men who in future years shall lead the spiritual hosts have no Nonesters, few Somesters, more Onceters, and a numberless number of Twiceters.

Biblical Problems

By Professor Willett

What works would you recommend on the doctrine of atonement?

The following are among the best that have appeared on this subject:

Atonement and Personality, R. C. Moberly (Longmans, Green & Co.); The Doctrine of Salvation, George B. Stevens (Scribners); The Nature of the Atonement, J. McLeod Campbell (Macmillan); The Atonement and Modern Culture, Sabatier (Putnam).

A correspondent in Indiana sends a copy of an article from the "Truth Seeker," an infidel organ of New York. The title of the article is "The Worst Man in History," and the subject is King David. This type of literature was very common a generation ago in papers which made it their business to attack the Christian faith. It has largely pased out of vogue because a better acquaintance with the Bible has removed most of the force of such tirades. It is clear that a long series of offenses may be charged up against David, and the frank disclosure of these elements in his character is one of the most notable facts in Old Testament history. How easy it would have been for his biographers to suppress these unfavorable items had it not been their definite purpose to reveal the man as he actually was and the very struggles through which he passed to become even the measurably good man he became in his later years.

If the small critics who deal in this shallow manner with the character of David had the slightest acquaintance with the ethics of antiquity they would know that not one of the sins charged against him by the biblical writers would have caused a moment's comment or the slightest criticism on the part of his contemporaries. To kings of that age man's life and woman's honor were as nothing in comparison with the will of the monarch. Yet David passed through disciplines, suffered rebukes, and came into the possession of a character which are out of all comparison with the lives of men untouched in some true sense by the spirit of God. The lives of all such men are the result of struggle. Their purposes are often excellent but their passions strong. They fall and sometimes make no effort to rise. Not so with David. His life is the best example of a man who under ordinary circumstances would have been only a self-seeking tyrant and royal voluptuary, but who, because of prophetic instruction and rebuke and because of the guidance of his own conscience, rose to a level unapproached by any king of that age. These are the facts which every student of history has to face. The character of David is not significant because of its freedom from evil, but because of its gradual conquest of evil even in a rough and brutal age.

It must also be remembered that the very critic who imagines he has laid bare some frightful inconsistency in biblical teaching when he revels in the sins of David's life, is himself the product of a Christian civilization which has given him every element of that meagre sensitiveness to evil which he exhibits. The only power any man of our generation has to criticize the ethics of the Old Testament or to pride himself on a morality superior to that of its characters is derived from the teaching of Christianity itself. Not one of these shallow carpers who parade the sins of Bible characters as arguments against the Book itself would for a moment think of exchanging the community in which he lives for one in which the ethics of Jesus do not prevail. Christians have no desire to claim too much for themselves in the way of superior virtue. And they often place mistaken and undue emphasis upon the claims of the Old Testament as a record of righteousness and a moral text book. But never do they equal in complacent ignorance of the facts or overweening conceit the type of man who writes those infidel diatribes, attempting to discredit the Christian faith because of the confessed mistakes of its representatives either in Christian history or the New Testament, much less of those forerunners of Christianity of whom the Old Testament speaks. The difference between the Christian and such superficial writers is that the former confesses himself imperfect and is trying by the help of his Master to cleanse his life and to regenerate human society. The latter denies all necessity for such effort and declines to participate in it either for his own moral uplift or the betterment of society. The value of such an attitude can easily be recognized. He who runs may read.

"I went one Sunday," said a minister, "to fill the place of a sick pastor in a North Dakota town. When I got there I found it was arranged that I should preach in the Presbyterian church in the morning, in the Congregational church in the afternoon, in the United Presbyterian church in the evening. I did so. Then I said to a man of evident prominence in the town:

"'I have had the same congregation three times today.'

"'Yes,' he answered, 'we're friendly; we attend one another's churches, and help one another out. We have to. There are nine churches here and only 1,200 people. There aren't enough people to go round.'

"'What's the financial condition of your churches?'

"'Oh, they're all weak. Every church in town is living on home mission money.'"

Up to date this seems to be the prize story of church overlapping.—The Interior.

Fairly Ashamed of Father

BY F. M. G.

"What's come over our little lass, mother? It seems to me she's got too big for the likes of us."

The speaker was a large, florid-looking man, with brown hair streaked with gray, rather long, grizzled beard, ruddy complexion and kindly blue eyes.

Breakfast was just over, but he and his wife were still sitting at the table in the back room of a small house with a pretentious name in the suburbs of one of our large towns. The name, bestowed by the builders, was the only pretentious thing about the house. The furniture generally reflected the taste and means of a fairly prosperous small shopkeeper, who had done well in his wn line, but had not risen above it.

They kept no servant, but the mahogany sideboard shone as brightly as elbow-grease could make it, while the crimson red curtains and brightly burning fire added comfort and cheerfulness to the little room.

"I tell you what it is mother" went on the man without waiting for a reply, "it's that 'finishing-school' we sent her to. She was right enough before she went there, but they've gone and put new-fangled notions into the child's head, and she's come home too clever for her old dad."

The man's voice trembled on the last words. "No! it's no use your talkin', mother," as his wife raised a deprecating hand.

"I've seen it in a many things; trifles, maybe, but a feather's enough to show which way the wind blows. Why, the other day, when I saw her in the street with that smart friend of hers she's just taken up with, she looked as if she would do anything to get out of meetin' me; and when I put my hand on her shoulder, natural-like, just as I used to do before she went away, I could feel her almost squirm under it. . . . I suppose my grammar wasn't right," he went on, looking anxiously at his wife, "or maybe my coat was dusty. I'd been workin' 'ard in the shop all day; but whatever it was, Mary, she was fairly ashamed of her father. . . . It's makin' me feel sort of shy and strange with my own girl," and the man's voice broke. "I couldn't have believed my little lass would ever think small of her old dad."

His wife, a somewhat worn, but sweet-faced woman, with smooth, brown hair parted over a brow still serene in spite of wrinkles, heard him patiently to the end.

"Wait a bit, John, my man," she said at last in a low, sympathetic voice, "the child's young; she'll get over this and be your own little lass again."

"I hope you're right, mother," replied the man with a sigh. "I hope you're right. . . . Well," he got up hurriedly, "I must be off once more."

The outside door banged behind him, but the wife sat on. Only too well she realized the truth in her husband's words. And what could she do? She knew that she herself had not the full confidence of her daughter as she once had, and how approach her on a difficult subject like this?

Dropping her head in her hands, she prayed for the guidance that had so often steered her through difficult places, and then, with heart somewhat lightened, she set about her household tasks for the day.

Not many days after an opportunity came. The winter's evening was drawing in. The day's work was almost done. The crimson curtains were drawn and the tea table ready. The kettle was singing on the hob, and the te pot warming on the hearth, only waiting for the sound of the father's footsteps for tea to be made. There were still a few minutes before he was expected, and mother and daughter were resting after their labors. The mother sat in a low chair before the fire, and Molly on the floor beside her. She was a bonny, healthy-looking girl, with brown hair, in color like her mother's, but which, instead of being smoothly parted, was drawn loosely back and fluffed round her forehead in tiny ringlets. Her eyes showed her father's blue, but otherwise the girl was like her mother. The expression was sweet, too, on the whole, but just now the mouth was spoiled by a slightly discontented droop at the corners.

There had been a short silence between the two, but at last the mother broke it.

"You have given up those walks with your father you used to have before you went away, Molly," she said, gently. "I think—in fact, I am sure—he misses them."

"Yes, I know, mother," replied the girl, speaking slowly, and looking thoughtfully into the fire; "but——Mother," she broke out, raising her head suddenly and looking into her mother's face, "have you noticed"—she hesitated, and then went on quickly—"how rough my father has got since I've been away? And——" The girl stopped suddenly, conscience stricken by her mother's pained expression.

For a moment there was a strained silence in the little room. Then the mother leaned forward and spoke in her usual low tones.

"I will tell you about your father," she said. "When we first married we were very poor. The whole of the savings of the two of us, which did not amount to much, had been invested in the little shop your father had just opened. More than that, there were heavy bills staring us in the face—bills from the wholesale dealers, whose goods were still to sell, and bills for the furniture we had been obliged to get even for that little place. We lived over the shop at that time, as you know. Your father worked early and late, and God prospered his efforts. One by one the bills were paid off."

The mother spoke slowly, as if she loved to linger over the memories of those early days.

"And then you came—and that meant more debts; but a new joy and pride had come into your father's life, and the work somehow seemed less burdensome to him then, even though there were three to keep instead of two. Nothing was too good for the little lass"—she uttered the words lovingly, almost reproducing the father's tone—"everything must be the best he could afford—ay, and sometimes better than he could afford. Molly, I've known him go round to the shop windows where the children's things were all set out, and something there would take his fancy and he would come straight home to me. "Mother," he would say, "I've seen just the thing for the little lass" and he would go on to describe it—'Ay! and she shall have it too!'—'But, what's the price, John?' I would put in. 'Ay! Mother, that's the rub,' he would say as he mentioned a sum far beyond our small means—'but we'll do it somehow.' And he did it, too—but he never told me how—and it wasn't until the day that I came upon his tobacco pouch empty and cast aside in a drawer that I understood. I had wondered why he left off smoking, but he made out it didn't agree with him and I thought no more about it. But the real reason dawned upon me when I found that pouch. Smoking was the one luxury he allowed himself and even that he gave up!"

The girl had drawn herself up, and was sitting almost rigid with attention, listening eagerly to her mother's words.

"And then you grew older," she went on; and he was proud of you. You toddled about with him everywhere at home, and he would turn and look back at you as you stood at the gate in the morning, waving his hand again and again, until he turned the corner of the street. But I think he was the proudest when you came out top of your form at the school here—he could hardly contain himself that day.

"Mother, our little lass will have to go to a different school soon," he said, when he came home. "Why, she's almost beaten them all there now."

"And for the next year or two the spare pennies went in the little 'school box,' as he called it."

"There it is still," she said, as she raised her eyes to a shabby, little wooden box that stood at the end of the mantelpiece. The girl's eyes followed her look, but she could hardly see for the tears that blinded her.

"And then the day came when you went and he was left behind"—she paused. "That was the hardest thing I have had to bear in the whole of my married life—to see him so miserable and lonely, and to be able to do so little to cheer him. But later on he did cheer up, and then all his talk was of the time when you would finish school and come home to stay."

"At last the two years were over—and then you came—and then——."

"Oh, mother, don't go on," broke in the girl. I know the rest and I can't bear to hear it." And burying her head in her mother's lap, she sobbed biterly.

The mother stroked the brown hair tenderly. "His love is just the same for his little lass," she whispered. "And there is still time to make amends, dear."—Christian World.

Our Church Men

By John R. Ewers

"POUNDING AWAY AT IT."

A mighty effort is being made in certain quarters to solve the Brotherhood problem. In these columns I have described some of the solutions, and have always suggested that no one plan can be made to function in every field. From Mr. J. M. Appel of Springfield, Ill., I have the report which follows. The report is in itself a man's job, put up in clean, concise, businesslike style, typewritten on good paper and not the mess of pen scratches and blots that some pious and lazy "brethren" send in.

Please notice the excellent program of the Springfield group. The Relief Committee is given first place. Anyone knows that one of the strong features of lodges is this protective idea. The Peoria Brotherhood was one of the first to work out this conception. We must not neglect the poor brother. The church has already been accused of being a rich man's club with too much truth. The new pastor of Rockefeller's church in Cleveland has announced as his program, work for the poor of that city. To visit the sick, to show brotherly consideration at burial, to assist the needy family, is real service.

Committee on Employment.

The next committee, that on Employment, is closely akin to this idea, and shows the practical trend of the men at the Illinois capital. Every pastor knows of many cases where men have been tied up to the church because church men have helped them, when out of work, in locating new positions. I have several definite cases in mind right now. This is real brotherliness.

The committee on Labor Union is rather startling. That could not be worked everywhere. For instance, here in Youngstown most of the mills are "open shop," since the great strike of five years ago. The union idea here is a most delicate one. However, I have not hesitated to endorse the union idea from the pulpit and to show that collective bargaining is right. The hostility of one church and pastor to the union idea has lost that church every workingman it had.

The committee on Civic Affairs gets the endorsement of my whole heart. The men of the churches ought to run the politics of a town. They can if they will. I know they can. I have seen it demonstrated. A federation of church men can clean up any city on earth. The job is to get them federated—and perhaps, to get them Christianized.

The committee on Federated Brotherhoods has this problem before it. The results are so rich that the hardest toil is repaid. We shall watch this committee's work and I would be pleased to have their report in six months from now.

The Pastor's Staff is a novel idea. It would be interesting to have their work defined. Are they to work out financial plans? Are they to call on the sick? Are they to and various games. Base ball, foot ball and follow the Cleveland plan and go out calling two by two on men? Let us hope the pastor can lean upon said staff without falling.

Men and Mid-week Service.

It is refreshing to hear of a committee on Prayer Meeting. Perhaps these men can make the mid-week service a time for bringing reports of calls, positions secured, laws enforced, and other tasks accomplished. If to this they will add their honest testimony as to the real value of Jesus to them and the joy of service, no doubt the prayer meeting will take on new life. The prayer meeting needs honest testimony, and nothing else can take the place of this. When testimony went out, the prayer meeting died.

The Bible School committee is most up-to-date. Just what it can do is a question, for already the best men of the church are putting their best energies into the school. A big men's class might be maintained efficiently.

And last, but not least, the committee on Athletics. I know of one pastor who filled his church with choice young men in one of the most aristocratic suburbs of one of our greatest cities, by making much of clean athletics. I know of another church where the men are considering building a guild house and having in connection a gymnasium and various games. Base ball, foot ball and tennis are legitimate as well as hammer throwing, shot putting, track work, boxing, shooting, and good indoor games for inclement weather. Every man needs some interest outside his grinding work. Every man needs to keep up his play instinct. You are old as soon as you cease to care f orplay. A game of ball would do a lot for some of our old whiskers who have an inordinate love for theology, and who hunt only heretics with pen points. It is bad enough to have a spinister jab you with a hat pin, but to be punctured by the pen of a theologian is the limit.

And yet, I have a vague fear for this Springfield Program. It is almost too good to be true. One wonders how many of these excellent ideas will be worked out. The vision alone is something. Perhaps it would have been better to have chosen one of these worthy ambitions and to have made good on that. It will do these fellows good to be watched. The eyes of many witnesses will inspire them. And so we say to the men at the capital, "Go it, you are being watched. Success attend you!"

Following is the report:

Brotherhood of the First Christian Church of Springfield, Illinois.

In response to invitation from its Treasurer, Dr. H. T. Morrison, the Brotherhood of the First Christian Church of Springfield, Illinois, held its regular monthly meeting on Tuesday evening, June 15, at Logan Place, First and Miller streets. The meeting had been called as an informal business gathering, and was unbridled by any set stunts or program. About one hundred were assembled on the spacious lawn. Young men, middle aged men, gray haired men, but every one a Christian man, drawn to the meeting, not by the promise of a chicken-pie supper or a musical entertainment, but by a desire to lend a hand and be a part in the work of an efficient brotherhood in the church and in the community. Every officer was there. The popular pastor of the church, F. W. Burnham, was much in evidence, and there seemed to be a rivalry among the fellows in the matter of paying their regular dues to the treasurer.

The meeting was opened with prayer and songs, and when the chairman announced that it should be devoted to planning and mapping out work, definite, pressing and productive work, there were cheers of applause, and figuratively speaking, every fellow proceeded to roll up his sleeves. Side by side sat the professional man and the farmer; the merchant and the clerk; the coal operator and the miner, the capitalist and the day laborer, all bound together by the ties of Christian brotherhood. Everybody was made to feel at ease and at home and it was gratifying to hear men talk, and talk intelligently, who had never talked in public before. Through the chairman, the executive committee—who had given the matter much thought—recommended several lines of activity and the appointment of committees to lead off in the work. After several hours of profitable discussion the appointment of the following committees was ordered:

1. The Relief Committee.
2. Committee on Employment.
3. Committee on Union Labor.
4. Committee on Civic Affairs.
5. Committee on Federation Brotherhoods.
6. Pastor's Staff.
7. Committee on Prayer Meeting.
8. Committee on Bible School.
9. Committee on Athletics.

In connection with the appointment of the Committee on Relief and the Committee on Union Labor, the following Resolutions were adopted:

"Resolved, That the Brotherhood of the First Christian Church express its interest in the work of the Board of Associated Charities of our city, our desire to co-operate with said Board, and that we tender the aid of the Chairman of our Brotherhood Relief Committee as a representative to said Board of Charities."

"Resolved, That the Brotherhood of the First Christian Church recognizes the importance of modern unionism, that we express to the various labor unions represented in the church and the city our sincere interest in their endeavors to better the conditions of their members, and that we constitute a standing committee on Union Labor, consisting of one member of each union having a member of our Brotherhood."

The announcement of the various committees will soon be made and active work begun. Strong efforts will be put forth to enroll every adult male member of the church into the active fellowship of the Brotherhood. the officers are:

President—J. M. Appel.
Vice President—G. A. Hulett.
Secretary—Saunders Haynes.
Treasurer—H. T. Morrison.
Chaplain—H. C. Latham.

Chicago Secretary Discusses Weakness of Disciples in Northern Illinois.

After having visited district conventions all over Illinois, we closed the route with the convention near at home, at Princeton. There can be nothing that will give one a better conception of the greatness of our old state than such a series of trips as we have taken this spring. The magnitude of our commonwealth, the richness of its natural resources and the enterprise of its people make an impression that can never leave one. This same thing is true with regard to the study of the Disciples. We have eight hundred churches in Illinois. These churches are sometimes small cross-roads affairs, but in the richer part of the state we are the leading religious body. We have great church buildings and the people wait upon our ministry as upon no other.

The First district convention at Princeton brought us back into our old diocese. Here we ministered seven years in what was at first a mission church, but what is now probably the strongest church of the district, that at Rockford, where W. D. Ward is pastor. Here we served for three years as district secretary, becoming acquainted with some of the common problems of the churches.

Records of a Meeting in 1839.

The First district organization is quite an old one. The secretary's book records that a meeting was held in 1839 to organize all northern Illinois into a district. The names of some of the pioneer preachers and some of the early churches are there. There is an interesting newspaper clipping from a Chicago paper telling of a society in Chicago which passed a resolution denouncing the "Campbellites" and planning their extermination. In those days there was a church in Rockford, ministered to by a man of God who prepared his sermons at the end of the furrow while the horses rested, Brother Waldo. That old church organization died about twenty years ago. The church at Batavia was in existence and was represented. There were churches in towns where we now look longingly and plan the organization of a new work. As the records proceed, we learn that Ben Franklin, ardent evangelist and zealous foe of missionary society and organ, preached all over northern Illinois, holding meetings and establishing churches.

What is the Matter with Northern Illinois?

We have often asked the question, what is the matter with our work in northern Illinois? In the First district we have the smallest number of churches and the smallest number of Disciples of the districts of the state. How shall we explain this defeat, while we have met only victory in the central and southern portions of Illinois? The lesson of a defeat is sometimes as valuable as the lesson of a victory.

First of all, northern Illinois is recruited with a different class of people. While there is now strata upon strata of foreign element in these factory towns, the original settler was of Puritan blood. The Puritan churches thrived. Central and southern Illinois was settled by Kentuckians who originally came from Virginia. Some have ridiculed the idea that northern Illinois is different from central Illinois. To ridicule the differences between Cavalier and Puritan is to fail at the outset in missionary operations. We cannot enter into the reasons, but our plea has always been congenial to the Cavalier and never to the Puritan. This helps to answer the question why are we weak in northern Illinois.

Another reason of our weakness, has been that the most pugnacious type of our ministry has appeared from time to time in northern Illinois. Beginning with Ben Franklin, this has been true. A man even in recent years ruined a great opportunity in Belvidere by announcing a program that he would abuse the "sectarians" until they came to hear him. In southern Illinois, this had worked. In Belvidere, as all over northern Illinois, this program met dismal failure. We did not establish a church there. While northern Illinois has always held to denominational lines with loyalty, this part of the state detects ministerial "buncombe" with particular celerity.

Lack of Educated Ministry.

Again, our educated ministry has not settled here as in other parts of the state. There are notable exceptions now as always. But the farmer preacher preached here long after he had been superseded by the college man down state. These educated men were ncessary to churches that could secure no other. Theirs was a most faithful ministry. But they could never hold their own by the side of the finest educated ministry in the state which was filling the Puritan pulpits of northern Illinois. If there is any section of the state that will require our highest type of ministry, it is in this section where graduates of great universities who have had finishing courses in Germany, fill the other pulpits.

A further difficulty in northern Illinois has been the marked preference of the missionary boards for the village rather than the manufacturing city. Fifteen years ago not a county seat town on the northern border of Illinois except Waukegan had a Christian church. The valiant old Dr. Lucas had to precipitate a floor fight in the convention, the year the first appropriation was secured for Rockford. In recent years the district has gone into Freeport and Savanna. But it is now quite late in most of these cities to establish a work easily. In Freeport, where the National Hospital and Sanitarium Association maintains a Nurses' Training School and other good work in connection with the Sanitorium, we are getting together a good church. The work here can be duplicated in many other good towns in northern Illinois.

A part of the difficulty in northern Illinois, has been the factious character of many of the church groups that have made the original nucleus. In Elgin, we have had three churches and the last one died recently. In Aurora we have had church difficulties till the secretaries are in despair. In Joliet we have had everything in the way of unfavorable advertising in the town. In the first district this has appeared from time to time. The reason is to be found in the character of the evangelist who founded the church in some cases. He fought the "sects." When they failed to respond, the saints pounded each other. This original bent was fostered by a strong predominance of such journalism among the Disciples as has been most given to holy warfare. O. F. J.

Many false excuses for our weakness in northern Illinois have been made. Some say we went in late. This the record disproves. Some say that heretics have ruined the churches. But the very preachers who have had whispers against them by the over-orthodox, have in every case had a growing church, though not many such preachers have ever settled in this part of the state. The only reason that we are weak in northern Illinois is that in the most intelligent section of the state where invention and manufactures have gone hand in hand, we have presented, not our best but our worst.

There is much to encourage in the present situation. In the first district we have the strongest ministry on the whole that we have had in the history of the district. The vision of the missionary forces is broader. The district is raising more money for co-operative effort. More laymen attend the district conventions than in any district in the state. There is an openness to all known truth that is growing from year to year. It is too late to redeem the mistakes of the past, but what we can do to redeem them is being done and perhaps we shall yet have a larger share in the work of the Kingdom in northern Illinois.

THE TALL SOLDIER.

Bordelais—"My dear sir, here in our barracks we have the tallest soldier ever seen."

Marseilais—"The tallest? How tall is he?"

Bordelais—"Six feet nine inches."

Marseillais—"Six feet nine inches? That is nothing. In our barracks we have a sergeant who is so tall that he is compelled to kneel when he wants to scratch his head!" —Lippincott's.

The Book World

MISERY AND ITS CAUSES, by E. T. Devine. This volume is the fourth in the "American Social Progress Series" edited by Samuel McCune Lindsay, Ph. D., and published by the Macmillan Co. The other books of the series are, "The New Basis of Civilization," S. N. Patten; "Standards of Public Morality," A. T. Hadley; "Legislation and Administration for Social Welfare," Jeremiah W. Jenks. Prof. Devine has in this volume treated some of the saddest facts of human life with fascinating realism, with astonishing concentration, with the keenest insight and interpretation of the results of an unusually rich, deep, and varied personal experience, and with a charm of style and optimism that are perfectly irresistible. There are but five chapters in the book. They are, "Poverty and Maladjustment," "Out of Health," "Out of Work," "Out of Friends, "The Adverse Conditions of Dependent Families," "The Justice and Prosperity of the Future." But these headings do not reveal the book so much as the following words of the author: "The question which I raise is whether the wretched poor, the poor who suffer in their poverty, are poor because they are shiftless, because they are undisciplined, because they drink, because they steal, because they have superfluous children, because of personal depravity, personal inclination, and natural preference; or whether they are shiftless and undisciplined and drink and steal and are unable to care for their numerous children because our social institutions and economic arrangements are at fault. I hold that personal depravity is as foreign to any sound theory of the hardship of our modern poor as witchcraft or demoniacal possession; these hardships are economic, social, transitional, measurable, manageable. Misery, as we say of Tuberculosis, is communicable, curable, and preventable. It lies not in the unalterable nature of things, but in our particular human institutions, our social arrangements, our tenements and streets and subways, our laws and courts and jails, our religion, our education, our philanthropy, our politics, our industry and our business." Besides its inspirational value the book is a rich source of social data. (New York: The Macmillan Company, May 1909. $1.25 net.)

SOCIAL ORGANIZATION, by Charles Horton Cooley. This volume is a complementary one to "Human Nature and the Social Order" by the same author. The first book exhibited society as it exists in the social nature of man. The present study considers the enlargement and diversification of intercourse—i. e. of Social Organization—the individual remaining relatively in the background. Professor Cooley declares that he apprehends the subject from the mental rather than the material side, though the latter is by no means neglected. The Author has been for many years a very close student of a wide range of social phenomena, and possesses an acuteness of insight, and comprehensiveness of view which gives to his works a rare value for the student of Sociology and Social Psychology; while the material is presented with such beauty of style as to give it a fascination for the lay reader as well. The book is one which the editors of the Christian Century believe that no preacher or other intelligent student of society should fail to read with care, and we shall, therefore, give to our readers in a succeeding issue a fuller discussion of the book than is possible in this page. (New York: Scribners; May, 1909. $1.50 net.)

THE GLORY OF THE CONQUERED, by Susan Glaspell, is one of the leading stories of the year and deserves every bit of its popularity. It is a story of old-fashioned love in new-fashioned situations. A noted scientist wins the love of an artist girl who hates science. At work in his laboratory his eyes become infected and blindness ensues. She for sheer love and without his knowledge spends a year in mastering the technique of his science that she might be eyes for him, only to have her plan blasted by his death just as she was at the point of telling him what she had done. In discovering for her heroine the secret of victory in such crushing defeat the author with fine insight develops the marvelous likeness of love to religion. Every paragraph is conscientiously written. The book thrills with reality. You rise from reading it with a sense that your own heart has been chastened of its dross and the diviner significance of its passion revealed. (New York: F. A. Stoke Co., 1909. $1.25, net.)

PROVIDENCE AND CALAMITY, By Charles W. Heisley. A wholly inadequate attempt to solve the problem of evil. The author hardly feels the problem at the place where it rubs the modern mind. He assumes a system of nature governed by law outside of which exists a God who interposes only in exceptional instances. The naive assumption is made that sickness and accident occurring according to "law" are therefore not chargeable to Providence, albeit Providence has itself ordained the "law." The author's tone seems to imply that he is criticising the traditional view of Providence, but we fail to see that his view differs appreciably from it. (Boston: Sherman, French & Co., 1909. $1.10 net.)

THE GREAT CRISIS, by Laurence W. Scott. A rather thoughtful tracing of the events of our Lord's last week. The author is a man of sympathy and shows some insight into the spiritual significance to Jesus' soul of the experiences of those cruel days. The author belongs to the conservative section of the Disciple brotherhood. (Cincinnati: F. L. Rowe, Publisher. 1909. Pp. 250. $1.25.)

THE CENTENNIAL OF RELIGIOUS JOURNALISM, edited by Rev. J. Pressly Barrett, D. D. A volume to mark the completion of one hundred years of history by the Herald of Gospel Liberty, the leading exponent of the Christian denomination. (Dayton, Ohio, Christian Publishing Association, 1908.)

FEDERAL COUNCIL OF THE CHURCHES OF CHRIST IN AMERICA. Proceedings of the first meeting of the Federal Council held in Philadelphia, December, 1908. (New York: The Revell Press. 1909.)

ROMAN CATHOLICISM CAPITULATING BEFORE PROTESTANTISM, by G. V. Fradryssa. A hopeful view but not a very convincing statement. (Mobile, Ala., Southern Publishing Co. 1908.)

THE LIFE AND TEACHINGS OF JESUS. by G. H. Walser. (Boston: Sherman, French & Co. 1909. $1.35, net.)

—There are ten women among the fifty commissioners that the government of Mexico has sent out for the purpose of studying the best methods of education in the different countries.

—To Joaquin Sorolla, Spain's greatest painter since Velasquez, has fallen the distinction of making the first portrait of William H. Taft since his election to the presidency. The painting, which will be life-size, will be a gift to the president's brother, Charles P. Taft of Cincinnati.

—Miss Evelyn Longman has won a $14.000 commission by her design for the bronze door for the chapel of the United States Naval academy at Annapolis. There were thirty-three men among those competing for the work. The "Winged Victory" that surmounted the dome of Festival Hall at the Louisiana Purchase Exposition was made by Miss Longman.

—Emperor William is said to have changed his mind quite a great deal in regard to women and they are taking more and more interest in public affairs. Women are being appointed on boards of poor-law guardians and there are many associations for educating poor girls and the like. The Mercantile Industrial Aid Association has a membership of 16,000 women clerks and many rich and influential women are members. There is a Mothers' Protective union and, in fact, the German woman is as much alive to her duties as the woman of any other country.

My father's "such a brilliant man," I heard some people say;
They stayed and talked to Father in a stupid
sort of way;
They used the queerest kind of words—and
Father used them too—
If Father talked so every day, I don't know what I'd do!

But when there are no "scientists," my Father's "brilliant" then!
Down underneath the sofa is the place he calls his "den";
And he acts any animal that ever lived—yes, sir!—
I've seen my father be some beasts that really never were!

He's funniest as "Kangaroo," and fiercest as 'the bear";
It makes me really shiver when he "drags me to his lair";
His "Tiger's realy wonderful, and so are all the rest;
But, after all, I do believe his "Lion" is the best.

My father is a brilliant man—I'm sure that's very true;
But not when he talks with "scientists." I don't see how they knew.
And if they think he's brilliant when he seemes to me a bore,
I wonder what they'd think of him if they could hear him roar!

Philip's Self Denial

BY MISS Z. I. DAVIS.

"Mother, may I go over and see Mrs, Gray's bird? She is at the minister's and has just returned from a visit to Switzerland. Among the things which she has brought back is a singing canary. Nearly all of the other boys have been in to see it."

Mrs. Kern looked down at her small son with an expression of assent in her eyes. She rarely refused his requests because he never went anywhere without first asking permission of her. His first thought was of his mother. He had been trained to obey her. His father had died when he was but an infant.

"Yes," replied his mother, "and as you have done all the chores, you need not hurry back. Observe carefully so that you may tell me all about it when you return home." "Come right in, my boy," said the minister pleasantly as he opened the door for Philip in response to the ring of the bell. Several children were gathered about the gilt cage that swung over the palms in the conservatory.

"Is that not a beautiful thrill!" exclaimed one of the girls as the golden hued bird poured forth its very heart in sweet melody.

Philip listened in open eyed astonishment. He had never heard so much music before from such a tiny creature. Mrs. Gray noticed his deep interest and quiet ways. "Do you like birds?" she smiled.

Before he could reply one of the children exclaimed, "I guess you would think so if you saw him talk to boys who like to rob bird's nests. Every year there is a blue jay that builds her nest near the school house. If it was not for him, I am afraid that the poor mother bird would have a sad time rearing her little ones."

"You wonder," replied Mrs. Gray, "how it is that my canary sings so sweetly. It was trained by a specialist. In some parts of Switzerland the canary is placed in a cage with the nightingale and taught to repeat the notes of this prima donna in birdland. After awhile the canary comes to imitate the tone, volume and sweetness of its instructor. That is the secret of my bird's success. You see, children, the result of association. One should always be in good company."

Then Mrs. Gray stepped into the next room and brought another bird in its cage for the children to look at. "It is just as sweet a singer as this one," she explained, "but it is not so pretty."

Then placing the cage with its feathered occupant in Philip's hand, she said, "If you like it, you may keep it." The boy's gray eyes danced with happy excitement. Like it! What child would not like such a beautiful creature? He liked pets so well, but he had none of his own. At last he found words to say, "Thank you ever so much." Cap in one hand and cage in the other, he politely bowed himself out.

"How nice mother will think it is," he said, running all the way home. Mrs. Kern began to prepare supper just as he hurried into the kitchen. After his pet was duly praised and admired he hung the cage in the bay window of the dining room. "Welcome home, Jenny Lind," he exclaimed, as he filled a water bottle for the Swiss singer's namesake. How careful he was to keep the seed dishes replenished and the cage bright and clean. There was never a day when he forgot or neglected his pet. As the weeks went by the boy and the bird became more and more attached to each other.

One day when he came home from school he found his mother very ill. He called the doctor as soon as he could. When the physician arrived, he said that Mrs. Kern had nervous prostration and that the house must be kept perfectly quiet.

Philip saw that the loud warble of the bird annoyed his mother. The tiny creature loved the sunlight, but he decided to cover the cage of his pet during the day so that it would be still. But poor Jenny Lind was much displeased and uttered a continual and doleful plaint. Going in to see if his mother was resting, he found her tossing sleeplessly upon the pillow. "Does the bird annoy you, mother?" he asked.

"Yes," she answered. "It shall not annoy you any more," he replied. "I will give it away."

"But," interrupted his mother, "you think so much of it."

"Yes, I do," he replied, "but I think more of you than of my bird." Then he remembered a playmate at a neighbor's who had often admired dear little Jenny Lind, and who would be kind to it. Today, the boy Philip, who denied himself of the pleasure of keeping his nightingale canary because of delicate thoughtfulness for his mother, is a beloved missionary in China and now preaching the most precious gospel of Jesus Christ.—The Advance.

Woman's Sphere

—A woman writer on the Chicago Record-Herald says: "It is extremely difficult for a woman to be attractive when she is handicapped with common sense, good judgment and perfectly practical ideas." Alas! alas! we must add, there is a good deal of truth in this assertion.

—It is reported that the Princess Victoria Louise of Prussia, the Kaiser's daughter, is to marry the Archduke Karl of Austria, the future emperor.

—Mrs. E. M. Kirkpatrick of Parma, Idaho, has announced the gift of $20,000 to the Southern College of Idaho, to be used in erecting "Sterry" Hall in honor of her father, the late C. W. Sterry of Pontiac, Ill.

—It is said that a large majority of the publishing houses give large salaries to women lawyers of the United States who are earning comfortable livings in other branches of the profession than active practice. One broad field in which many of them find employment is in analyzing, digesting and classifying the decisions of the Federal and State courts which have been handed down during the ten years ended with 1906. Law publishing houses give large salaries to capable women for this work.

—The Lincoln, Neb., W. C. T. Unions have secured the services of the Rev. Alice Ruth Palmer, who for three years has been doing pastoral work in Nebraska, as office and field secretary. She remains until after the national W. C. T. U. convention, which meets at Omaha in November. Miss Palmer is one of the national evangelists of the Union, and a few years ago spent some time in South Africa as a temperance missionary.

—Miss Jane Addams of Hull House, Chicago, has been elected president of the National Conference of Charities and Correction. This is the first time that a woman has ever been elected to this office.

—John S. Sargent has acquired a commission to paint a three-quarter length portrait of Mrs. Whitelaw Reid.

—Women of Toledo, Ohio, have formed a Woman's Building Association and have done well in a business way, it seems, as among other investments they have recently negotiated the purchase of an opera house that will be a source of income.

—Emma Rainel is a full-blooded Indian out in Seattle who has an ambition to write the great American play. She is a graduate of Carlisle and her ambition is a laudable one. She says she feels that she can live over again the life of her people and write the only genuine American play.

—Mohammedan women of Egypt, including members of the khedivial or reigning family, have started a campaign to win for their sex the right to have a voice in choosing husbands, to put aside the veil which hides their beauty, and to pass at will the doors of the harem, although their steps may lead to precincts where men abound.

The Adventures of Marjie

By Erskine M. Hamilton

"Got any rags or old iron to sell? Cash for rags or old iron, or trade ye tin ware for 'em—best tin ware in the country," called old Larry McCardle, as his tin peddler's wagon moved slowly along the road and finally stopped in front of a comfortable farm-house. "Ye've got a lot of rags saved up for me, Mrs. Disbrow?" he shouted, as he saw a matronly figure on the front porch. "An' as for the boys—they're lookin' for old Larry, with a pile of old iron, I know."

"Indeed they are, Mr. McCardle," was the cheerful reply. "They-ve been watching for your wagon for a long time, and I want several articles of tin ware myself. Drive right in. Johnny, go down and open the big gate."

For years Larry McCardle and his wagon had been familiar figures along the country roads, and he was a welcome visitor at many a farm-house. The toys he carried for the children were eagerly sought after by the young folks, and the exchange of rags and old iron for their possession was a matter of great importance. Johnny opened the gate to admit the wagon, then he and Fred scurried away to the barn to get the old metal they had collected for the momentous occasion.

"I guess we've got about fifty cents worth," said Johnny, surveying the gathered hoard. "As much as that, anyway," answered Fred. "There's a lot of old copper in with it, and Larry pays more for that, you know."

"Maybe we could buy that little engine now," suggested Johnny. "Larry had one the last time he was here, but we couldn't get it then." "That's so. We'll get it this time if he has one," replied Fred. "I'm glad you thought of it, 'cause that's just what we want." "I wish I had some old iron, too, to buy something with," said a wistful voice near them. The boys looked up, and saw wee Marjie standing in the doorway.

"Oh, girls don't know about such things. You're too little," explained Johnny. "Won't you buy me something, too?" persisted the small maiden, her brown eyes looking appealingly from one to the other of her brothers.

"We can't. We've only got enough to buy the little engine," answered Fred, half impatiently. Marjie said no more, but stood silently by as Larry displayed his stock of toys, the coveted engine among them, but when her eyes fell on a large doll she caught it up eagerly.

"Won't you buy this for Marjie? Won't you—please?" she pleaded.

"No, we won't," replied Fred shortly. "Now run away, Marjie." "The price of the doll is just the same as the engine, an' maybe you'd better get it for the little girl," interposed old Larry kindly, seeing the grieved look on Marjie's face. "We can't buy everything Marjie wants," was Fred's answer to the well meant proposition.

Old Larry said no more, but produced a stick of candy which he gave to Marjie. "Take that, little girl. Maybe next time I'm around it'll be so you can get the doll." Marjie took the candy, and said: "Maybe Marjie'll go off somewhere and never come back." She remembered that the boys had occasionally picked up bits of broken iron along the track, and this was the cause of her journeying. Maybe she could find some, too—enough to secure the wished-for doll! In the midst of her search a roaring, rumbling sound came along the rails, and a moment later a hand-car, carrying a number of section men, appeared in view from around the bend. The car stopped beside her, and the foreman sprang to the ground.

"Hello, little girl!" he exclaimed. "You belong up in the village, I reckon, an ain't you a good ways from home? Don't you want to have a ride back?" Marjie was perfectly willing to ride anywhere in such a delightful vehicle as a hand-car. So it was without resistance that the kind-hearted section boss placed her on the seat beside him, and the car sped on its way to the village nearly a mile away. Marjie enjoyed the ride, and her golden hair floated out on the air and her eyes shone with pleasure as they moved swiftly forward and finally stopped at the village station.

"Here you are, little girl," said the foreman, lifting her to the ground. "I reckon you know where your home is?"

Marjie shook her head, and did not move from the spot where she had been placed.

"What's that? Don't know where you live? Here, Jack"—calling to a man near by—"who is this kid, an' where does she belong?"

The man, called Jack, drew near and looked at Marjie.

"I never saw her before," he answered after a careful scrutiny. "I don't believe she belongs to any family here in the village."

The foreman uttered a prolonged whistle.

"Whew! this is a go, sure enough!" he exclaimed. "I picked her up about a mile down the track thinkin' she belonged to some one here, an' I'll warrant her folks are huntin' high an' low for her by this time. I'd take her right back if I had time an' it wasn't so late. Anyway, I wouldn't want to leave her alone on the track where I found her. Say, little girl, what's your name?" "Marjie." "Marjie what?" "I'm just Marjie," she answered, beginning to sob. "I want to see my mamma." "Well, you shall go to your mamma if I have to hunt over the whole county to find her,' replied the perplexed foreman, lifting the little figure in his strong arms. "Now come home with me to my mamma, for I know she's got some nice cookies for you an' me."

For the next hour Marjie was entertained by a kind-hearted old lady, while the foreman was out making inquiries. He had just returned, and the three were sitting on the front piazza when, from down the street, came a familiar call:

"Got any rags or old iron to sell? Cash for rags or old iron."

At the first sound of the voice Marjie sprang to her feet with a cry of delight. "Oh, there's old Larry! He knows where my mamma lives!"

"Say, Larry, do you know whose kid this is?'

"Sure,' replied the old man, the moment his eyes fell on the little girl. "This is Marjie Disbrow. How did she get here?"

"I carried her off by mistake," the foreman answered, and he related what had occurred. "You may be sure I'll never kidnap another youngster."

When the gaily-painted wagon appeared oce more at the Disbrow farm there was surprise and relief. Marjie had been missed, and the most careful search for her had been without result. Fred and Johnny, in particular, were anxious and remorseful when they remembered how she had begged for the doll and they had refused to buy it for her. Maybe she had gone off, as she said, and they might never see her again? So, when Larry McCardle's wagon rolled up to the door, and the little curly head was lifted down, it was Fred and Johnny who first sprang forward with a hug and kiss. "You shall have that dollie, Marjie,' declared Fred, "if Mr. McCardle will take back the engine." "Well—under the circumstances—I b'lieve I will," answered the old man, smiling at the repentant boys. And the transfer was made.

People of Importance

—Dr. Alfonso Moreira Penna, president of Brazil, died last week of influenza. He was elected in 1906 and his term expired in 1910. He was a native of the state of Minas Gereas and reduction of duty upon American products was one of his latest acts.

—Philander C. Knox, secretary of state, was given the honorary degree of doctor of laws at the sixty-sixth annual commencement exercises of the Roman Catholic College of St. Thomas of Villa Nova, at Villa Nova, Pa.

—Booker T. Washington, the negro educator, carrying out the plans of the late H. H. Rogers, has begun a tour of the Virginia railway, speaking and investigating the conditions of the negro race along that system from Norfolk to Deepwater, W. Va., a distance of over 440 miles.

—Gen. John S. Kountz, past commander-in-chief of the Grand Army, died at Toledo, Ohio, last week, of Bright's disease. He enlisted in Company G, Thirty-seventh Ohio volunteer infantry, when he was fifteen, and was elected commander-in-chief of the Grand Army in 1884, serving one term.

—Adlai Stevenson, formerly vice president of the United States and a recent candidate for governor of Illinois, has written a book. The title of the book is, "Something of Men I Have Known." For several years Gen. Stevenson has been working at odd times on his reminiscences of famous men with whom he was acquainted. Recently he was taken seriously ill and was confined to a hospital in Chicago, just after he had sent his book to the publishers. At present he is convalescing.

—Edward Dana Durand, who has been confirmed by the senate to succeed S. N. D. North as director of the United States census, has been deputy commissioner of corporations since 1907 and is considered an authority on economic subjects. He was born in Romeo, Mich., in 1871, and after being graduated from Oberlin College became assistant professor of administration and finance in Leland Stanford University. From 1900 to 1902 he served as secretary of the industrial commission and then became an instructor at Harvard University.

—J. E. Chilberg, president of the Alaska-Yukon exposition at Seattle, has made a large sum of money out of the shipping business. He is credited with a wider acquaintance upon the Pacific Coast from Cape Barrow in the Arctic to Valparaiso, Chili, than any other man, for his activities have carried him into most of the mining camps of Alaska, all the principal cities of the Pacific Coast states, into Mexico, the Central American republic and South America. For two years Mr. Chilberg has devoted almost all of his time to the exposition, without remuneration.

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XXII.

The Revelation.

Winston's harvesting prospered as his sowing had done, for by day the bright sunshine shone down on standing wheat and lengthening rows of sheaves. It was in the bracing cold of sunrise the work began, and the first pale stars were out before the tired men and jaded horses dragged themselves home again. Not infrequently it happened that the men wore out the teams and machines, but there was no stoppage then, for fresh horses were led out from the corral or a new binder was ready. Every minute was worth a dollar, and Winston, who had apparently foreseen and provided for everything, wasted none.

Then, for wheat is seldom stacked in that country, as the days grew shorter and the evenings cool, the smoke of the big thrasher streaked the harvest field, and the wagons went jolting between humming separator and granary, until the later was gorged to repletion and the wheat was stored within a willow framing beneath the chaff and straw that streamed from the chute of the great machine. Winston had around him the best men that dollars could hire, and toiled tirelessly with the grimy host in the whirling dust of the thrasher and amid the sheaves, wherever another pair of hands, or the quick decision that would save an hour's delay, was needed the most.

As compared with the practice of insular Britain, there were not half enough of them, but wages are high in that ccountry, and the crew of the thrasher paid by the bushel, while the rest had long worked for their own hand on the levels of Manitoba and in the bush of Ontario, and knew that the sooner their toil was over the sooner they would go home with well-lined pockets. So, generously fed, splendid human muscle kept pace with clinking steel under a stress that is seldom borne outside the sun-bleached prairie at harvest time, and Winston forgot everything save the constant need for the utmost effort of body and brain. It was even of little import to him that prices moved steadily upward as he toiled.

At last it was finished, and only knee-high stubble covered his land and that of Maud Barrington. Soon after it was thrashed out the wheat was sold. The harvesters went home with enough to maintain them through the winter, and Winston, who spent about two days counting his gain, wrote asking Graham to send him an accountant from Winnipeg. With him he spent a couple more days, and then, with an effort he was never to forget, prepared himself for the reckoning. It was time to fling off the mask before the eyes of all who trusted him.

He had thought it over carefully, and his first decision had been to make the revelation to Colonel Barrington alone. That, however, he felt, would be too simple, and his pride rebelled against anything that would stamp him as one who dare not face the men he had deceived. One by one they had tacitly offered him their friendship and then their esteem, until he knew that he was virtually leader at Silverdale, and it seemed fitting that he should admit the wrong he had done them, and bear the obloquy, before them all. For a while the thought of Maud Barrington restrained him, and then he brushed that aside. He had fancied with masculine blindness that what he felt for her had been well concealed, and that her attitude to him could be no more than kindly sympathy with one who was endeavoring to atone for a discreditable past. Her anger and astonishment would be hard to bear, but once more his pride prompted him, and he decided that she should at least see he had the courage to face the results of his wrongdoing. As it happened, he was given an opportunity, when he was invited to the harvest celebration that was held each year at Silverdale.

It was a still, cool evening when every man of the community, and most of the women, gathered in the big dining-room of the Grange. The windows were shut now, for the chill of the early frost was on the prairie, and the great lamps burned steadily above the long tables. Cut glass, dainty china, and silver gleamed beneath them amidst the ears of wheat that stood in clusters for sole and appropriate ornamentation. They merited the place of honor, for wheat had brought prosperity to every man at Silverdale who had had the faith to sow that year.

On either hand were rows of smiling faces, the men's burned and bronzed, the women's kissed into faintly warmer color by the sun. Barrington sat at the head of the longest table, with his niece and sister, Dane and his oldest followers about him, and Winston at its foot, dressed very simply after the usual fashion of the prairie farmers. There were few in the company who had not noticed this, though they did not as yet understand its purport.

Nothing happened during dinner, but Maud Barrington noticed that, although some of his younger neighbors rallied him, Winston was grimly quiet. When it was over, Barrington rose, and the men who knew the care he had borne that year never paid him more willing homage that they did when he stood smiling down on them. As usual he was immaculate in dress, erect, and quietly commanding, but in spite of its smile his face seemed worn, and there were thickening wrinkles, which told of anxiety, about his eyes.

"Another year has gone, and we have met again to celebrate with gratefulness the fulfillment of the promise made when the world was young," he said. "We do well to be thankful, but I think humility becomes us, too. While we doubted, the sun and the rain have been with us, for a sign that, though men grow faint-hearted and spare their toil, seed-time and harvest shall not fail."

It was the first time Colonel Barrington had spoken in quite that strain, and when he paused a moment there was a curious stillness, for those who heard him noticed an unusual tremor in his voicec. There was also a gravity that was not far removed from sadness in his face when he went on again, but the intentness of his retainers would have been greater had they known that two separate detachments of police troopers were then riding toward Silverdale.

"The year has brought its changes, and set its mark deeply on some of us," he said. "We cannot recall it, or retrieve our blunders, but we can only hope they will be forgiven us and endeavor to avoid them again. This is not the fashion in which I had meant to speak to you tonight, but after the bounty showered upon us I feel my responsibility. The law is unchangeable. The man who would have bread to eat or sell must toil for it, and I, in disregard of it, bade you hold your hand. Well, we have had our lesson, and we will be wiser another time, but I have felt that my usefulness as your leader is slipping away from me. This year has shown me that I am getting an old man."

Dane kicked the foot of a lad beside him, and glanced at the piano as he stood up.

"Sir," he said simply, "although we have differed about trifles and may do so again, we don't want a better one—and if we did we couldn't find him."

A chord from the piano rang through the approving murmurs, and the company rose to their feet before the lad had beaten out the first bar of the jingling rhythm. Then the voices took it up, and the great hall shook to the rafters with the last "Nobody can deny."

Trite as it was, Barrington saw the darker flush in the bronzed faces, and there was a shade of warmer color in his own as he went on again.

"The things one feels the most are those one can least express, and I will not try to tell you how I value your confidence," he said. "Still, the fact remains that sooner or later I must let the reins fall into younger hands, and there is a man here who will, I fancy, lead you farther than you would ever go with me. Times change, and he can teach you how those who would do the most for the Dominion need live today. He is also, and I am glad of it, one of us, for traditions do not wholly lose their force and we know that blood will tell. That this year has not ended in disaster irretrievable is due to our latest comrade, Lance Courthorne."

This time there were no musical honors or need of them, for a shout went up that called forth an answering rattle from the cedar paneling. It was flung back from table to table up and down the great room, and when the men sat down, flushed and breathless, their eyes still shining, the one they admitted had saved Silverdale rose up quietly at the foot of the table. The hand he laid on the snowy cloth shook a little, and the bronze that generally suffused it was less noticeable in his face. All who saw it felt that something unusual was coming, and Maud Barrington leaned forward a trifle, with a curious throbbing of her heart.

"Comrades! It is, I think, the last time you will hear the term from me," he said. "I am glad that we have made and won a good fight at Silverdale, because it may soften your most warranted resentment when you think of me."

Every eye was turned upon him, and an expression of bewilderment crept into the faces, while a lad who sat next to him touched his arm reassuringly.

"You'll feel your feet in a moment, but that's a curious fashion of putting it," he said.

Winston turned to Barrington, and stood silent a moment. He saw Maud Barrington's face showing strained and intent, but less bewildered than the others, and that of her aunt, which seemed curiously impassive, and a little thrill ran through him. It passed, and once more he saw only the leader of Silverdale.

(Copyright, 1907, by F. A. Stokes Co.)

"Sir," he said, "I did you a wrong when I came here, and with your convictions you would never tolerate me as your successor."

There was a rustle of fabric as some of the women moved, and a murmur of uncontrolable astonishment, while those who noticed it, remembered Barrington's gasp. It expressed absolute bewilderment, but in another moment he smiled.

"Sit down, Lance," he said. "You need make no speeches. We expect better things from you."

Winston stood very still. "It was the simple truth I told you, sir," he said. "Don't make it too hard for me."

Just then there was a disturbance at the rear of the room, and a man, who shook off the grasp of one that followed him, came in. He moved forward with uneven steps, and then, resting his hand on a chair back, faced about and looked at Winston. The dust was thick upon his clothes, but it was his face that seized and held attention. It was horribly pallid, save for the flush that showed in either cheek, and his half-closed eyes were dazed.

"I heard them cheering," he said. "Couldn't find you at your homestead. You should have sent the five hundred dollars. They would have saved you this."

The defective utterance would alone have attracted attention, and, with the man's attitude, was very significant, but it was equally evident to most of those who watched him that he was also struggling with some infirmity. Western hospitality has, however, no limit, and one of the younger men drew out a chair.

"Hadn't you better sit down, and if you want anything to eat we'll get it for you," he said. "Then you can tell us what your errand is."

The man made a gesture of negation, and pointed to Winston.

"I came to find a friend of mine. They told me at his homestead that he was here," he said.

There was an impressive silence, until Colonel Barrington glanced at Winston, who still stood quietly impassive at the foot of the table.

"You know our visitor?" he said. "The Grange is large enough to give a stranger shelter."

The man laughed. "Of course he does; it's my place he's living in."

Barrington turned again to Winston, and his face seemed to have grown a trifle stern.

"Who is this man?" he said.

Winston looked steadily in front of him, vacantly noticing the rows of faces turned towards him under the big lamps. "If he had waited a few minutes longer, you would have known," he said. "He is Lance Courthorne."

This time the murmurs implied incredulity, but the man who stood swaying a little with his hand on the chair and a smile in his half-closed eyes, made an ironical inclination.

"It's evident you don't believe it or wish to. Still, it's true," he said.

One of the men nearest him rose and quietly thrust him into the chair.

"Sit down in the meanwhile," he said dryly. "By and by, Colonel Barrington will talk to you."

Barrington thanked him with a gesture, and glanced at the rest. "One would have preferred to carry out this inquiry more privately," he said, very slowly, but with hoarse distinctness. "Still, you have already heard so much."

Dane nodded. "I fancy you are right, sir. Because we have known and respected the man who has, at least, done a good deal for us, it would be better that we should hear the rest."

Barrington made a little gesture of agreement, and once more fixed his eyes on Winston. "Then will you tell us who you are?"

"A struggling prairie farmer," said Winston quietly. "The son of an English country doctor who died in penury, and one who from your point of view could never have been entitled to more than courteous toleration from any of you."

He stopped, but, for the astonishment was passing, there was negation in the murmurs which followed, while somebody said, "Go on!"

Dane stood up. "I fancy our comrade is mistaken," he said. "Whatever he may have been, we recognize our debt to him. Still, I think he owes us a more complete explanation."

Then Maud Barrington, sitting where all could see her, signed imperiously to Alfreton, who was on his feet next moment, with Macdonald and more of the men following him.

"I," he said, with a little ring in his voice and a flush in his young face, "owe him everything, and I'm not the only one. This, it seems to me, is the time to acknowledge it."

Barrington checked him with a gesture. "Sit down, all of you. Painful and embarrassing as it is, now we have gone so far, this affair must be elucidated. It would be better if you told us more."

Winston drew back a chair, and when Courthorne moved, the man who sat next to him laid a grasp on his arm. "You will oblige me by not making any remarks just now," he said dryly. "When Colonel Barrington wants to hear anything from you he'll ask you."

"There is little more," said Winston. "I could see no hope in the old country, and came out to this one with one hundred pounds a distant connection lent me. That sum will not go far anywhere, as I found when, after working for other men, I bought stock and took up Government land. To hear how I tried to do three men's work for six weary years, and at times went for months together half-fed, might not interest you, though it has its bearing on what came after. The seasons were against me, and I had not the dollars to tide me over the time of drought and blizzard until a good one came. Still, though my stock died, and I could scarcely haul in the little wheat the frost and hail left me with my worn-out team, I held out, feeling that I could achieve prosperity if I once had the chances of other men."

He stopped a moment, and Macdonald poured out a glass of water and passed it across to him in a fashion that made the significance of what he did evident.

"We know what kind of a struggle you made by what we have seen at Silverdale," he said.

Winston put the glass aside, and turned once more to Colonel Barrington.

"Still," he said, "until Courthorne crossed my path, I had done no wrong, and I was in dire need of the money that tempted me to take his offer. He made a bargain with me that I should ride his horse and personate him, that the police troopers might leave him unsuspected to lead his comrades running whisky, while they followed me. I kept my part of the bargain, and it cost me what I fancy I can never recover, unless the trial I shall shortly face will take the stain from me. While I passed for him your lawyer found me, and I had no choice between being condemned as a criminal for what Courthorne had in the meanwhile done, or continuing the deception. He had, as soon as I had left him, taken my horse and garments, so that if seen by the police they would charge me. I could not take your money, but, though Courthorne was apparently drowned, I did wrong when I came to Silverdale. For a time the opportunities dazzled me; ambition drew me on, and I knew what I could do."

He stopped again, and once more there was a soft rustle of dresses, and a murmur, as those who listened gave inarticulate expression to their feelings. Moving a little, he looked steadily at Maud Barrington and her aunt, who sat close together.

"Then," he said, very slowly, "it was borne in upon me that I could not persist in deceiving you. Courthorne, I fancied, could not return to trouble me, but the confidence that little by little you placed in me rendered it out of the question. Still, I say that I could save some at least at Silverdale from drifting to disaster, and there was work for me here which would go a little way in reparation, and now that it is done I was about to bid you good-by, and ask you not to think too hardly of me."

There was a moment's intense silence until once more Dane rose up, and pointed to Courthorne sitting with half-closed eyes, dusty, partly dazed by indulgence, and with the stamp of dissolute living on him, in his chair. Then he glanced at Winston's bronzed face, which showed quietly resolute at the bottom of the table.

"Whatever we would spare you and ourselves, sir, we must face the truth," he said. "Which of these men was needed at Silverdale?"

Again the murmurs rose up, but Winston sat silent, his pulses throbbing with a curious exultation. He had seen the color creep into Maud Barrington's face, and her aunt's eyes, when he told her what had prompted him to leave Silverdale, and knew they understood him. Then, in the stillness that followed, the drumming of hoofs rose from the prairie. It grew louder, and when another sound became audible too, more than one of those who listened recognized the jingle of accoutrements. Courthorne rose unsteadily, and made for the door.

"I think," he said, with a curious laugh, "I must be going. I don't know whether the troopers want me or your comrade."

A lad sprang to his feet, and as he ran to the door called "Stop him!"

In another moment Dane had caught his arm, and his voice rang through the confusion as everybody turned or rose.

"Keep back all of you," he said. "Let him go!"

Courthorne was outside by this time, and only those who reached the door before Dane closed it heard a faint beat of hoofs as somebody rode quietly away beneath the bluff, while as the rest clustered together, wondering, a minute or two later, Corporal Payne, flecked with spume and covered with dust, came in. He raised his hand in salutation to Colonel Barrington, who sat very grim in face in his chair at the head of the table.

"I'm sorry, sir, but it's my duty to apprehend Lance Courthorne," he said.

"You have a warant?" asked Barrington.

"Yes, sir," said the corporal.

There was intense silence for a moment. Then the Colonel's voice broke through it very quietly.

"He is not here," he said.

Payne made a little deprecatory gesture. "We know he came here. It is my duty to warn you that proceedings will be taken against any one concealing or harboring him."

Barrington rose up very stiffly, with a little gray tinge in his face, but words seemed to fail him, and Dane laid his hand on the corporal's shoulder.

Sunday School Lesson

LESSON FOR JULY 11.

Paul's Second Missionary Journey (Continued). The Philippian Jailer.—Acts 16:16-40. Print Acts 16:25-40.

Golden Text.—Believe on the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved, and thy house.—Acts 16:31.

Introduction.

Verses 16 to 24 give the story of the conversion of the maid who was possessed by a "spirit of divination" and of the trouble which it brought upon Paul and his companions. The master of the girl, who lost money by her conversion, had them thrown into prison, and it is here that the lesson finds them.

Outline of the Lesson.

The evangelists pray and sing.
The earthquakes.
So does the jailer.
Prison doors fly open.
The jailer cries for mercy.
He is commanded to believe.
He is converted and becomes a friend and host of the apostles.
The magistrates tell the evangelists to go.
Paul claims their rights as Roman citizens.
The officials are alarmed and beg the men whom they had wronged to help them out of their trouble.
They see the brethren and then take their Departure.

Notes on the Lesson.

25v. At midnight. Midnight to the world, but not to the little company in jail. Prayed. There are no prison walls which can bar the way of prayer. Sang praises unto God. The songs of Christendom began in pain and sorrow. The men and women who suffered most sang most. In the deepest distress there was the deepest joy. Was there ever such another paradox! The prisoners heard them. Those old prison walls had never before echoed to such sounds.

26v. A great earthquake. Let not the rationalist try to reason it away. It was the most rational thing that the earth could do, —to writhe and quake and shake up the foundations, when magistrates were beating such men as Paul and Silas. An earthquake which lets righteous men out of jail is not to be sneered at by skeptics.

All the doors were opened. It was never written over doors which apostles enter, "All hope abandon, ye who enter here." "Behold, I have set before thee an open door, and no man can shut it: for thou hast a little strength, and has kept my word, and hast not denied my name.' Rev. 3:8.

27v. Awakening out of his sleep. This was the next good thing which the earthquake did—it awakened a sleeping sinner. There would be a wide field of usefulness of this kind for earthquakes now. Would have killed himself. A favorite way which many greater Romans had of getting out of a bad scrape. It was at this same Philippi that both Cassius and Brutus, the men who slew Julius Caesar, killed themselves when defeated by young Augustus and Mark Antony. Supposing that the prisoner had fled. The Roman sense of duty was strong. Underneath the jailer's paganism there was manhood. He was loyal to his government, he was loyal to his new faith. He was faithful to Caesar, and faithful to Christ. It takes good material to make a good Christian. There must be a bottom to build on. As we saw in the last lesson, Philippi was settled with war veterans after the great battle.

28v. Paul cried with a loud voice. And what was this loud cry of the Christian preacher? "Do thyself no harm." Men were then, and have been ever since, doing themselves harm. The Christian religion is trying to stop them. It wants to do them good, and it wants them to do only good to themselves and to all others. We are all here. This was much more aptly spoken than the remark of the Kansas attorney who began an address to the convicts in the penitentiary by saying, "I am glad to see you all here today." But what an amazing change! The apostle who was thrust into a dungeon, beaten, bloody and helpless, has suddenly become the comforter of his jailer.

29v. Then he called for a light. He asked for the right thing first; he needed light. And Paul gave him such light as never stole through the bars of prison windows and dropped its grateful rays upon damp floors. It was light from heaven and light for the gloomiest cell on earth, the cell of an imprisoned soul. And sprang in. He was in greater haste to get in than the apostles were to get out. Come trembling. It is said that there is no terror equal to that produced by an earthquake. It shakes the courage out of the most resolute men. When earth fails a man there is nothing for his natural courage to stand on. He needs to be held from above. Fell down before Paul and Silas. It was a surprising change of position. It was the jailer's Judgment day. Great will be the reversals of human position in the last judgment.

30v. Brought them out. He was now sufficiently conscience stricken to realize that they ought not to be in prison. Conversion which does not begin or end with a desire to repair wrong, can hardly be called conversion. What must I do to be saved? Little did the pagan prison keeper dream that he was furnishing the preachers of all ages with one of their greatest texts. Paul's own question under similar circumstances was, "What wilt thou have me to do?"

31v. And thy house. The first preachers of the gospel, being Jews, and full of the Old Testament idea that the family is the unit, went beyond the individual and took in the household.

32v. They spake unto him the word. It was a sermon in the small hours of the morning and to a small audience, but very effective.

33v. Washed their stripes. From a cruel keeper conversion had changed him into a loving friend. Was baptized. He washed their stripes; they washed his soul. He and all his. One thing is wanting to make this a conclusive argument for infant baptism—we do not know that there were infants in the jailer's household.

34v. Brought them into his house. The Jailer's place of residence was probably within the prison enclosure; see vs. 37 and 40. Believing in God with all his house. It is argued that this phrase is as inclusive as the one above regarding baptism, and hence only believers or those capable of believing, were baptized.

35v. Let these men go. The earthquake was powerfully persuasive in changing the minds of the magistrates.

36v. Go in peace. Which pretty nearly meant go in pieces, after the severe flogging.

37v. But Paul said unto them. The great apostle was willing to go in peace but not in disgrace as they would have done if they had permitted themselves to be quietly shipped out of town.

38v. And they fear when they heard that they were Romans. Peloubet's Notes says that "they were liable to a prosecution such as Cicero instituted against Verres. The crime was regarded as treason, and those who committed it were liable to degradation from office, confiscation of property, and perhaps death." Cicero, in his oration against Verres, speaks of a prisoner who was remorselessly scourged, even while he cried in the midst of the agony and crash of the blows, "I am a Roman citizen."

39v. They came and besought them. The tables were turned.

40v. And they went out of the prison. Honorably and not like whipped criminals. By his firmness Paul had vindicated his character.

Suggestive Points.

—It was a tumultuous introduction to Europe—a riot, a flogging and an earthquake.

—It was one time when an earthquake came handy.

—Paul was not praying simply as a matter of meditation, but to the Maker of heaven and earth, as the One who hears and answers prayers.

—They could bind their feet but not their hearts and hopes.

—Faithfulness can feed on suffering and knows no disappointment.

—They put them into jail as Jews and took them out as Romans.

—They whipped them first and found out about them afterwards; so churches sometimes call ministers and afterwards find out who they are.

—Christians should be peaceable, but they should also vindicate their character when assailed.

Comment by Others.

One of the marked characteristics of the Epistle of Paul to the Philippians is its joyful, hopeful tone. As in the Philippian prison he sang songs of praise eleven years before, so now a Roman prisoner, worn, fettered, diseased, hater, he rejoiced. It nas been said that the sum of his whole letter is, 'I rejoice, rejoice ye!'—Farrar.

Mohammedanism has no hymnal, nor has Hinduism, nor Buddism. No glorious burst of sacred song from the hearts and lips of the people ever awoke the echoes of any heathen or Mohammedan temple.—Quoted in Peloubet's Notes.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

THE PROSPERITY OF THE WICKED.

Topic, July 7. Psalm 37:1-27.

It is a practical question that we have for discussion this week. Theorists have had much to say of the problem of evil, they have exhausted their strength in the effort to show that the prosperity of the wicked is consistent with the goodness of God, but the problem remains unsolved. It is our business to discuss how men of faith ought to act in the presence of successful wickedness. We believe that God is good, that he requires goodness of his people. Our difficulty arises because we have faith. If we had no faith, we could be content to look for a warm corner in the winter and for a shade in the summer and let the world go its way. Having faith, we are perplexed whenever an act of injustice comes to our mind. If no remedy for the injustice is at hand, faith is put to a severe test.

"Be Not Envious."

Lack of faith creates part of our difficulty. We envy men that are at ease even when we know that their hands are stained with the blood of the innocent. We must not only preach, we must feel deep down in our hearts that all the wealth of the world cannot pay us for the loss of integrity and kindly interest in others. Is not the cry against the oppressor often nothing more than an expression of disappointed selfishness? The man who suffers the wrong would himself have inflicted it if his opportunity and power had been sufficient. He is entirely indifferent to the moral and spiritual aspects of the situation. He would be perfectly willing to see others defrauded if he himself were not a victim of deceit. Success in business plays curious tricks with a man's sympathies.

The Sword of the Wicked.

Will the sword of the wicked enter his own heart? Is tyranny suicide? We have innumerable illustrations of the law of retribution. Nations that have promise of long life have a passion for justice. The thrones of wicked rulers are not firmly established. The psalmist exhorts his fellow-citizens not to fret themselves with the heat of passion because of evildoers, for the workers of iniquity will soon be cut off. The intolerable situation is of brief duration. There is, however, much to be said on the other side. In other parts of scripture attention is called to the fact that bad men may have what looks like uninterrupted prosperity. Our own eyes have seen apparent contradictions to the theory that evildoers soon come to grief. We simply cannot balance accounts and show that the bad man always has the worst of the bargain. One reason for this is that there is good and bad in every life. A man without any good qualities would doubtless speedily come to grief financially, socially, and politically among any civilized or half-civilized people. The prophets have taught us that God uses rough warrior nations to accomplish his purposes. These nations evidently had some moral worth. We condemn men because they lack certain virtues which we prize; they may possess other virtues which are just as useful as those we emphasize and which we are liable to underestimate.

Trust in Jehovah.

Trust in God destroys envy. If we have faith in God, we do not have to succeed. Of course success is pleasing to the man of faith and he seeks it. Neither poverty nor lack of popularity is in itself an evidence of exalted spirituality. But the free man does not regret that he choose to walk with God and to put no barrier of injustice and fraud between him and other men when wealth and honor were offered as the price of his soul. Furthermore, his trust in God puts courage in his heart. He is not of the submissive sort who meekly say that God wills it and therefore men must endure. He acts upon the supposition that God wills the destruction of wickedness.

The Right to Repent.

The Israelite was at times afraid of the mercy of God. Jonah was displeased exceedingly because God was merciful to the inhabitants of Nineveh. He felt that a city with a record of oppression such as Nineveh had should have no chance to repent. His feeling was that of many who had suffered at the hand of the Assyrian. It can be understood by any man whose toil has been for the profit of a powerful robber. But the divine mercy is great enough to bless and enrich the lives of repentant plunderers. Shall we not take counsel of the divine mercy and thereby learn how to use indignation against the prosperous wicked?

Christian Endeavor Lesson

LIFE LESSONS FOR ME FROM THE GOSPEL OF JOHN.

Topic, July 11: John 14:1-21.

Immortality.

The fourteenth chapter of John is Jesus' great pronunciamento on Immortality. "In my Father's house are many mansions. If it were not so I would have told you; for I go to prepare a place for you." Jesus proves that there is an immortal life. Yes, Jesus proves that there is an immortal life. It will not be very long until many of us are studying philosophy; no doubt some of us are now doing so. Philosophy, contrary to the idea of many people, is a very practical thing. There was a philosopher named Kant who wanted to find out how we know. He discovered that we weren't really absolutely sure of anything. We only knew as much of the world as we experienced, and then only as we experienced it. So knowledge was after all half faith. We had faith that there was an outer world like the one we experienced through our senses.

We feel very sure that the table is there because we experience it very keenly, don't we? We say: "I will prove it to you," and we make one "feel" the table.

Jesus seemed to be as keenly conscious that there was a future life as one is that the table is before him. He doesn't seem to feel that he has to prove it any more than you feel it necessary to prove that the table is there. Jesus is always talking about the future life. He feels that it is in a way even now begun. He knows that there is a future life.

Can we have this experience that Jesus had? Yes, that which was active in Jesus is potential in us. We can be Christ-like. There is something in us that rebels against the thought that the "I" in us can end. We grope and feel and yearn for immortality. Let our bodies perish, but "we" do not want to die. It is not strange, is it, that so many people fear death, when they have lived only for the body.

Living according to the highest ideals, cultivating with reverence and yet love the divine personality of Jesus Christ will develop our yearning after immortality into a great soul-warming faith, a sureness that "in our Father's house are many mansions."

The Future Life—Where?

"Thomas sayest unto him, Lord, we know not whither thou goest." Jesus did not answer the question of Thomas? Yes, he answered it, but he spiritualized the answer. To try to tell the place where the future life is would be as futile as trying to locate the human soul. People without much soul are spatially just as large as anybody, aren't they?

If one follows the right road he is sure to arrive. Jesus said, "I am the way." But the disciples of Jesus had the idea that heaven was a place, with golden streets and other material things. Jesus had a right to say to them, "You know the way." For he had taught them the deeper truth of which their pictures were but symbols. He had shown them that men were not rulers over others in heaven, that men and women were not given in marriage, that the future life was a life that had spiritual values. But they, as we are all too prone to do, I fear, lost sight of the way and the kind of life in their material thought.

The Character of the Future Life.

"He that hath seen me hath seen the Father." We do believe that this is the greatest sentence in the New Testament. Did Jesus mean his feet, his hands, his face? He did not. He meant his personality. He meant the kind of life that personality epitomized. This kind of life was the eternal life, it was a life like the life of God. It was a life of love. This quality of life rises transcendant over the world, sin, and death. It is the future life. It is personal immortality. The man who has it will not fear death. It is ours through Jesus Christ our Lord.

"He that hath seen me hath seen the Father."

Winston of the Prairie

"Then," he said grimly, "don't exceed it. If you believe he's here, we will give you every opportunity of finding him."

Payne called to a comrade outside, who was, as it happened, new to the force, and they spent at least ten minutes questioning the servants and going up and down the house. Then as they glanced into the general room again, the trooper looked deprecatingly at his officer.

"I fancied I heard somebody riding by the bluff just before we reached the house," he said.

Payne wheeled round with a flash in his eyes. "Then you have lost us our man. Out with you, and tell Jackson to try the bluff for a trail."

They had gone in another moment, and Winston still sat at the foot of the table and Barrington at the head, while the rest of the company were scattered, some wonderingly silent, though others talked in whispers, about the room. As yet they felt only consternation and astonishment.

CHAPTER XXIII.

Courthorne Makes Reparation.

The silence in the big room had grown oppressive, when Barrington raised his head and sat stiffly upright.

"What has happened has been a blow to me, and I am afraid I am scarcely equal to entertaining you tonight," he said. "I should, however, like Dane and Macdonald, and one or two of the older men to stay a while. There is still, I fancy, a good deal for us to do."

(To be continued.)

With the Workers

The Central Church, Syracuse, N. Y., will give over $700 to missions this year.

Lockhart and Linnt are to hold a meeting at Port Arthur, Ontario, during July.

Hamlin and Daugherty are in a meeting with the Oak Cliff Church, Dallas, Texas.

M. R. Ingle of Harper, Kan., has been in a good meeting at Arapahoe.

The church at Taylor, Texas, has extended a call to S. D. Perkins of Dallas, Texas.

S. M. Martin is to hold a meeting with the church at South Pasadena, Cal., beginning June 23.

The work of the Yotsuya Mission, Japan, is progressing encouragingly. There were five confessions at a recent service.

The first week in July, J. F. Williams will assume charge of the work at Geneva, Ohio. He succeeds F. M. Field, who did good work.

Elmore Sinclair of Watseka, Ill., delivered the baccalaureate sermon to the high school graduates, Sunday evening, June 6.

In two months of the ministry of F. E. Mallory in Parsons, Kan., there have been fifty additions to the membership of the church.

F. B. Huffman, pastor at Eureka, Cal., was selected to deliver the Memorial Day address in that city.

The Commencement at Butler College was held June 11 to 17, and the baccalaureate sermon was given by President H. C. Howe.

C. W. F. Daniels has resigned from the pastorate of the Garfield Park Church, Santa Cruz, Cal. He will rest until after the state convention.

The offering of the church in Milwaukee, Wis., to home missions will reach more than $300. Claire L. Waite is pastor, and is doing a permanent work with the church.

The First Church, Massillon had four additions at our service Sunday. Observed Children's Day in Bible-school, at evening service. H. E. Stafford is minister.

Earnest LeRoy Williamson, born June 13, is heir and helper of Mr. and Mrs. E. H. Williamson, pastor of the East Broadway Church, Sedalia, Mo.

There have been twenty-five conversions in the tent meetings in Deer Creek, Ill., conducted by F. A. Sword and Charles E. McVay, singer. The meeting continues.

The First Church, Santa Anna, Cal., has extended a call to A. F. Roadhouse, California, Mo., and he has accepted. He must love the name.

W. C. Crider has resigned his charge at Fortuna, Cal., and is planning to spend two years in study at the University of California.

A. I. Martin, who is just getting settled in his work at Lanark, Ill., writes enthusiastically of the prospects of the work there.

The church at Washington, Ill., will celebrate its seventy-fifth anniversary June 22. An effort is being made to secure the attendance of all the former pastors of the church.

The Buffalo Societies of Christian Endeavor hold their annual excursion June 22. The societies of the Christian churches join heartily in the outing.

The Commencement address of the Washington School, Berkeley, Cal., was delivered by I. N. McCash, pastor of the Christian Church.

C. M. Chilton preached the Baccalaureate sermon before the graduates of the Central High School, St. Joseph, Mo., this year. Few men are exerting more fruitful influence than C. M. Chilton.

The Sunday-school of the First Christian Church, Springfield, Ill., is repeatedly breaking its records for attendance. The highest yet attained was June 13, when there were 416 present.

H. E. Stafford began work with First Church, Massillon, Ohio, May 23, where he found work in excellent condition. Kyle Brooks, former minister did a splendid work. He is a good organizer.

One hundred and five dollars was the amount given as Children's Day offering by the Sunday-school as Sacramento, Cal. C. L. Green, the new superintendent of the school is pushing the work with vigor.

L. A. Chapman of Elmwood, Neb., gave the Memorial sermon there on May 30, delivered the Decoration Day address on May 31, and is asked to give the oration at the Fourth of July celebration. All departments of the church at Elmwood are progressing.

At Imperial, Cal., where E. A. Cild is pastor there is talk of erecting an institutional church, and some of the money has already been subscribed for the work. Every department of the work is in flourishing condition.

John Young has been pastor of the church at Hollister, Cal., but five months, but during that time, every department of the church has taken on new life, and the membership is so enthusiastic over the future that they are planning to build at an early date.

The offering of the Sunday-school of the Jefferson Street Church, Buffalo, N. Y., was $639.76—"The greatest ever made by any of our schools in New York state." This assures the continuance of the missionary pastor of the church.

S. E. Fisher of Paxton, Ill., baptized twelve persons at a recent service, and received fourteen others into the fellowship of the church at a prayer meeting service, eleven of them being confessions. Most of these came says Mr. Fisher as a result of the Torrey meetings just closed.

Dr. Charles Hastings Dodd of Baltimore, who gave the splendid address on Union of Baptists and Disciples at the Congress of the Disciples last year has been invited by the First Church, Springfield, Ill., to address at this church on his return from a trip he is now making to the Pacific Coast.

June 16 was commencement day at Drake University. The commencement address was delivered by Dr. Edwin Lindsay Powell whose subject was "The Loyalty of Human Nature." There were from all departments this year 219 graduates. It has been a very successful year at the University.

H. J. Loken, pastor of the church at Alameda, Cal., will deliver the annual address at the coming convention at Santa Cruz. His address will be given Sunday morning, August 1, and will deal with the problems of evangelism in the state. Mr. Loken is eminently fitted for such a task.

DeLoss Smith has recently undergone an operation for appendicitis at Memorial Hospital, New York. The operation was successful, and Mr. Smith has the promise of being able to take up his work at an early date. This news from W. L. Fisher will be welcomed by the many friends of Mr. Smith throughout the country.

Joseph A. Serena, pastor of the Central Church, Syracuse, N. Y., delivered the Commencement address at Keuka College. Arthur Braden has been elected president of this important work, formed by the co-operation of the Free-Baptists and the Disciples. It is said that plan of co-operation is working well.

For thirty years Prof. J. N. Thompson, of Thompson's Business College at Hollister, Cal., has been superintendent of the Sunday-school of the Christian Church of that city, resigning his position in the last few weeks. The pastor, John Young, writes in terms of highest appreciation of the work of Prof. Thompson.

After five years' successful work C. W. Jopson has resigned as pastor of the church at Stockton, Cal., to take effect August 12. During the last year of Mr. Jopson's service 123 persons have been added to the membership of the church, and the Sunday-school has had an average attendance of over 200, being second to the largest in the city.

I. N. McCash has been elected "Instructor in Pastoral Work and Methods" in Berkeley Bible Seminary for the next academic year. Dr. McCash has had a rich experience as pastor at Maryville, Mo., and University Place, Des Moines, Iowa, which eminently fits him for this work. His duties at the Seminary will not at all interfere with his work for the church, of which he is pastor.

The church at Vincennes, Ind., celebrated its seventy-sixth anniversary June 20, the church being organized June 6, 1833, with nine members. Morris R. Trimble was the first pastor. A sermon appropriate to the occasion and reviewing the history of the church was preached by the present pastor, William Oeschger, who has done a very effective work during the last five years.

George Chandler who sinceh is graduation from Eureka College three years ago, has been preaching for the two churches at Camden and Youngstown, Ill., while spending a part of each year in study at the University of Chicago, has been called to give full time to the work at Youngstown, Ill., so greatly has the work grown that both pastor and people believe this move to be advisable.

The annual union picnic of the churches of Central Illinois will be held at Havana, Ill., again this year. The churches of Peoria, Jacksonville, Springfield, Havana, Pekin, and others participate in this annual meeting, and find it a very enjoyable affair. A low rate is secured from the railroad and great crowds go in on the special trains from the larger places. E. E. Elliott, Peoria, and O. C. Bolman, Havana, are president and secretary of the association.

Walter Kline has resigned as pastor of the church at Lewiston, Ill., and accepted a position as railway mail clerk. Thus another earnest man steps from the ranks of the ministers. Can any person be assigned for such action besides lack of faith on the part of the ministry? One or two large effective churches in a town like Lewiston might hope to give proper support to a minister, but with many struggling churches their life can neither be interesting or effective.

Roy E. Deadman, pastor of the Kerr Street Mission, Buffalo, N. Y., and Miss Cora C. Frank, of Buffalo, were married June 3, by B. Ferrall, pastor of the Jefferson Street Church, of which Mr. Deadman is the Living Link missionary. Mr. Deadman is a graduate of Drake University, and has been with the Kerr Street Mission since the first of June, having served formerly at Evanston, Ill., a suburb of Chicago. Miss Frank is a charming lady, well fitted for the responsible position she enters. The Century wishes Mr. and Mrs. Deadman godspeed.

The annual convention of the Christian Missionary Society of Eastern Pennsylvania, the convention of the C. W. B. M., and of the Ministerial Association will be held at Lock Haven, June 29 to July 1. Some of the leading topics are, "Children and the Church," W. L. Dudley, Lancaster; "Training for the Ministry," Richard Bagby, Scranton; "Our Next Century," George W. Knepper, Wilkinsburg; with other addresses by Marion Stevenson, St. Louis, A. McLean, Cincinnati, W. J. Wright, Cincinnati, Prof. A. Moss, Wilkesbarre, H. G. Weaver, Reading, George C. Zeigler, Berwick, W. I. Burrell, Benton, E. E. Manley, Scranton.

A farewell reception was given Dr. Dye by the ministers of Chicago, Monday afternoon, June 21. A goodly company of people were present, and enjoyed the farewell words of both Dr. Dye and Njoji, who is "a sort of demonstration of what they do at the Congo mission." In addition to the one thousand dollars given by the churches of Chicago, an additional $135 was given to Dr. Dye at this farewell meeting, to be used in the purchase of equipment for the work. Dr. Dye and Njoji are to sail on the Arabic the 26th. His address will be care G. B. Thompson, 12 Goree Piazza, Liverpool, until July 10; Queens Hotel, Antwerp, until the 15th; care Dr. A. Sims, Leopoldville, The Congo, until August 5, and after that Bolengi, via Coquilhatville, Dist. de la Equeateur, Congo Belge.

DRAKE UNIVERSITY

Established in 1881, its growth has been continuous. The annual attendance has increased until it has reached over 1800. More than 150 instructors are employed. Ten buildings are devoted exclusively to school purposes. Library facilities are unexcelled in the west.

Drake University is ideally located in the Capital City of Iowa, is open to both men and women on equal terms, expenses are low, and opportunities for remunerative employment are unusually good.

Fall Quarter Opens September 20th, 1909.

New Mexico-West Texas Convention

May 29-June 3.

The Convention of the above vast territory is now a matter of history. This was the third gathering and the infant born at Las Vegas but two years ago has become a stalwart man. We met in the beautiful city of El Paso under the most favorable of auspices.

This convention was a memorable one for many reasons. It was but a year ago that the thought of uniting West Texas and New Mexico in one great district was suggested. It is now a fact and we are all more than delighted and hopeful. All the churches of the west of the great state of Texas are much nearer to the territory of New Mexico than to the center of their own great state, and are of more service in this united district.

El Paso is the center of a large territory from four to two hundred miles north, east and west. The fertile valleys of the territory of New Mexico and the whole country East along the line of the "Sunset Route" converge at El Paso, making this city the natural center of our organization.

Here we have the strongest congregation of our district. It is a surprise to find in this new and growing city such a splendid modern church building and a large and enthusiastic membership. The pastor, Bro. H. B. Robinson, and his talented wife are leading this church to real things in the Kingdom. We were most royally entertained from the moment we arrived to the departure of our trains.

We had with us Bro. Denton of the Home Board, Bro. Mohorter of the Benevolent Association, and Mrs. Harrison of the C. W. B. M. To say that we had from these a feast of good things is putting it very mildly. We had as well Bro. Bush, one of the veterans of Texas, and ministers from the different pulpits in our own district. It means something to meet in convention with your brethren when maybe you had not seen a brother minister during the whole year. To all of us it was a rare season of real Christian fellowship. Our visiting Secretaries expressed themselves many times at meeting so many excellent brethren of the ministry in this far South-West land. The program was carried out without scarcely a change and was a feast of good things from start to finish.

We go some distances to reach our convention. The writer, located at Roswell, in the Pecos valley, went over six hundred miles to reach El Paso, and others from five hundred down. It was worth it, and we are ready to travel further for something as good.

Dr. W. E. Garrison, President of the Agricultural College at Las Cruces, was present and presided over the sessions of the convention. His "President's address," as well as that on "Present Day Problems," were proof that Dr. Garrison is thinking along religious lines as well as organizing and building up a great educational institution in this rapidly growing and developing territory. One thing that impressed you was the freshness and freedom of conventionalities of form and thought. Our ministers and church leaders are face to face with difficult problems and are to solve them. We are not wedded to the old forms. As illustrative of this, Dr. Garrison spoke of the Episcopal church at Las Cruces that has a special dispensation to receive members without the rite of confirmation. The rector not only speaks for other congregations, but invites others into his own pulpit to speak. For years the East has been looking to the West for men to fill her pulpits and soon the great South-West will be sending giants back to save the churches of the East from stagnation.

The writer had charge of the Bible study and delivered three addresses. An interesting session dwelt with the "Preacher" when our ministers, Francis, Robison, Webb, Ament, Sellards and Dutt spoke out of their experience. Another session was given to the history of our movement at which Brethren Zwinglius Moore, Homer Magee and W. E. Bryson spoke. The C. E. was represented by Miss Edna Goff, the Prayer Meeting by L. L. Shaw, the Bible School by Prof. Curd, the Church and Missions by A. J. Bush, and the Church and Men by the Y. M. C. A. Secretary, C. G. Titus. Dr. Homan gave an interesting address on the necessity of "A National Tubercular Sanatorium" to be established and supported by our people. A resolution was passed asking our Centennial Convention to take this important question up for discussion and consideration.

An interesting event of the convention was the graduation of a class in the "Teacher Training Work." The writer delivered an address on "What is the Bible?" and the pastor, H. B. Robison, presented the diplomas.

Bro. F. F. Grim, our Corresponding Secretary, gave a most interesting report of the year's work. Bro. Grim has the confidence of our churches and we all rejoice in the work accomplished. He has opened up work at a number of places, held a number of meetings, and located a number of preachers. We are now sowing the seed. We must have the support of our Home Board in this work. We are appreciative of what both the A. C. M. S. and the Church Extension board have done. One dollar spent now is worth ten a few years later. We are planning for advanced work.

Roswell, N. Mex. Geo. Fowler.

The Adult Bible Class Union

The very rapid multiplication of organized Adult Bible Classes with the International Certificate of Recognition, suggests the opportunity of a new movement among our schools in the cities where we have more than one Bible school.

In such places it will be found very helpful and stimulating for the certified organized Adult Bible Classes to form a local union of their own. The day is coming when in all of our cities there will be a federation of the Adult Bible Classes of all denominations. In the meantime our own schools in the cities can be promoting their own interests, and through the schools the interests of the churches, by the organization of Adult Bible Class Unions. The nature and purpose of such unions are set forth in the brief constitution which follows.

The possibilities of such an Adult Bible Class Union are limitless. The interests of the Adult Classes may be promoted; the Sunday-school built up; the Centennial Aim, "All the Church and as many more in the Bible School" realized; evangelism will be stimulated; missionary offerings will increase; church services will be better attended; the social life of the churches will be brightened and sweetened by the Adult Bible Class socials. Every good cause which ought to follow regular and concerted Bible study will be promoted by the Adult Bible Class Union. Such unions are now being formed in a number of our large cities, and will be reported from time to time from the office of the National Christian Bible School Association.

As fast as such unions are formed the National office should be notified, so that each union may receive its serial number. Address all communications concerning this matter to Marion Stevenson, National Superintendent of Bible Schools, 393 N. Euclid Ave., Room 20, St. Louis, Missouri.

May Happenings in Kentucky's Needy Fields

Harlan county had the labors of A. E. Robertson for a part of the month and the work goes well.

E. C. Lunger was with the Second Church, Richmond, two Sundays. He locates with the work after graduation.

Three added at Bardstown by relation. J. B. Briney says that the work is improving rapidly.

D. G. Combs added forty during twenty-eight days of hard work, mostly in Lewis county.

Eighteen additions constitute a part of J. W. Masters' results in the months of April and May in Knox and Laurel counties.

Eight added tells only a part of the story of the work of H. H. Thompson in the great county of Pike.

W. P. Collins did some faithful work in Johnson and Floyd counties.

Bromley and the preacher, L. A. Kohler, rejoice in the addition of three to their numbers.

J. L. Hall gave a part of the month to Johnson, Floyd and Martin counties and reports four added.

H. C. Runyon reports no additions at Latonia. Fine audiences and work prospering.

Six additions in the field worked by Z. Ball, consisting of the counties of Jackson and Owsley.

One baptized as the result of twenty-one days' work in Wolfe and Morgan counties by W. L. Lacy.

South Louisville and J. B. Lockhart move forward with determination to win the victory.

R. B. Baker baptized three in his field of Laurel, Clay and Knox counties.

G. H. Thomas baptized six in the second London District.

Four additions reported by Wm. Gross in Clay county.

J. B. Flinchum is reaping some of the harvest from faithful seed sowing in Breathitt county, eleven added in twelve days, at some of his regular places of preaching.

W. J. Cooke spent the month in the "Purchase" raising funds and arranging for meetings that have begun. This looks toward

Our Book Counter

THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY has on hand a considerable number of recently published volumes which it will sell at exceedingly low prices. These books are almost all quite new; in a very few cases they have been slightly used, but in no case are they worn. We quote below the title, author, publisher's price, and the special price which we are making. Orders will be filled in the order of their acceptance. It would be well if those ordering would mention a second choice in case the first should be gone. In those cases in which the desired volumes have been disposed of the orders will be promptly returned. The books will be sent postpaid on receipt of price.

W. A. Wolfe reports progress at Springfield, two additions.

W. J. Hudspeth report twenty-five days at work. He has been sick for some days and expects to be able to begin some meetings at an early date.

H. W. Elliott was much of the month away from his desk and in person and by clerical help sent out many letters in the interest of the work. The receipts amounted to $653.13. This is a little more than half the expenses of the month.

Only about three months remain until the convention at Lexington. We need the fellowship of many of our strong churches to enable us to meet obligations and to close the year creditably. We urge every church not having fellowship with us to the extent of the apportionment to take vigorous steps to attend to this matter in the shortest time possible. We must not go to our Centennial Convention with an appalling deficit. Hundreds of our brethren could lend a hand personally to make up for the deficiencies of the apportioned churches. We will need the united help of every friend of the work.

Records Broken

Yesterday the Central and Howett Strett Christian Bible Schools observed Children's Day; the Central school setting 400 as an aim for attendance and $73.00 for the missionary offering and the Howett Street school an attendance of 300 and $110.00 as their offering. When the count was made, it revealed at Central 487 present, with a total collection of $165.00 and at Howett Street an attendance of 292 and collection of $125.00, making a total attendance in both schools on this day of 779, and a missionary offering of $290.00. In the Central school, the Centennial (Ladies) class, Mrs. C. O. Freeman, President, numbered 109, and the Century (Men's) class, A. I. Buckwalter, President, 66. At Howett Street the Centennial Primary class, Miss Lorena Simonson, Supt., had 102 present. The special exercises at both schools in the evening were enjoyed by crowded houses. In the evening at Howett Street, Minister William Price gave a short address on the meaning of "Children's Day" in relation to foreign missions. At Central Church the minister, W. F. Turner, gave an illustrated sermon on "Habits," which was well received, and he has been requested to repeat such sermon at the Children's Day exercises of the Calvary Presbyterian Church next Sunday, June 20, at 12:30 o'clock. Christian Temple Seminary

The fifth commencement exercises of the Christian Temple Seminary, Baltimore, were held June 13-18 and was perhaps the best in our history, although the graduating class was two less than last year. Two of the graduates of last year received honorable mention because of extra work done. Of the graduating class this year, one of the young ladies, who is a member of the Baptist Church, has offered herself to the Foreign Board of that church and will take up foreign missionary work. Another of the young ladies, who is a member of the Christian Church, will enter one of our own colleges in the fall to prepare herself for the same service. All of the graduates are active in Christian work. Out of the Freshmen and Junior classes fourteen will enter our colleges for the completion of their work for the ministry and foreign field. Four will go to the College of the Bible in Lexington, Ky., three to Milligan College, Milligan, Tenn., and seven will go to Bethany College, Bethany W. Va. These fourteen are all members of the Christian Temple. This is the beginning of our quota for 100 of our young people for the ministry and the foreign missionary field.

Some of our graduates are equipped to be competent pastoral helpers. Their three years' course in the study of the Bible and in missionary work, and their practical experience in a large city church gives them a first-class equipment for service in any church. The spirit of the Seminary has been all that could be desired. The student body had been exceptionally good and the prospects for larger work are evident. Last year we had about 100 students.

The address to the graduating class on commencement evening was delivered by Brother F. D. Power, of Washington, D. C., and like all that Brother Power does and says, it was beautiful, strong and appropriate. Large audiences were in attendance upon all of the exercises and the deepening interest of this work throughout the city promises for large classes next fall, when the sixth session will open.

Baltimore, Md. Peter Ainslie, Dean.

Encouraging Gains

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the first twenty-three days of June amount to $41,026, a gain of $13,055 over the corresponding time last year. The churches as churches gave $9,093, a gain of $5,445. The Sunday-schools gave $23,800, a gain of $2,495. Individual gifts amount to $6,819, a gain of $5,576. There was also a gain of sixty contributing churches and thirty-six contributing Sunday-schools.

The total receipts of the year, that is, from October 1, 1908, to June 23, 1909, amount to $177,774, a gain of $42,595, or nearly thirty-two per cent. The churches as churches have given $100,244, a gain of $15,035, or about fifteen per cent. The individual gifts have reached $21,757, a gain of $14,030, or about 180 per cent. There has been a gain also in the number of offerings from every source, churches, Sunday-schools, Endeavor Societies, individual gifts and annuity gifts. The annuity gifts have about trebled.

There has also been a gain every month of this missionary year. These are the best all around gains in the history of the Foreign Society for the corresponding time. We are encouraged but not satisfied. What can we say to that great host of good, loyal people who have as yet done nothing toward the swelling tide of interest? All who have done so nobly would gladly welcome them to fellowship in the larger and better life. Send to F. M. Rains, secretary, Box 884, Cincinnati, Ohio.

A. McLean, President.
S. J. Corey, Secretary.

Church Extension Notes

During the months of May and June some special gifts have been received by the Board of Church Extension. R. A. Long made a special gift of $2,500 ,and also proposed to the Independence Boulevard Church, Kansas City, Mo., that the congregation, as speedily as possible, increase their Named Fund to $50,000. A special gift of $500 was received from Fred Doeller of Columbus, Ind., to add to the Ruth M. Doeller Loan Fund.

The following annuities have been received: A friend in New Hampshire sent $100; a frien din Nebraska $100; a friend in Ohio $1,200, and a brother in Illinois $3,000. The Centennial aim of the board of Church Extension is to lift our Annuity Fund to $300,000 by the time of the Centennial. We have $235,777.18 in the fund now. For information in regard to the Annuity Plan write to G. W. Muckley, Cor. Sec., 500 Waterworks Bldg., Kansas City, Mo.

Since October 1, 1908, our receipts amount to $32,983.77. This is a gain over last year up to June 22 of $6,546.41. We must make every effort to reach the Million this year, or at least make this the greatest year of receipts in the history of the Board of Church Extension.

This is a wonderful year for church building. The board has made forty-eight loans this year amountin gto $96,450. More than $150,000 of loans have been granted, and the church buildings are going up now. The board must have a great September offering to reach the payment of these loans.

An apportionment letter has been sent to all the churches on June 1. It is hoped the churches will arrange at once to raise their apportionments or more. Never more than

Books You Need

We offer some of the most timely and vital books now appearing among the Disciples of Christ. You need every one of this splendid list.

OUR CENTENNIAL BOOK.

"Historical Documents Advocating Christian Union."--Edited by C. A. Young.

This book is the classic for this our Centennial year. It contains Thomas Campbell's "Declaration and Address"; Alexander Campbell's "Sermon on the Law"; Boston W. Stone's "Last Will and Testament of the Springfield Presbytery"; Isaac Errett's "Our Position"; J. H. Garrison's "The World's Need of Our Plea." Beautifully illustrated. Retail price, $1.00. No one should allow the Centennial to pass without possessing this book.

Z. T. Sweeney, Columbus, Ind., a preacher of national reputation, writes:

"I congratulate you on the happy thought of collecting and editing these documents. They ought to be in the home of every Disciple of Christ in the Land, and I believe they should have a large and increasing sale in years to come."

Basic Truths of the Christian Faith, by Herbert L. Willett, author of The Ruling Quality, Teaching of the Books, Prophets of Israel, etc., etc. Post 8vo., cloth, 127 pages. Front cover stamped in gold, gilt top, illustrated, 75 cents, paper 25 cents.

A powerful and masterful presentation of the great truths for the attainment of the life of the spirit. Written in a charming and scholarly style. It holds the reader's fascinated attention so closely that it is a disappointment if the book has to be laid aside before it is finished.

J. E. Chase writes:

"It is the voice of a soul in touch with the Divine life, and breathes throughout its pages the high ideals and noblest conception of truer life, possibly only to him who has tarried prayerfully, studiously at the feet of the world's greatest teacher."

Our Plea for Union and the Present Crisis, by Herbert L. Willett, author of the Life and Teachings of Jesus, etc., etc. 12mo., cloth, 140 pages, gold stamped, postpaid 50 cents.

Written in the belief that the Disciples of Christ are passing through an important, and in many respects, transitional period.

The author says:

"It is with the hope that * * * present forces and opportunities may be wisely estimated by us; that doors now open may be entered; that hopes only partially real now may come to fruition that these churches are given their present form."

Every Disciple of Christ will be interested in getting from his own pen the teachings of Professor Willett. No fair man will consent to judge him on the basis of newspaper reports. These books should be in every one's possession just now.

ERRETT GATES' ILLUMINATING WORK.

"The Early Relation and Separation of Baptists and Disciples."

This is the theme of the hour. Dr. Gates has put into our hand the historic facts with a grace and charm that makes them read like a novel. In cloth, 75c. Paper binding, 25c.

We owe a debt of gratitude to the writer of this book, and could only wish that it might be read not only by our people all over the land, but scattered among the Baptists. It is a most meritorious and splendid contribution to our literature.—THE CHRISTIAN WORKER, PITTSBURG, PA.

The dominant personality of Alexander Campbell is so brought out as to give to what might be regarded as the dry details of ecclesiastical history and controversy almost the interest of a story. A valuable contribution to the history of the American churches.—THE CONGREGATIONALIST, BOSTON, MASS.

The Plea of the Disciples of Christ, by W. T. Moore. Small 16mo., cloth, 140 pages, net postpaid, thirty-five cents, won immediate success.

George Hamilton Combs, pastor of the Independence Boulevard Christian Church, Kansas City, Mo., one of the great churches of the brotherhood, writes:

"I cannot thank Dr. W. T. Moore enough for having written his little book on "Our Plea." It is more than a statement; it is a philosophy. Irenic, catholic, steel-tone, it is just the handbook I shall like to put into the hands of the thinking man on the outside. In all of his useful and honored life Mr. Moore has rendered no greater service to a great cause."

JUDGE SCOFIELD'S FASCINATING TALE.

"Altar Stairs."

An ideal gift book. Beautifully bound and illustrated. Price, $1.20.

Address,

The New Christian Century Co.

235 E. 40th St., Chicago.

1,700 congregations have contributed to the Church Extension Fund, and 400 of these have been irregular. Let all the churches come up this year to their full duty and privilege in contributing to Church Extension during the Centennial Offering in September.

The month of June was spent by the Corresponding Secretary in the New Northwest addressing the Conventions of Montana, North and South Idaho, Eastern and Western Washington and Oregon. In these conventions preachers and church workers have applied to the secretary for more than $20,000 to assist in the erectio nof new buildings. Seven loans were asked for in the Eastern Washington District alone, and five in South Idaho. This is the great Inland Empire Country, where Hill and Harriman and the Canadian Pacific and the Milwaukee and St. Paul Railroad men are building new lines of railroad with millions of money. This expresses their faith in commercial development. Have we faith enough to follow up the development of these new towns with the right equipment of our churches with buildings? Is it possible that our plea sometimes paralyzes our efforts so that we fail to equip our new congregations with proper buildings that command the respect and confidence of the community? Ours is the most democratic plea on American soil and the most winning. Let us not feel that because it is the best it does not therefore need equipment. Given a consecrated preacher and a loyal congregation and a proper equipment in the way of a good church building, and the cause of New Testament Christianity and the Plea for Unity on that basis will win in any town or city in the United States or Canada.

During June, A. F. Sanderson of Houston, Texas, delivere dthe Church Extension address at the Texas Convention at Corsicana; Geo. W. Knepper of Wilkinsburg, Pa., delivered the Church Extension address at the Eastern Pennsylvania Convention; Robt. Stewart of Rochester, N. Y., delivered the address at the New York Convention, and E. B. Bagby of Ft. Smith, Ark., delivered the address at the Arkansas Convention. The board is grateful for these services.

In Washington, Oregon, Idaho and Montana the Board of Church Extension has helped to build eighty-nine churches. More than half the congregations in the Northwest have been aided by this board.

As We Go to Press

Falls City, Neb., June 27—William J. Lockhart and Lintt close tomorrow night. Greatest meeting ever held by any church in Falls City. 144 to date. Bible school doubled. New church building demanded and assured. Brother Lockhart returns to his Des Moines home for summer vacation and Brother Lintt to Lincoln, Neb.—F. Elsworth Day.

Angola, Ind., June 28.—20 added Friday, 16 Saturday, 28 yesterday, with three hundred in fourteen days of invitations. Converts for every Christian church in the county. Never saw a whole county wrought up as Steuben County is. This county seat church and its pastor and this great meeting have proven a great blessing to all our country congregations.—Chas. Reign Scoville. (Mr. Minges, Mr. and Mrs. Van Camp and Mrs. Scoville, Assistants.)

FROM THE HOME OFFICE.

The offerings from the churches and Sunday-schools are still coming in at an encouraging rate. But the most encouraging news is the gift of an annuity of $3,000 from a good sister in Kentucky who does not desire her name revealed. This sister has been one of the annuitants of the Home Society for a number of years. She believes in the necessity of preaching the gospel in America in order to establish places of resource for the work that is to be done in the regions beyond. There are scores of men and women, members of the Church of Christ who could make gifts upon the Annuity plan to the American Christian Missionary Society, and by so doing help to establish the cause firmly in the countless needy places in our own country, and who could by so doing at the same time build up the cause in the foreign fields. Every church established upon the Home Field becomes instantly an active supporter of the work in the foreign field.

Another annuitant in Ohio who has $800 invested on the Annuity plan sends word that he will send us another offering in a short time in order to have $1,000 invested in this way. Another brother in Iowa sends word that he will send us $500 in the course of a few months on the Annuity plan.

These and others who are in correspondence on the subject are deeply imbued with the idea that our Home Missionary work has not been emphasized in our pulpits in recent years as it deserves to be, and our immediate attention must be turned to the evangelization of our own country if we are to conserve what we have already established, and at the same time extend our territory.

Gifts on the Annuity plan assures an income at the rate of 5 per cent or 6 per cent per annum while the Annuitant lives, the money to be turned into the general fund for evangelistic purposes at the death of the giver. The officers of the American Christian Missionary Society will be glad to furnish information upon this subject to those who feel an interest in the establishment of the cause at home.

CHEERING CHILDREN'S DAY RETURNS.

Weston, Mo.—We send $60.00, Children's Day offering. Give us a share in some mission station.—E. M. Hardesty.

Spivey, Kansas—We send $10.80. This is the first missionary offering from our Sunday-school, which was organized last March.—H. W. Ellsworth.

Washington, Pa.—We had 1,352 present and an offering of $788.00. This will be increased. Better not publish until you hear again. We are happy. Our greatest foreign offering. Our children pulled over the idol fifteen feet high. When it was pulled to pieces the children went wild with joy. Made a profound impression.—E. A. Cole.

Seventh St., Indianapolis, Ind.—We have more than doubled our apportionment. We enclose $63.35.—A. C. Ward.

Everett, Wash.—Our apportionment was $20.00. We send $50.00.—Josephine Tanner.

Newberg, Ore.—Children's Day offering $20.28 to date. More to follow.—George C. Ritchie.

Osceola, Ia.—Greatest Children's Day in our history. Almost three times our apportionment. We send $70.00.—W. H. Willard.

Puyallup, Wash.—Great day yesterday. More than doubled our apportionment.—Lee Saddler.

Des Moines, Ia.—University Place Church gives $3,000 for missionary interest.—M. E. Barnhill.

Lawrenceville, Ill.—$52.50 for Children's Day.—H. C. Holmes.

Two Statements Relative to American Missions

At the regular May meeting of the Board of Trustees of the American Missionary Society, H. A. Denton, Centennial Secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society, on account of the undesirability of being away from his family so much, asked the Board of Trustees to release him from the unexpired part of his present year that he might take up a pastorate again and be at home with his family, where he felt that duty called him. The Board granted this request, and below will be found a statement both from the Board and Brother Denton.

I.

At a recent meeting of the Board of Trustees of the American Missionary Society I requested the Board to release me from the unexpired portion of my time as Centennial Secretary of the American Christian Missionary Society.

The health of my wife has been poor ever since moving to Cincinnati, and by absences from home, often and for extended periods of time, have had a tendency to aggravate rather than improve the matter. I promised my family that I would take a pastorate again, and be at home, that I might give them the time and attention due them. The Board has very kindly granted my request. Having received a request from the officers of the Christian Church at Bedford, Ind., to take the pastorate of that congregation when neither party had seen or heard the other, I have accepted that work, feeling that it was the place where the Lord called me.

In closing my work with the American Missionary Society I am striving to do so in a way that will give the greatest possible impetus to our offering. I am praying that churches and preachers, and church officials everywhere double their energies in behalf of American missions, in order that our books may close on September 30 with our fondest expectations realized.

Let us not forget that the Christian Conquest of America means the hastening of the Christian Conquest of the whole earth.

H. A. Denton.

II.

Whereas, Brother H. A. Denton has been forced to discontinue his services with the American Christian Missionary Society as Centennial Secretary, because the health of his wife is such as to require more of his time at home than he feels able to spend there and accomplish the high purposes and realize the ideals which he entertains for one in his office:

And, whereas, Brother Denton offered his resignation at the last regular meeting of th Executive Board of the American Christian Missionary Society, and the same was accepted by this body, therefore be it

Resolved by the Executive Board of the American Christian Missionary Society,

First, That we give up Brother Denton with very deep regret.

Second, That, during his two years' service with this Society, he has shown a capacity for work, and obtained results, the value of which the future alone can tell.

Third, That, during this period, we have come to know and appreciate his splendid Christian character, his courage and industry, the zeal and devotion with which he prosecutes his labor, his fidelity to duty, and loyalty to every enterprise of Christ's kingdom.

Fourth, That we bespeak for him and his family a warm place in the hearts of any people among whom he may be called to serve.

Fifth, That we wish for him the greatest success in his work at Bedford. We heartily commend Brother Denton to the church there, and pray that God may bless it abundantly under his leadership.

Sixth, That a copy of these resolutions be spread upon the minutes of this Society, and copies sent to our papers, and a copy to Brother Denton. (Signed)

Annual Meeting at Cedar Rapids, Iowa

From the Greeting of the First Christian Church, Cedar Rapids, Iowa, where G. B. Van Arsdall is pastor, we take the following report:

"The annual meeting last week was a most happy event and the reports indicated splendid service done during the year in all departments of the church. The list of officers announced last Sunday as nominations by the board were all elected and Mr. P. C. Frick and B. H. Witwer were made elders for life. A. H. Niles was elected missionary secretary-treasurer. The treasury of the church is short only $60 and there is that much yet due on pledges from last year. The Bible-school has had an average attendance for the year of 163. There are 501 resident members of the church, seventy-six of whom have been received into the church during the past year. The following figures show the amount of money raised in the different departments. For current expenses—the church, $4,368; the Industrial Circle, $700; the Bible-school, $249; the C. E. Society, $28; for the Breeden meetings, $670; for missions: the Bible-school, $387; C. W. B. M., $322; C. E. Society, $32; the church, $944; making a total for current expenses of $6,015 and for missions, $1,685. Of the above amounts $300 is reckoned twice, leaving a net total for all purposes of $7,400. The Industrial Circle now has $700 in their building fund.

A Parting Word from Royal J. Dye

To the many friends of Bolenge:

There are so many who have written us and with whom we have had personal converse in these days of the homeland that I can hardly get to write to you all a parting message, so I am asking you through the kindness of our great Christian paper, to take this as a personal message and greeting.

These days at home this time have been full of most pleasant meetings and fellowships. I have enjoyed going to the "rallies," and meeting the faithful few who came to them. I have enjoyed meeting you in your church homes and feeling the thrill of your sympathy and the inspiration of your interest. I have felt at such times that we could take the world for our Lord Christ if we but would. The church is great in its evangelistic fervor, its beautiful houses of worship, its "swell choirs," its talented preachers, none can surpass us in these things. We have even outdone the denominations in church architecture, building ours a little finer or larger and more sumptuous in some places. We have as much wealth as any church. The Lord has blessed some of our people with large means. We are able to do almost anything we may set our hearts to do. None have more self-sacrificing leaders than we. There is not a man at the head of any mission board who can compare with our incomparable and beloved Brother McLean. There are no other missions having greater successes in their fields of labor than are we. None have greater opportunities than do we. The clarion call to duty was never louder than now. Why do we tarry?

Can it be that the twenty-nine churches who have failed to make good this year so far, are haggling over some difference of opinion? God forgive them. Can it be that indifference is the cause? Again, may God forgive them. Can it be that there are still some in honesty doubting the carefulness and conscience of the Foreign Board in the distribution of the funds intrusted to their care? I am only one and I am no more than any of you, but I have seen the carefulness with which they spend every cent in the Cincinnati office and the prayerfulness with which every cent is divided among the different fields according to their several needs. The most economical administration of any mission society doing a world work. Progressive, aggressive, consecrated, conscientious men are our leaders. They call themselves your servants. And they are, for they serve us all. Let us stand nobly and worthily by them to a man.

It has done us no little good to hear the words of sympathy and loving commendation for the work we have been trying to do as your representatives in "Darkest Africa." The tear of deep feeling has stirred us all. The word of enthusiastic response to the message of duty, has given us hope and the warm shake of hand has meant much to your workers who go down into the pit. The assurance of interest has sent a word of cheer to the workers left behind. The resolves to make greater offerings and widen our stakes in the great fields were everywhere, but Friends, it takes just plain, cold (Oh! how cold!) hard, (My! how hard to get) cash to do any of this work. Oregon in her great vision and enthusiasm pledged and is raising the money for the steamer for the Congo and its immense field of labor. Northern and Southern California are raising their Centennials for new stations, new centers of gospel light and evangelism in "Darkest Africa." But are these states alone responsible for its redemption? You who feel a like responsibility and like interest in the work will help them or will help build the college that shall train those heroic native evangelists for the "Taking of their nation for Christ." Now is the acceptable time of missionary giving.

This our great Centennial year would be incomplete without an offering worthy of our "Plea." Churches, individuals, Sunday schools, Endeavors may be glad indeed to report their offerings this year, may be glad to come to the great meeting of the clans there in Pittsburg and have a share in the vision that will be there to inspire all. We should not only reach our Centennial aims, but should exceed them that the great Athenaeum in Pittsburg may not be large enough to hold our enthusiasm and joy. We missionaries in the forefront of the battle will look to you to see what you have done, not said. We will anxiously scan the papers not so much for what eloquence we may read there as for what you have given. We are giving all that we have, our lives and we expect you to make your share good, by giving what represents your lives. Let us all rejoice together and step forward in the work of taking the world for our Lord and His Christ. Will you help? Now?

Yours very sincerely in His glad service for "Darkest Africa."

Notes from the Foreign Field

The church at Ashland, Ore., enters the Living Link rank. This church has given $660 this year besides what the Sunday-school gives. W. L. Mellinger is the pastor.

Miss Emma Lyon, Nankin, China, reports the baptism of eight of the girls in her school.

Among the late reports from Longa, Upper Congo, Africa, there were ten baptisms. There were also a number of baptisms at Lotumbe.

A friend of the Foreign Society in Indiana, who had just written his will, provides $10,000 for the Foreign Society.

Dr. Royal J. Dye has returned to Africa. Thousands will be interested in this announcement. He leaves his family at Eureka, Ill. He left there Friday morning, June 21, and reached New York City the evening of the 22nd. He sailed on the S. S. "Arabic" on the 24th, and will reach Liverpool July 3. He will spend ten days in England. After this he will visit Brussels and have a conference with the Secretary of State of Belgium concerning Congo matters. On July 15 he will sail for Bolenge and reach Matadi, mouth of the Congo River, August 3, and Bolenge about August 21.

Herbert Smith and wife of Montgomery, W. Va., have just gone out to Bolenge, Africa. They are new missionaries. Both were students in Bethany College. C. P. Hedges, Bolenge, was also a former student of Bethany.

Last week a friend, who will not permit his name to be published, made a direct gift to the Foreign Society of $4,000 to be used toward building the colleges at Vigan, Philippine Islands and Bolenge, Africa. He gives this $4,000 to help make good the proposition of R. A. Long, who will give $10,000 for the two colleges upon the condition that $40,000 is raised besides. This friend has given every year to the work for a quarter of a century. He is not a wealthy man, but a good man, who loves the gospel and wants to see it spread in the earth.

Our Brother Chwang, Nankin, China, has given $1,100 to aid in the purchase of land to enlarge our mission property in that city. Such a Chinaman is certainly worth converting.

Last week the Foreign Society received an annuity gift of $500 from a friend who had made seven gifts before. His total gifts now aggregate $20,100. He made his first gift September 4, 1897. He also makes direct personal gifts every year. He believes the gospel and does all he can to make others believers.

Missionaries of the Foreign Society in the Philippines have issued a number of tracts and booklets for general distribution among the people. The titles are as follows: "First Steps in the Teachings of the Scriptures," sixteen pages; "Life of Christ," thirty-two pages: "Foundation of the Church," thirty-two pages; "Christ on His Throne," eight pages; "Christian Baptism," eight pages; "How to Distinguish the True Church," four pages; "The Confession," four pages. These are printed on our own Christian mission press at Vigan. We must give more attention to our publication work as our missions grow in numbers and strength.

Centennial Bulletin

Decided promptly and beyond question! The "greatest day of the Centennial" will be the Camp Fire of Veterans, Saturday, October 16. As fast as the brethren give us the addresses of the old men and women, we are writing each one a letter about it. The following whom the brotherhood delights to honor have written nominating their Committee of arrangements.

Some interesting words accompany their suggestions. We take the liberty of sharing a few typical sentences with the Christian Century family.

Indianapolis, Ind., W. L. Hayden; Louisiana, Mo., E. J. Longston; Tacoma, Wash., Wm. F. Cowden; Homestead, Pa., E. L. Allen;

Best Seal for Jelly Glasses

The way to be certain of keeping jellies unharmed by mold or damp is to discard troublesome paper covers and pour melted paraffine directly on the contents of each glass after jellies are cool.

Pure Refined

when cool, makes an air-tight seal and is more convenient than the old way. Fruit jars are sealed by dipping caps into melted paraffine after closing.

Use Pure Refined Paraffine as a polish for uncarpeted floors—put a little in hot starch to give finish to linens—add it to hot wash water and make the washing easier. Write for a neat Paraffine Paper Pad for use on ironing-day. It keeps sad-irons from sticking.

I have been trying to preach the Gospel since September 20, 1863—45 years. I am not able to say as yet whether I can be with you at Pittsburgh in October. If not there in body, I shall certainly be there in spirit. I will go if at all practicable.—John A Roberts, Shelbyville, Ind.

The veteran proposition is a good one. I heartily endorse it. I am 76 and a charter member of this church Shall be at Pittsburgh if well.—C. A. Preston, Ionia, Mich.

Am glad to say my health is good, and although in my 76th year, I hope to be at Pittsburgh at the Centennial.—Henry S. Earl, Macatawa, Mich.

I expect to go to the Pittsburgh Convention. At next birthday, November 29, I will be 80 if I live. Am still preaching every Sunday twice, and sometimes four times a day. I go over to the Navy Yard and preach on ships and in Navy Y. M. C. A. We have one preacher in Northern California, Brother Wilmot, nearly 91.—J. H. McCollough, San Jose, Cal.

I greatly desire to attend our Centennial Convention and, life and health permitting, I hope to do so.—Wm. M. Roe, Buchanan, Mich.

It would give me pleasure to attend the Centennial gathering of the Brotherhood, but my physical condition is such that I cannot go. You say that the brethren having the matter in charge "wish to remember even those who cannot come to Pittsburgh for the celebration." I will say that should the brethren "remember" me in any way during the sessions of the Convention, it would be justly appreciated. With the hope that the oCnventiou i ay accomplish much good and be heartily enjoyed by all who attend, I am. Your brother in Christ,—I. B. Grubbs, Lexington, Ky.

I was baptized in 1850 by Brother Benedict at Lafayette, Holmes Co., Ohio. Commenced preaching in 1857. Traveled and preached for years and held many meetings. The cause is a good one and I will still look for graeter things in the future. Yours in the hope of eternal life.—Adam Moore, Canton, Ohio.

I greatly desire to be there. My active work is nearing its close. I preach, however, nearly every week, yet I have been in public life continuously for 56 years. God bless you. —F. M. Green, Akron, Ohio.

I expect to be present and od what I can to make it a profitable occasion—and expect to enjoy it. I am aged 77. Have preached 52 years—added 3,000. Preach now every Lord's Day.—Alanson Wilcox, Cleveland, Ohio.

I am well pleased with your plan for the old folks. After all the veterans are in I would fill the house with others for the general good. Yours ever.—J. W. McGarvey, Lexington, Ky.

I will be 92 years old on the 17th of August. It will be just threescore (60) years in a few days since I made the good confession and was baptized in North Royalton, Ohio, by Brother Hayden.—A. Teachout, Cleveland, Ohio.

I was born in Lower Canada, under the reign of King William IV, July, 1854. Baptized at Fort Madison, Iowa, in the Mississippi River, the ice being cut away January 2, 1852. Admitted to membership in Lincoln St. Christian Church, Memphis, January 16, 1853—Membership transferred to Mississipp Ave. Christian Church, July, 1889. I expect to be present at the Centennial.—S. C. Toof, Memphis, Tenn.

I suppose that I am a "veteran." I am seventy-six years old. I have been a member of the Christian church for fifty-seven years, and have been preaching for fifty-three years. So you may enroll me among the veterans. I am doing all that I can for the Centennial.—L. L. Carpenter, Wabash, Ind.

Pittsburgh News

We have come to the drowsy end of our Association meetings. There were twenty-four present. The evangelistic report was very small indeed. We were favored by a visit from Orvis F. Jordan of Chicago, Ill., who is on the editorial staff of the CHRISTIAN CENTURY. In a brief talk he stated that from 25 to 50 per cent of the attendance at the churches had fallen off since the opening of the amusement parks in June. How to offset this shrinkage was a problem not only for Chicago to solve but all other cities in the union.

Chicago has been painted in pretty black colors by outsiders. It is supposed to be the birthplace of most all the religious heresies of the twentieth century. So far as our own churches are concerned they are not bothering their heads very much over these heresies, but are much more concerned about the morality of the city. A great fight is on for the preservation of the home; for the purification of the social life of the city, and for everything that makes for the betterment of men and women in all the relations of life.

We have made a discovery out here that in the earlier history of our church planting we started too many missions and thus weakened our work. We have faced this problem and are now busy along a new line,—the establishment of permanent churches that will be powers in their respective communities.

In answer to a question relative to the attendance at the Centennial he said that all the forces in the city, and in the portions of the states adjacent to the city, would join in making up a CHRISTIAN CENTURY train. He said there was great enthusiasm manifested in all parts of the middle west concerning the coming Centennial.

Wm. Ross Lloyd of Bellevue reported that Chas. Lewis Loos had been granted $865 per year from the Carnegie Teachers' Fund.

A most significant editorial appeared in this morning's Gazette-Times concerning the coming Centennial. Below is an abstract:

"But the chief attraction to visiting delegates must ever be the spirit of Pittsburgh hospitality. News of the manner in which we treat our guests has gone abroad. The Homeopathic physicians, the hardware manufacturers and dealers, and the Yale alumni have returned to their homes loud in the praises of their Pittsburgh hosts. The greatest gathering of the year to honor Pittsburgh will be that of the Christian denomination, which celebrates its Centennial here next October. Those in charge of the convention announce that no fewer than 30,000 rooms will be required for the delegates, the largest demand of the kind that has ever been made on Pittsburgh. There is little doubt that the demand will be fully met. Pittsburgh's capacity to entertain such an army will be put to a severe test, but we have now embarked in the business of being a Convention City and cannot afford to fail."

Chicago Church Notes.

C. G. Kindred was called to his former home at Lewiston last week by a telegram announcing the serious illness of his sister.

The Evanston church is pushing with all possible speed their building project and expect to occupy their new church home in the autumn.

Rev. Mr. Maurer of Iowa preached at Douglas Park Church last Sunday morning and evening. He is in attendance at the University of Chicago this summer.

The Austin church has broken ground for their new church building, which they hope to complete by early autumn. It will be remembered that this congregation has been meeting with the Austin Congregational Church for the past year.

The meetings for the last year have been very successful, and unusually well attended. The program for the most part has been furnished by the members of the Association. President Gates and Secretary Shaw have been faithful and tireless in their efforts to make the meetings helpful.

S. E. Inman, Monterey, Mexico, spent two or three days in Chicago last week, on his way to the International Christian Endeavor convention at St. Paul, Minn. Mr. Inman has a clear grasp of the problems involved in his work there and is consistently and persistently developing this important work.

The last meeting of the Chicago ministers before the summer vacation was held at the Grand Pacific Hotel Monday, June 27. Reports from the churches were heard and officers for next year elected as follows: President, A. W. Taylor, pastor Irving Park; vice president, C. C. Morrison, Monroe St.; secretary, Victor Johnson, Maywood.

CHARLES CLAYTON MORRISON AND HERBERT L. WILLETT, EDITORS

Vol. XXVI. CHICAGO, ILL., JULY 8, 1909. No. 27.

The Case of Professor Foster

Religious circles in this city have been more or less stirred by reports of various kinds regarding Professor George B. Foster of the University of Chicago and his recently published book, "The Function of Religion in Man's Struggle for Existence."* Professor Foster was formerly a member of the Divinity Faculty of the University, but about four years ago he was transferred at his own request to the Graduate Faculty where he now holds the chair of the Philosophy of Religion. Professor Foster has long been regarded as one of the most acute and versatile thinkers in the institution. His students have found great value in his instructions, and many of them have come to esteem him most highly and to feel that his classroom instructions have been of great help to them. In personal characteristics Professor Foster is the embodiment of geniality, and his interest in all questions that concern the church and society in our day has made him a valuable counsellor in the classroom, in the pulpit, and in the social circle.

Professor Foster's training and his tastes have led him, however, into lines of investigation and public expression which have seemed to many scarcely compatible with the orthodox and accepted faiths of evangelical Christians in our generation. When he published the first volume of his work on "The Finality of the Christian Religion" four years ago, it was regarded by many as a direct attack upon the fundamental elements of Christianity. The careful reader was not long in discovering that such was not Professor Foster's intent; but the radical character of the critical attitude adopted toward the origins of the Christian faith and the miraculous narratives of the Scriptures made it impossible to adjust this work to the ordinary standards of Christian doctrine. The Christian Century pointed out at the time its specific objections to the book and the impression it was sure to make on the average reader.

More recently Professor Foster was invited to deliver a lecture at the University of California upon "The Function of Religion in Human Life." This lecture was reported stenographically and published in the Philosophical Journal of that university. Later on it was enlarged again and has now been put into the volume which has recently caused so much discussion. Professor Foster in this work insists upon that attitude which has now become familiar through Sabatier's great work, "Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit." He believes that the day of authority of an external kind, resident either in the church or a book, is forever past. He regards religion as one of the most valuable elements of human life, developed in accordance with man's need and learning, and comparable therefore with language, art and the social instincts. The person of Jesus he regards with great reverence, but not as does the evangelical Christian world, for he feels that to ascribe deity to our Lord is impossible. There are passages in the book also which seem to deny personality to God, although upon this point and that of immortality we think Professor Foster too indefinite to be safely quoted. But we believe we do not misinterpret him when we say that his concept of personality is one which will hardly attach to deity as he conceives it, and that to him immortality conforms to a different category from that usually accepted as a satisfying Christian hope.

These and similar teachings have naturally stirred the Baptist churches of the city profoundly. And the air has been full of wars and rumors of wars during the last few weeks. In the Baptist Conference of Chicago, after hot discussion, Professor Foster was dropped from membership; not without most serious protest, however. One or two of the most conservative men in the Conference, while repudiating Professor Foster's views, insisted to the point of resignation that great injustice was being done him and the entire body, and that the procedure was contrary to the principles of the Baptist Church and to the very foundations of Christian liberty. Threats have been made that a campaign was to be organized to compel Professor Foster to leave the Baptist Church and resign his place in the University, and the unhappy spectacle is presented of a house sadly divided against itself.

On all of this matter we have this to say: First—For Professor Foster's scholarship and critical acumen we have the highest regard. His writings have always had most stimulating value for us—a value which they probably could not have had if they had voiced more accurately our own beliefs. For Professor Foster's personal life, moral character, and genial, kindly nature we have genuine appreciation. No man has been a greater intellectual and moral inspiration to those he has known.

Second—Our chief objection to Professor Fosters attitude is that at heart it is profoundly pessimistic. He does not so regard it, we are certain. But he is a new Koheleth, disillusioned by excursions into philosophical and theological regions, which he discovers possess soil too barren to permit the usual Christian fruits of faith to grow thereon. To him the warm enthusiasms of evangelical belief are groundless and unjustified. Its great realities are scarcely more than symbols or figures. We cannot bring against Professor Foster a more damaging accusation than that contained in the closing lines of the preface of his recent book. He feels that things are not as they have been represented by Christian teaching. There is little that may be called reality in the ordinary doctrines of the church. But there is some small element of actual experience at the heart of things, and this he wishes to preserve for himself and his disciples. "And since they, like myself, would rather have a minimum that was sure than a maximum that was not, I have tried to do no more than to cleave to the sunnier side of doubt. And may there be light and warmth enough to keep us from freezing in the darkness." There was probably good reason for the admission of Ecclesiastes to the canon of Old Testament Scripture. It was not a very cheerful book, and it certainly had very little of positive outcome for faith or conduct. But it was an admirable illustration of the pessimist's faith, and it was a fine conception of the canon-makers to put that book in without apologies or explanations by the side of the great trumpet-tongued messages of faith and courage like Isaiah and the Psalms. And they are its answer. We can imagine that there were hot-headed and loud-tongued disputants who stamped noisily out of the Jewish assembly that finally decided to include Koheleth in the canon. Such men are to be found in every community. But the future does not lie with them.

Third—A deeper faith is more kindly and more courageous. We greatly deprecate the noisy efforts that a few would-be denominational leaders have made to arouse turmoil over Professor Foster's book. The history of the former volume should have taught them the wisdom of patience. Professor Foster and his views will owe most of their publicity to the men who have denounced him. Upon his own students and personal friends his influence is constructive and inspiring. It seems an unfortunate thing that his public utterances, both on the platform, in the pulpit, and in his writings, have a distinctly negative tone. But even so, the remedy is not to be found in denunciation nor excommunication. It is too late in the centuries for mediaeval methods of suppression to avail. That is a weak and pathetic type of Christian faith which trembles at every utterance of doubt or denial. The counsel of Gamaliel is still worth remembrance. Time waits as a refiner of metals. The dross is cast away; it is only the pure gold that abides.

But we are certain of one thing, and that seems to be the most pathetic of all: that if the average man of the street, friendly to Christianity but unskilled in dialectic, had to choose between Professor Foster with his quiet, amiable, and earnest Christian life, and the noisy tribe of clerics and paragraphers who have taken upon themselves his denunciation, he would say without hesitation that the former came far nearer than the latter to his conception of the spirit of Jesus. And meantime Christianity suffers at the hands of those who are of its own household.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

WILL THE CARNEGIE FOUNDATION VETO?

It was a matter of rejoicing among many educators that the Carnegie Foundation Trustees would have the power to raise educational standards. This they would do by making certain conditions for the granting of pensions to retired professors. This also meant that the power of the purse was recognized as greater than the power of educational ideals. In other words institutions of learning were accused of being amenable to demands made by the Foundation Trustees and would raise their standards to get their teachers' pensions when they would not raise them for the more idealistic reason that good education demanded it. Unfortunately college competition too often degenerates into a scramble for students rather than rising to a worthy emulation for thoroughgoing courses of instruction.

Recognizing these eminently human facts, the conditions imposed by the Pension Fund were hailed with satisfaction even by the very men who felt the thralldom of the competition for students. They saw the yoke of necessity removed from their shoulders. They welcomed the veto this 'new power of the purse' would exercise. It provides, not for the man most in need—the self-sacrificing teacher in the small college who has spent his life on less than a living salary—nor for the man who has given most necessarily for the cause of education, but for the college which upholds high educational ideals without reference to the worthiness or needs of the individual teacher. It also puts high premium upon non-sectarian education. These two ideals—efficient curriculum and non-sectarian education—are certainly worthy, and the Foundation endeavors to make individual exceptions of the most noteworthy teachers who have given their lives in colleges not measuring up to the standards.

Now the question arises, How far will the trustees go in their exercise of the veto? Georgetown University has been removed from the list. President Needham says they were given no hearing and calls the action "hasty and prejudiced and unjust." He declared the standards have not been in the least lowered and that the assets are greater than they were when they were accepted by the Foundation. President Pritchett, of the Pension Fund, intimated that they no longer qualified on those two propositions and definitely charges that they discharged two professors for reasons which the Pension Fund Trustees could not approve and that the administration of the Political Science department is not satisfactory. These latter two complaints are the ones that arouse suspicion. Will the 'power of the purse' be exercised to scrutinize the engaging and discharging of teachers and thus hold power of veto over college authorities? Will the administration and instruction in political and social departments be subject to the same scrutiny? Here is a tender spot when millionaires provide funds. How far will educators be unconsciously biased by the great need of caring for that most worthy and least paid of all our public servants—the college teacher?

WHEN BUSINESS PROBES BUSINESS

We have had the era of the "Uplifter," and are yet in the heyday of his reforming reign. When he pricked the beast too deeply he was railed at as a common public gossip and termed a "Muckraker." Like many a term of derision it stuck and was justified by the muck upturned and thus revealed. He may have exaggerated somewhat at times but his case called for the evangelistic type of exaggeration. He must make an appeal that would arouse the dormant public conscience.

Now we have an example of what is said when business gets to probing business. The Illinois Manufacturers' Association has been investigating the railroad business and its methods. Here are some of the things said in the final report:

"Modern railroad managers and financiers cannot be trusted to manage their properties for the best interest of the public."

"Reckless and unconscionable financiering has done a hundred times more to injure the country than all the mistakes of legislators."

"The New York financiers must have their interest whether the employees get their wages or not." This after exposing the fact that the Burlington discharged 18,000 men but paid interest on $220,000,000 worth of bonds that had been issued in lieu of $110,000,000 worth of stock "thus paying double interest instead of single dividends."

In speaking of the like but more startling "financiering" operations of the Rock Island it is called the Rock Island "waterway" in honor of the principal element in its so-called capitalization and bonding. They say "the rings that have controlled the Rock Island 'waterway' have added enough bogus bonds and stocks to the capitalization of their various companies to pay the cost of a ship canal that would carry the largest ocean steamer and battle ships from the Gulf to Lake Michigan."

They add that this watered capitalization is just as much a public debt as the $20,000,000 voted to build the ship canal "because shippers and the public will be forever taxed to pay the interest and dividends" and it "creates millionaires by mortgaging the resources of the state and the country."

LLOYD GEORGE'S GENIUS

David Lloyd George is foremost among the new notables that the incoming of the Liberals have created in Britain. Toryism is always strong as a combination because it is the party of special privileges and privilege has one and only one scruple and that is the common one of self advantage. Liberalism is ever the party of conscience and progress and necessarily is of many opinions and plans. It usually governs by a coalition on certain common grounds and is weak on all minor proposals for the differences of theory and plan dominate.

Lloyd George's genius is shown in the adeptness with which he proposed a budget that would keep the various elements together on a great principle and put virility into what threatened to become a weak majority though one great in numbers. He did it all by putting into the budget his famous tax on land values. The Lords would never consent to a valuation of their lands. The only hope for their monopoly was in its being let alone. Lloyd George imposes a small tax, so small that it could not be called burdensome but to lay it must have a valuation of all lands made. The Lords cannot reject one item of the budget; they must accept or reject it as a whole just as it comes from the Commons. If they reject it government is in chaos for lack of appropriations and the reason must appear to the mass with too much evidence, and the agitation to "end or mend the Lords" would menace their very existence. There is a new confidence in the government and a new lease of power for the Liberal party and its "social program." The Lords also veto temperance legislation because of their immense holdings in breweries. It may also meet a Waterloo in some budget proposal.

It is a part of the century-long struggle between class and mass and the people always win in the course of time. England will be ruled by her Commons.

FOR GOOD (SALOON) GOVERNMENT

The United Societies of Chicago exist for the sake of good (?) government. One half of their officers are either saloon keepers or earn their living in direct service of the traffic. The unadulterated Americanism of their leaders is doubtless representative of their constituency, also. Here are representative names: Germack, Pfeiffer, Pettkoske, Cervenka, Henius, Geshkewich, Chudacek, Michaelis, Lackovich, Navigato, Tehlar. Other such as Richter, Huss, and Egger are less terrifying to American lingual attempts but quite as well identified with the simon pure American blood of these "good government" patriots.

FLORIDA ON THE FIRING LINE

Florida will join the white columns that so honor the Southland. She will vote on state-wide prohibition at the next regular election, viz., the autumn of 1910. There are but 330 saloons in the state and out of her 650,000 people more than 525,000 live in "dry" territory. Thus local option leads to state-wide prohibition.

South Carolina has but seventy-five dispensaries left, two-thirds of Virginia is "dry," 77 per cent of Old Kentuck's people dwell apart from their state's ancient anathema, in Texas 200,000 of her 265,780 square miles are "white," Arkansas will be in the all white column before Florida and Louisiana brings up the foot of the procession with but one-half of her people in prohibition territory. The other six southern states are straight out prohibition.

Gov. Stubbs, of Kansas, has ordered that all drinkers be "fired" from state offices and only tetotalers appointed.

RADIUM GETTING CHEAP

Some English savants have paid for a few grains of radium at the rate of $750,000 per ounce. New finds of pitchblends have been made in Portugal. This will spoil the contemplated monopoly of Australia. The above purchase was made for cancer cure experiments. Here is a new hope for Carnegie's desire to die poor.

WASHINGTON STATE CLIPS CUPID'S WINGS

Out in Washington State, Cupid is forlorn. He can no longer lead romance riot. All applicants for marriage licenses will hereafter be compelled to present a certificate of health. One state proposes to help the children choose whom their parents shall be. There will be many Gretna Greens along the borders, no doubt, until Idaho and Oregon go and do likewise. Romantic brides will resent such efforts to interfere with their future "joy" though common sense knows it is for their best welfare.

CIVIC REFORM CALLING ON THE PREACHERS

New York has a Bureau of Municipal Research. It exists to throw the light of fact on all city problems in that metropolis. It gives the common man an intelligent basis for judgment and for his vote. Cincinnati is adopting the plan and has called a man from the New York Bureau to head the work. The New York Bureau has called in the preachers. They can furnish the facts but even facts do not always arouse a conscience and a will to act. The preachers have the vantage point and can always furnish a good public conscience when they agree on a propaganda. New York's next budget calls for $170,000,000. State governments with the same population call for but one-tenth as much. It illustrates the contention that city administration is not government so much as it is social welfare. The preachers are expected to consider the budget as a means of social service and to induce the voters to do likewise. This will be revolutionary doctrine to Tammany. It is hoped it will be a revolution that will put an end to Tammany. All prominent mayoralty candidates admit a waste and steal of at least $15,000,000 annually through political spoils-of-office methods.

SHARP SHOOTING OR KINDNESS IN THE SCHOOLS

It has been advocated by some that the youth of the public schools be organized into rifle corps and taught shooting by competent marksman. Illinois has a new law which requires the public school teachers to "teach honesty, kindness, justice and moral courage" and to give not less than one-half hour per week to such lessons, apart from all other studies. It also forbids the killing of animals for dissection and experiments on living animals and puts instruction in kindness to all animal life in their place. A Christian civilization ought not hesitate long between the two plans if it really believes that the child's life will follow the suggestions planted in the youthful mind.

ANOTHER CHURCH DECREASE

English Wesleyans report a total of 490,744 members, a loss of 1,262 from last year's membership. They have a greater proportion of lay preachers and thus of evangelistic zeal than most church bodies. They are perhaps suffering somewhat from the revival wave's ebbing and mayhap from efforts to enforce their discipline in a time when many men believe their own consciences the best rule for individual conduct. It is said that of the 25,000 Wesleyan sermons preached each Sunday, 20,000 are by the lay preachers. To some the decrease will suggest the inadequacy of lay preaching. But denominations dependent wholly upon an educated ministry have like reports to make. The cause must lie deeper.

Editorial

Mr. John R. Mott has been elected executive secretary of the Federal Council of Churches of Christ in America. He has been for twenty years the inspiring personality in the World's Christian Student Movement. His good sense and enthusiasm are the main factors in the brilliant development of this most significant organization. If he can be persuaded to undertake the leadership of the Federation movement there is no doubt in anybody's mind that the superb program to which thirty denominations were committed in Philadelphia last December will be carried to a brilliant consummation. Probably the modern church does not afford any man a more important opportunity than that involved in this office to which Mr. Mott has been called. A prophet he must be, and a leader of men, with a vision of the King in his beauty and the land stretching far away. No man can be named who better qualifies in endowment, training and experience for this great work than John R. Mott.

Let no reader shy at the article by Professor Sharpe because of its formidable length. Start in at the beginning and read three paragraphs and we will guarantee that you will read it through. His discussion has especial timeliness just now when the air is full of talk about certain heretics—notably Foster of Chicago and Wenley of Michigan. Heretics are not unmixed evils. They at least have this virtue, that they make men think seriously into matters that they have always taken for granted. To think is to doubt, and it is well for us to have so well-balanced a statement on the value of doubt as Mr. Sharpe has given us. We are not numbered among those who regret the discussion of religious topics by the secular press and the lay mind. Some very foolish things will be said by untrained people. Both the orthodox and the new positions will be mis-stated, no doubt, by those who are not acquainted with philosophical method. Possibly some will lose faith for a time. Nevertheless we believe discussion, thinking, conscientious doubting is better than routine religion devoid of consciousness. Such doubt is faith in the making, and when it is finished the world will be richer than ever in its possession of truth.

The Cortland, Ohio, Herald prints the introductory chapter of a forthcoming volume on "Alexander Campbell and Christian Liberty," by Rev. James Egbert, pastor of the church of Disciples at that place. Judging by the statement of the author's purpose and the definition of some of his conceptions exhibited in this introductory chapter we predict a very readable contribution to this timely theme. This paragraph may whet the interest of others as it has our own to read the body of the book:

"A man's theology is a reasoned, systematic, intellectual expression of what he conceives religion to be—what it means to him. His religion is his life in its relations with the Divine Being—it is a communion with God, consisting not only of thoughts, but feelings and deeds often too great to classify and frequently bursting from the soul spontaneously. Hence, it is not in the theology, which was partial and for the times, but in the religion of Alexander Campbell, that we will find the constant truths. They are the truths that surged in his soul, longing for expression, and burst through at rare and favored moments. So he comes to us not more in what he consistently thought out than in what he felt, did and aspired unto."

There are many who bewail the relaxing sense of sin in modern life. It is more difficult than in former times for the evangelist to create a consciousness of sin to which he can offer the orthodox remedy of grace. This lack of vividness in the experience of repentance and conversion must not be taken as an altogether unfavorable sign, however. And the evangelists who best know men and the gospel will not regard the presence of a vivid sense of sin as an indispensable condition of spiritual renewal. On this point Rev. Joseph Dawson, in a little work on the book of Job, has the following suggestive remarks: "What a calamity it would be if the physicians of the body were to take their cue from the physicians of the soul, and endeavor to deepen in their patients the sense of disease! How the public health would be lowered and the death-rate augmented! Fortunately the reverse is their practice, and medical science is realizing more and more that one of the most powerful restoratives is to fix the mind of the invalid, not on the seriousness of his malady, but on the possibility of its cure. What needs to be impressed upon men is the greatness of their nature, the magnificent possibilities, intellectual and spiritual, latent in the depths of their being. This it is which, when wisely achieved, awakens reverence and confidence, and stirs the springs of effort. Man is not a 'worm,' nor 'a guilty condemned malefactor'; he is a son of God, and therefore the child of Hope."

The Carnegie Foundation is furnishing occasion if not the motive for many colleges breaking the formal bonds that hold them in control of religious denominations. Among our own schools Drake University was the first to change its charter so that its faculty members might enjoy the pension provisions of the great Carnegie fund. Other colleges, including Butler and Transylvania, have done likewise and it is now announced that the venerable Charles Louis Loos of the latter institution was recently voted a pension of $860 per annum for the rest of his days. Remembering his distinguished services to the cause of education and missions, the entire brotherhood of Disciples will rejoice that Professor Loos has been thus awarded this merited recognition. Probably the most important school yet to consider expunging from its charter all sectarian tests either as to faculty or trustees is Brown University. A committee for the purpose of canvassing the question made its report commencement week, unanimously recommending the abolishment of the denominational test. This report treats of the principle involved in so doing in the following words which seem to us to effectively answer the criticisms made against the schools that are conforming to the terms on which Mr. Carnegie's benefactions are made available: "If we were as a corporation seeking pensions for ourselves, our motive would indeed be selfish or sordid. We want these pensions for the self-sacrificing men who are toiling, in many cases, on a meager salary, and for their wives and children. If we were parting with any principle, or ignoring any obligation in order to secure such pensions, we should indeed be selling our birthright for a mess of pottage. But in simply asserting our birthright more clearly, and adhering more closely to the purpose and spirit of the founders of the university, we should be sacrificing no principle, and should be gaining much for the men who make the university. We should be merely throwing aside fetters that impede us, avoiding misconstructions that pain us, and making clear to the world the real temper and spirit of the university."

Secretary Orvis F. Jordan, whom the Chicago ministers appointed as Transportation Manager for the special train to Pittsburgh, made a visit to the centennial city last week for the purpose of reserving accommodations for Chicago and headquarters for the Christian Century. The Hotel Henry, one of the finest and most convenient hostelries of the city, was selected. Mr. Jordan will announce next week the rates at this hotel. He reports that accommodations are being rapidly engaged, one hotel announcing that it has not one room left for convention week. The local committee is undertaking to secure thirty thousand rooms in private homes for the accommodation of guests. It is important for those who will join the Chicago party on the Christian Century train to get their names to Mr. Jordan as soon as possible stating what price they wish to pay for rooms. Even at this early date communications have been received from friends in Illinois and in western states who indicate that they intend to join the Chicago party enroute to Pittsburgh. Chicago Disciples are taking keen interest in the convention and it is expected that a large and representative delegation will go from here. Mr. Jordan visited Brush Run, West Middletown and Bethany, taking over one hundred pictures. He will tell the story of his trip in a series of articles on the Chicago page, beginning next week. We can promise our readers some mighty good reading, illustrated with the author's own pictures. These pictures, by the way, have been made into lantern slides. Mr. Jordan told the story of his trip to his Evanston congregation last Sunday night. He is an adept in the use of the stereopticon. The people manifested keen interest in the centennial. We suggest that a "Pittsburgh campaign" be conducted in all our churches in Chicago during September by Mr. Jordan with the aid of his stereopticon. During July and August if pastors anywhere in the central West wish to quicken interest in the coming convention in the hearts of their people we can commend no better method than to invite Mr. Jordan to bring his lantern and tell his story.

Mother

When we turned away from the little plot of ground, "God's acre," where we had laid her body, by the side of others dear to her, I felt less than ever before that it had been a burial of the dead. It was but the reverent, fitting bestowal of the body she had worn. But she was not left in the grave. She is not dead. Indeed she does not seem to me even asleep, but living, conscious, helpful, a kindly, gracious presence, just as she has been to us these many years. And with the close of life's exacting day, and her quiet passing

"To where beyond these voices there is peace," there has come back to us the sense of her strength and beauty that fell into shadow during the wasting days of sickness and suffering.

My earliest memories of my mother are interwoven with her songs. She seems to me to have lived her life in the atmosphere of music. Till age came on she sang often the songs of her girlhood. Some of them were the simple ballads of those years, and some of them were the great hymns of the church, whose music never dies. I can recall every line of them, and even the variations of her voice as she sang them. Such songs as "O Mother, Tell Me of the Star," "I'm a Pilgrim, and I'm a Stranger," "Tell Me, My Savior," "In the Christian's Home in Glory," and "Tarry With Me, O My Savior," were very often upon her lips. She sang them as she rocked her children, as she went about her household work, and as she sat in the twilight. There was one especially which she loved. It was Tennyson's "May Queen," and though it seemed a very long poem to be set to music she loved to sing it. I came to know that poem through all of its stanzes, the joy of the first May Day, and the pathos of the last, as she sang it. My father's favorite hymn was, "My Gracious Redeemer I Love," and how often we have sung that hymn in the prayer-meeting and at the family worship, with others that we loved.

Our home was a church home. Father and mother were both devoted to the group of Disciples. For its sake they had made many sacrifices in the first days of their married life, when to be a Disciple was to be everywhere spoken against. There were no preachers in the family, but father and mother bore their effective testimony in the prayer-meetings, and mother at least had hopes for her sons, and took them daily to God like the morning and evening sacrifice. We were often blessed with visitors, preachers of the gospel, prophets passing our way like Elisha of old. We had our prophet's chamber, and no greater pleasure ever came to us than their tarrying with us by the way. It was always an event when one of them came. It seemed to be understood by us all that if one of "the brethren" came to the town he must abide with us for at least a meal. They generally called at my father's store, and he brought them to the house. There were no telephones in those days, and often the first warning my mother had of the event was father's arrival with the guest at the noon or evening hour. Yet I never saw her disturbed by these happenings. As a very dear and life-long friend said at the services held in the old church, "She received with quiet grace and dignity, whether in calico gown or dress more pretentious, and made no apologies." But hospitality was simpler and less formal with us then than now. We were not ashamed to let the heartiness of the welcome and the joy of Christian fellowship compensate in some manner for the modesty of the entertainment. And what a joy it was to sit in the evening time and talk together, guests and hosts, of the spread of "the cause" as we loved to call it, and the victories of "the reformation." Often, too, it was the Bible that engaged the thought of the little circle. Passages that were not clear to my parents were searched out and explained by the stranger within our gates, and I sat by and listened with wonder, thinking no men could be as learned as the men of God, who tarried with us. At such times I was allowed to "stay up" as a special favor, while my small brothers were put to bed. I never wearied of the talk, but when "the chapter" came, and afterwards we knelt in prayer, I fear I did not always keep awake. I have memories of more than one occasion when my mother gently lifted me up, at the end of the prayer, and I wakened with surprise and chagrin to realize that I had fallen asleep in the midst of the worship.

I was born near the close of the civil war, and its events were very fresh and vivid in the thought and conversation of my parents in my early years. My father and his brothers, together with a brother of my mother, were in the service. My father was unable to qualify in the army, owing to physical disabilities, but was accepted in the hospital service of the Sanitary Commission, and was in charge of one of the hospital boats that went back and forth between Washington and the front. During a portion of the time mother remained in Washington, a young wife, new to city life, and very lonely at times, as her journal shows. Under date of June 16, 1863, she writes, "One year a happy wife. A short year." Some of the entries of those months are very pathetic in their record of lonely watching and waiting, while her husband was away on his

What Will the Disciples Do?

This was the treatment accorded the Campbells when they were cast out of the Presbyterian and finally out of the Baptist fold. They were compelled to build ecclesiastical houses of their own where the free voice of prophecy could be heard unrestrained. What, now, is to be the history of their movement, dedicated to truth and freedom, and to Christ and the lives of men? New generations are fast coming, with their new doubts and fears, their new needs and aspirations to be satisfied, and their new difficulties and problems to be solved. What is to be the response of the Disciples? Will they repeat the weary, painful history of denominationalism in the past? Will they allow their truth and life to harden into an unchangeable system? Will they make the vain attempt to apply old and exhausted remedies to new evils? Will they preach to this generation as they preached to three generations ago?

If they do, the historian at the close of the next hundred years, instead of writing of "The Causes and Conditions of Their Success," will have to write of "The Causes and Conditions of Their Failure." If they fail in the next hundred years it will be because of a want of timeliness in their message, a disjunction with the generations through which they pass.

Disciples Just Missed Failure.

The Disciples just missed failure in the last century. They came dangerously near keeping the path of reactionary literalism, and miring in the swamp of "Anti-ism." They were saved by a wholesome progressiveness on the part of their greatest leader, who changed his attitude toward so-called "innovations," such as missionary societies, just in time to prevent stagnation. What the Disciples might have been at the close of the first century, if Alexander Campbell had been a Jacob Creath, and Issaac Errett a Benjamin Franklin, may be seen at the present time in that group of churches led by the "Firm Foundation," and typically illustrated in the famous "Sand Creek" church. What a spectacle they would have presented before the modern world, celebrating their centennial, chiefly remarkable for opposition to organs, missionary societies, and education, and for their zeal against "the sects," against federation, and against the Disciples with a big D.

To such a forlorn people, sitting by the wayside of Christian progress, clothed in the Pharisaic garments of gospel orthodoxy and baptismal perfection, the great march of Christendom toward the missionary and educational conquest of the world is a march into apostacy. The Christian world can but smile at their religious simplicity as it smiles at the simplicity of the Dunkard in his buttonless coat and unshorn hair, and go on its way to the big things of the Kingdom of God. They are but a striking illustration of the singular misadjustment of many religious bodies with the generations in which they live, with the lesson that should be drawn from it.

Conditions of Future Progress.

The conditions of continuous life for every religious movement are freedom and progressiveness. The moment a religious body surrenders to its reactionaries, and begins to set up the ideas, phrases, and methods of its fathers as ideals for worship, that moment its failure is sealed.

The success of the Disciples in the early nineteenth century lay in their Democracy, their Rationalism, their Evangelism and their Legalism. Their success in the twentieth century will not consist in their steadfast adherence to these elements, necessarily; it may consist in their turning away from them. Some of these elements may be a handicap right now. If these things represent the mind of the next century, then by all means they should be clung to.

But it may be that the next century will call for the abandonment of our Democracy in favor of Socialism; of our Rationalism in favor of Mysticism; of our Evangelism, in favor of domestic and social Nurture; of our Legalism, in favor of Spiritual Growth. If so, then the secret of success in the coming century will consist in the training of a ministry in these ideals, for service in a generation that already holds to them.

Our Readers' Opinions

Restoring Primitive Evangelism

Dear Bro. Morrison: I have been reading with very great interest your papers on Revivalism, and the one in the CHRISTIAN CENTURY of June 10 is especially stimulating, and whets the appetite for more. However, I am assuming that the question for your consideration in the next issue, viz., "whether Christianity can adequately realize itself through the present day evangelistic method" is really somewhat negative in its character, and designed to clear the way for some constructive work in subsequent essays.

And in the hope of furnishing you an incitement, I wish to write a few thoughts on the subject, What sort of evangelism builds up a church which has the point of view or the power of realizing the possibilities of the Christianity of Christ; or through what sort of evangelism may Christianity adequately realize itself in the world today?

1. Standing up in the midst of his disciples one day, Jesus said, "I am going to start a society among the people, to found a fellowship of men, to build a church out of the nations, to set up a kingdom of universal salvation, such as will tear down walls of partition, will make all men brothers, will spiritualize and unite all lives with myself in unbroken union—a kingdom against which no power, including Death, shall prevail. My embassadors and messengers for the establishment of this federation of the nations, you yourselves shall be. For your mission, I myself will equip you through my Spirit which will empower you to begin and consummate my determined work."

2. Inspired in and with and for this commission, the twelve went forth conquering and to conquer, beginning by commandments from Jerusalem, for the fathers' sake, and taking out thence the elect remnant of Israel. And behold! what harmony, as they continued steadfastly in the apostles' teaching and fellowship, in the breaking of bread and the prayers; what splendid socialism, in their parting of goods to all who had need; what joy, as day by day they lived in gladness, worshipping in the temple, and breaking bread at home, praising God, and finding favor with all the people; what beautiful unity in love and labor, as, a "multitude of one heart and soul," they relinquished ownership of property for the sake of their poor, they bulwarked the apostolic witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus. No wonder the Lord added to them day by day those that were saved! And when the Gentiles raged, and the (Jewish) peoples imagined a vain thing, and the rulers gathered together against the Lord and against his Anointed, and against His messengers, and the infant church met the shock of persecution and Stephen died and the followers of the Nazarene were scattered abroad, then each exile became an evangelist, and the church multiplied by its very division. Here is a realization of large "possibilities of Christianity," both "in individual character" and "in social effectiveness."

3. Next the kingdom began to subdue Samaria and Phoenicia and Syria, conquering Saul at Damascus, and thence through Paul as leader, it spread its influence and established its power among the gentiles, starting from Antioch, the new center of world evangelism. The Holy Spirit is the divine Director. Men and women are his agents. The Evangel is his method. And churches of Christ, founded in the centers of influence, "from Jerusalem even unto Illyricum" on the way to Rome, are his work, achieved with marvelous dispatch; and, perhaps within fifteen years from Antioch, two years labors had borne their fruit in Rome.

But more particularly, we see the method in the work of Paul, the divinely appointed human leader. He not only established churches through evangelism, but appointed in them office-bearers for their development and perpetuation. For every Christian community there were two sorts of labor, continually to be done, "the work of ministering" and "the building up of the body of Christ." For the first there was the "evangelist," and for the latter, "pastors and teachers"—both the direct gifts of Him who ascended on high, Eph. 4:8-12. And to be sure that no part of this two-fold work should suffer, Paul associated with him no fewer than twenty-five helpers, sending them to all parts of the evangelized field.

4. We have now perhaps enough data before us from which to draw conclusions that will at least make a beginning toward answering the question given for our study. And, first, what the possibilities of Christianity are may be readily seen from a review of the dream of Jesus outlined in paragraph one above.

Second, the next paragraph will show us how simply and beautifully the dream of Jesus was realized among the Jews especially, the inner life being somewhat more detailed than among the gentiles as Christianity spread to them.

If now, finally, we ask through what sort of evangelism Christianity may now realize itself, believers in the restoration of apostolic Christianity can answer, by the same evangelism as that by which Christianity once quite adequately realized itself, viz., by perpetual evangelism for every community. A careful study of Eph. 4:11-16 will establish this. Of course this assumes, also, perpetual building up of the body of Christ in every community. The two are indissolubly joined together. This means every preacher an evangelist, and every church doing evangelism all the time, and no periodic "revivals" with their corresponding periodic religious spasms.

Revivalism

I greatly hope that the articles in the Christian Century on "Revivalism" may be read and approved by all as they are by myself. The same number of the paper brings word from Dr. Gates that our really peculiar and distinctive characteristic is revivalism and we honestly know it regards all other churches as a field from which to draw. Can any reasoning stop the wild tide of such evangelism as has set in upon us? Reasoning in such moods is weak. Still I bless the effort for it as good. Dissolution is inherent in the very thing that now passes for success.

The Old Clothes Man

Up and down the street he goes,
Bent and whithered, parrot nose;
Foxy eyed, with bulging sack
Resting on his bow-like back;
Be it sunshine, be it snow,
Springtime drizzle, winter's blow—
You can see him passing by—
Ringing doorbells—Hear his cry:

"Clo's! Clo's! Any old clo's!"
Hats that are rusty and shoes with ripped toes;
Coats that are shabby and nearly worn through,
He rubs them and scrubs them until they look look new.

Foxy is the old clothes man,
Bests you every time he can;
Takes a coat that's nearly new,
Slyly runs his fingers through;
"See de moth holes! See de grease!
I'll give you feefty cents apiece."
And you take it with a sigh
Just to start him with his cry.

"Clo's! Clo's! Any old clo's!"
Hats that are rusty and shoes with ripped toes,
Coats that are shabby and nearly worn through,
He rubs them and scrubs them until they look new.

Amy's New Leaf

BY MISS Z. L. DAVIS.

"My birthday," thought Amy, lightly running down stairs that beautiful morning of the "glorious Fourth." "How old and big I am growing," she mused as she went down cellar to see her mother skim milk. Poor Allen would not snap torpedoes with her or set off fire crackers today, for he was sick.

"Amy, come here," called her brother from the couch when she appeared. "I hope you will have a nice time today. You are ten years old, and I'd awfully like to get you a present, sis. But you know mother has to work so hard to support us that I gave my money to the doctor yesterday. But I wish you the best Fourth of your life."

"Allen might have got me a handkerchief," she thought, with a little frown. "Birthdays don't come but once a year." Then she might have said something cross, for she was a selfish little girl, but two tears rolled down the pale, thin cheeks on the couch, and she said nothing.

"Maybe I can get you something on your next birthday," he said, hopefully. "If I only had a pony, I could have a garden and earn so much money that mother would not have to wash any more. Growing serious, he added in a lower tone, "What would we do if mother would get sick and die?"

"Amy," called grandma, "run out and pull some onions for beakfast." That was a task that the little girl never liked. The ground was hard and the onions were deeply rooted in the earth. But she started to the garden without complaining, for she was thinking of Allen's words. "I am going to be a helper," she thought. "It will be lots more fun than just playing."

At the breakfast table that morning when Amy turned over her plate, she found a diary with birthday wishes. If it had not been for what Allen had said to her, she might have cried because there was nothing more. But when she looked at her name gilded on the cover and found a place to write what she did every day in the year, she gave her mother a loving kiss and said, "Thank you, dear mamma. I am going to be your little helper, because God wants me to be."

After breakfast, Amy cleared away the things, washed and wiped the dishes and then neatly reset the table. She prepared the rhubarb for dinner, peeled the potatoes and swept the kitchen.

"What will I do?" smiled mamma, with perspiring face, as she finished the ironing.

"Sure enough," replied silver haired grandma, her face lighting up through Amy's new leaf. "You may take a nap. We can finish dinner, can't we, lassie?"

"I guess I will," replied mamma. "I had to be up with Allen much of the night. The doctor says that nothing but careful nursing will save him from typhoid." How glad Amy was to see her mother soon fall asleep. "God help me to be good," was her whispered prayer.

Just then she looked out and saw some boys about to fire off a string of crackers. Going out, she called the boys and asked them to have their fun elsewhere, telling them why. They promised to go right away. "Thank you," she replied with a quaint courtesy, adding, "if you will be quiet, Allen would like to see you a little while this afternoon."

When Amy went out for a pail of water, she saw a strange cow in their neighbor's garden. "I must tell them," she thought, and very soon the crumpled horned cow was driven back into the pasture. "You were a good child to come and tell me," said the lady, and she gave her a plate of strawberry shortcake.

Just after the heat of the day had passed, Allen's four friends came to "cheer him up," they said. They were all in the same class in the Bible school. One could see they were real Christian soldiers as well as play "Fourth" ones. Every hat was removed as they gathered about the sick one's couch. And they enjoyed a spread of ice cream and strawberries. "This has been a treat, boys," said Allen, as his friends bade him good-bye. "I feel almost well."

It was nearly dusk when Amy was sent for milk. The dairy was nearly a mile away. She would have cried not to go had it not been for her birthday. She was late, having gone for the mail and found the post office closed, because it was a holiday. But the milk must be brought for Allen.

As the little girl hurried along the shady road, she heard a call for help. Being naturally timid, she thought at first she would pretend not to hear. But thinking better of it, she went to see what she could do. A lady was standing in the grove, holding a rearing horse that was hitched to a broken buggy. Telling her that the horse had been frightened by fireworks and had become unmanageable, breaking a wheel, she begged her to hurry to the village and bring her brother, the doctor.

How glad Amy was that she had not gone on when the lady had called her. She was happy to help the doctor's sister, for he had been so kind to her mamma. In a short time Dr. Jones came driving back for his sister, with Amy in the seat beside him. He was so grateful to the little girl that he told her he would not charge any more for doctoring Allen.

His sister took her to the dairy for milk. "How brave you are, little one," she said. "I do not know what I would have done without you. Will you accept a shetland pony if I give it to you?"

"A real pony?" she exclaimed in delight, thinking of her brother. "Yes, and thank you ever so much." Then she added soberly, "But I do not want any pay for the little I did." But the lady was quite decided.

"Allen," cried Amy, coming in just as her mother was beginning to worry about her. "You can have a garden. Hurry and get well. I am to have a pony and you can borrow him. This has been my sweetest birthday," exclaimed the tired but happy child.

"That is because you have been unselfish," said her mother, tucking her into bed with a kiss.

A Living Tragedy

BY HILDA RICHMOND.

"You don't believe in going to see plays on the stage, do you, Mrs. Burke?" inquired Gertrude Fent rather abruptly. She was helping Mrs. Burke get ready for some young people who were to come that evening, and had been telling her about the Literature Class in the high school. "What do you think about it?" asked Mrs. Burke who was a very wise, helpful woman. "Well, I think it's all right to go to certain plays," said Gertrude. "Of course I wouldn't enjoy the cheap, trashy things, but when a really good actor can be seen in one of Shakespeare's tragedies, for example, I think everybody should go. Our teacher says we can get an idea of what tragedy is that way and in no other. She says that young people know nothing of great emotions, and therefore should see good plays to acquire that knowledge. Just now we are studying King Lear, and she is planning a trip to the city for the whole class to see it produced."

"Miss Walton is very young, isn't she?" inquired Mrs. Burke.

"Well, she isn't much older than her pupils, I suppose, but she is a graduate of a first class college. This is her first experience in teaching, but everyone likes her."

"Yes, Isuppose it does educate one to get a glimpse of a great tragedy," said Mrs. Burke thoughtfully, "but there are so many on the great stage of life, that I never have cared to go to see the imitation ones on the stage of the theatre. There goes one of the actors in a tragedy this minute. I have watched the shifting scenes for the past six months, and I don't dare think what the climax will be." She pointed out of the window at a passing girl as she spoke, and Gertrude turned quickly to look.

"Amy Tompkins!" cried Gertrude. "That silly girl! I always feel like shaking her as she goes mincing down the street. If I were picking out characters for a play I should say Amy is fitted for only the lightest, most unimportant part imaginable."

"And yet she is connected with a tragedy and is playing an important part," said Mrs. Burke, sadly. "Six months ago Amy Tompkins came to me to see if she could not get a place to work part of each day, and go to business college. Her mother has washed for people all her life, because Mr. Tompkins was too crippled to earn enough to support the family, and Amy seemed anxious to help. Mr. Tompkins earns a little by being a night watchman at a factory, but there is a large family, and seventeen-year-old Amy thought it best to leave school and earn something to help along. I never shall forget the day she came to me. She was dressed in a blue and white checked gingham, with her hair done simply, and was just a sweet, modest school girl eager for work."

"She is anything but sweet and modest now," said Gertrude as Mrs. Burke paused. "I have seen her walk down street with three different young men this week, and not one of the young men the kind you would expect any girl to be with."

"Don't you see the tragedy then? I met poor Mrs. Tompkins the other day and the look of misery on her face was not assumed. Her heart is wrung by the same feeling King Lear must have experienced, even if she is only a poor, hard working woman who never heard of King Lear. She sees her cherished daughter going along the street with her jacket spread open to show the thin, unseasonable shirt waist and the cheap jewelry, no rubbers over her thin shoes, a hat that attracts attention from everyone and manners that reflect little credit upon the parents. I have heard Mrs. Tompkins condemned by people who know nothing about the case, but it is not her fault. When I told Amy to apply for the place at the telephone office I never dreamed that she would turn out this way. I could not take her, and the telephone people paid more than I could have, anyway, so I thought I was doing her a kindness by recommending her. She uses up every penny of her earnings on herself, and is so cross and disagreeable at home that no one can please her. She spells her name E-i-g-h-m-e now, and is just as affected in her manner of speaking as she is in her dress. Her friends have talked kindly to her and have tried to warn her, but she seems bent on breaking her parents' hearts. As you say, she has young men who are mere street loafers for her companions, and all these things come to the ears of her father and mother."

Mrs. Burke wiped away a few tears, for just then Mrs. Tompkins came down the street taking a basket of freshly ironed clothes to one of her patrons on a little wagon. Her clothes were shabby and her shoes were worn, but more pathetic than anything else was the look on her worn face. For the first time in her sheltered, care free life Gertrude caught a glimpse of real tragedy, and she wept with Mrs. Burke.

"You see, Gertrude, that I have no need to see imitation tragedies. There are so many real ones all about me, that I have no desire to see the most perfect representation of the great sorrows of life. I would much rather turn to the brighter pictures of old and young working to make the world better, and to bring peace and happiness and joy to those about them. And the best of all is, that the tragedies do not predominate. Never forget that."

Courage! Lad

So you didn't quit make it this time, Laddie,
And you've missed it before, you say;
Well, this is the time, then, to brace up
And go at it in some better way.
You will learn not to mind the failures—
Learn to use them for steps as you climb;
You've gained new ideas in trying
That may help a whole lot the next time.

And suppose that next time and the next, Laddie,
Still fail to bring longed-for success;
Just shut your lips tight and keep at it;
It's the only sure way to progress.
Remember, but one in a thousand
Holds out till the goal is won.
Success to you, Laddie! Here's hoping
You'll lead when the race is done.

Being Generous

It's very hard to be generous,
No matter what people say;
For father is off on business,
And sister has gone to play.
Brother is riding his bicycle,
And mother is making a call;
Baby's too little for peppermint stick,
And nurse eats no candy at all.
Grandma and Bridget are putting away
Some jam on the top pantry shelf;
As there's no one here to share this with,
I'll have to eat it myself!

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XXIII.

The others turned towards the door, but as they passed Winston, Miss Barrington turned and touched his shoulder. The man, looking up suddenly, saw her and her niece standing close beside her.

"Madam," he said hoarsely, though it was Maud Barrington he glanced at, "the comedy is over. Well, I promised you an explanation, and now you have it you will try not to think too bitterly of me. I cannot ask you to forgive me."

The little white-haired lady pointed to the ears of wheat which stood gleaming ruddy bronze in front of him.

"That," she said, very quietly, "will make it easier."

Maud Barrington said nothing, but every one in the room saw her standing a moment beside the man, with a little flush on her face and no blame in her eyes. Then she passed on, but short as it was the pause had been very significant, for it seemed that whatever the elders of the community might decide, the two women, whose influence was supreme at Silverdale, had given the impostor absolution.

The girl could not analyze her feelings, but through them all a vague relief was uppermost, for whatever he had been it was evident the man had done one wrong only, and daringly, and that was a good deal easier to forgive than several incidents in Courthorne's past would have been. Then she was conscious that Miss Barrington's eyes were upon her.

"Aunt," she said, with a little tremor in her voice, "it is almost bewildering. Still, one seemed to feel that what that man has done could never have been the work of Lance Courthorne."

Miss Barrington made no answer, but her face was very grave, and just then those nearest it drew back a little from the door. A trooper stood outside it, his carbine glinting in the light, and another was silhouetted against the sky, sitting motionless in his saddle further back on the prairie.

"The police are still here," said somebody.

One by one they passed out under the trooper's gaze, but there was the usual delay in harnessing and saddling, and the first vehicle had scarcely rolled away, when again the beat of hoofs and thin jangle of steel came portentously out of the silence. Maud Barrington shivered a little as she heard it.

In the meanwhile, the few who remained had seated themselves about Colonel Barrington. When there was quietness again, he glanced at Winston, who still sat at the foot of the table.

"Have you anything more to tell us?" he asked. "These gentlemen are here to advise me if necessary."

"Yes," said Winston quietly. "I shall probably leave Silverdale before morning, and have now to hand you a statement of my agreement with Courthorne and the result of my farming here, drawn up by a Winnipeg accountant. Here is also a document in which I have taken the liberty of making you and Dane my assigns. You will, as authorized by it, pay to Courthorne the sum due to him, and with your consent, which you have power to withhold, I purpose taking one thousand dollars only of the balance that remains to me. I have it here now, and in the meanwhile surrender it to you. Of the rest, you will make whatever use that appears desirable for the general benefit of Silverdale. Courthorne has absolutely no claim upon it."

He laid a wallet on the table, and Dane glanced at Colonel Barrington, who nodded when he returned it unopened.

"We will pass it without counting. You accept the charge, sir?" he said.

"Yes," said Barrington gravely. "It seems it is forced on me. Well, we will glance through the statement."

For at least ten minutes nobody spoke, and then Dane said: "There are prairie farmers who would consider what he is leaving behind him a competence."

"If this agreement, which was apparently verbal, is confirmed by Courthorne, the entire sum rightfully belongs to the man he made his tenant," said Barrington, and Macdonald smiled gravely as he glanced at Winston.

"I think we can accept the statement that it was made without question, sir," he said.

Winston shook his head. "I claim one thousand dollars as the fee of my services, and they should be worth that much, but I will take no more."

"Are we not progressing a little too rapidly, sir?" said Dane. "It seems to me we have yet to decide whether it is necessary that the man who has done so much for us should leave Silverdale."

Winston smiled a trifle grimly. "I think," he said, "that question will very shortly be answered for you."

Macdonald held his hand up, and a rapid thud of hoofs came faintly through the silence.

"Troopers! They are coming here," he said.

"Yes," said Winston. "I fancy they will relieve you from any further difficulty."

Dane strode to one of the windows, and glanced at Colonel Barrington as he pulled back the catch. Winston, however, shook his head, and a little flush crept into Dane's bronzed face.

"Sorry. Of course you are right," he said. "It will be better that they should acquit you."

No one moved for a few more minutes, and then with a trooper behind him Sergeant Stimson came in, and laid his hand on Winston's shoulder.

"I have a warant for your apprehension, farmer Winston," he said. "You probably know the charge against you.

"Yes," said Winston simply. "I hope to refute it. I will come with you."

He went out, and Barrington stared at the men about him. "I did not catch the name before. That was the man who shot the police trooper in Alberta?"

"No, sir," said Dane, very quietly. "Nothing would induce me to believe it of him!"

Barrington looked at him in bewilderment. "But he must have done—unless," he said, and ended with a little gasp. "Good Lord! There was the faint resemblance, and they changed horses—it is horrible."

Dane's eyes were very compassionate as he laid his hand gently on his leader's shoulder.

"Sir," he said, "you have our sympathy, and I am sorry that to offer it is all we can do. Now, I think we have stayed too long already."

They went out, and left Colonel Barrington sitting alone with a gray face at the head of the table.

It was a minute or two later when Winston swung himself into the saddle at the door of the Grange. All the vehicles had not left as yet, and there was a little murmur of sympathy when the troopers closed in about him. Still, before they rode away one of the men wheeled his horse aside, and Winston saw Maud Barrington standing bareheaded by his stirrup. The moonlight showed that her face was impassive but curiously pale.

"We could not let you go without a word, and you will come back to us with your innocence made clear," she said.

Her voice had a little ring in it that carried far, and her companions heard her. What Winston said they could not hear, and he did not remember it, but he swung his hat off, and those who saw the girl at his stirrup recognized with confusion that she alone had proclaimed her faith, while they had stood aside from him. Then the Sergeant raised his hand and the troopers rode forward with their prisoner.

In the meanwhile, Courthorne was pressing south for the American frontier, and daylight was just creeping across the prairie when the pursuers, who had found his trail and the ranch he obtained a fresh horse at, had sight of him. There were three of them, riding wearily, grimed with dust, when a lonely mounted figure showed for a moment on the crest of a rise. In another minute it dipped into a hollow, and Corporal Payne smiled grimly.

"I think we have him now. The creek can't be far away, and he's west of the bridge," he said. "While we try to head him off you'll follow behind him, Hilton."

One trooper sent the spurs in, and, while the others swung off, rode straight on. Courthorne was at least a mile from them, but they were nearer the bridge, and Payne surmised that his jaded horse would fail him if he essayed to ford the creek and climb the farther side of the deep ravine it flowed through. They saw nothing of him when they swept across the rise, for here and there a grove of willows stretched out across the prairie from the sinuous band of trees in front of them. These marked the river hollow, and Payne, knowing that the chase might be ended in a few more minutes, did not spare the spur. He also remembered, as he tightened his grip on the bridle, the white face of Trooper Shannon flecked with the drifting snow.

The bluff that rose steadily higher came back to them, willow and straggling birch flashed by, and at last Payne drew bridle where a rutted trail wound down between the trees to the bridge in the hollow. A swift glance showed him that a mounted man could scarcely make his way between them, and he smiled dryly as he signed to his companion.

"Back your horse clear of the trail," he said, and there was a rattle as he flung his carbine across the saddle. "With Hilton behind him, he'll ride straight into our hands."

He wheeled his horse in among the birches, and then sat still, with fingers that quivered a little on the carbine-stock, until a faint drumming rose from the prairie.

"He's coming!" said the trooper. "Hilton's hanging on to him."

Payne made no answer, and the sound that rang more loudly every moment through the grayness of the early daylight was not pleasant to hear. Man's vitality is near its lowest about that hour, and the troopers had ridden furiously the long night through, while one of them, who knew Lance Courthorne, surmised that there was grim work before him. Still, though he shivered as a little chilly wind shook the birch twigs, he set his lips, and once more remembered the comrade who had ridden far and kept many a lonely vigil with him.

Then a mounted man appeared in the space between the trees. His horse was jaded, and he rode loosely, swaying once or twice in his saddle, but he came straight on, and there was a jingle and rattle as the troopers swung out into the trail. The man saw them, for he glanced over his shoulder, as if at the rider who appeared behind, and then sent the spurs in again.

"Pull him up," cried Corporal Payne, and his voice was a little strained. "Stop right where you are before we fire on you!"

The man must have seen the carbines, for he raised himself a trifle, and Payne saw his face under the flapping hat. It was drawn and gray, but there was no sign of yielding or consternation in the half-closed eyes. Then he lurched in his saddle as from exhaustion or weariness, and straightened himself again with both hands on the bridle. Payne saw his heels move and the spurs drip red, and slide his left hand further along the carbine stock. The trail was steep and narrow. A horseman could scarcely turn in it, and the stranger was coming on at a gallop.

"He will have it," said the trooper hoarsely. "If he rides one of us down he may get away."

"We have got to stop him," said Corporal Payne.

Once more the swaying man straightened himself, flung his head back, and with a little breathless laugh drove his horse furiously at Payne. He was very close now, and his face showed livid under the smearing dust, but his lips were drawn up in a little bitter smile as he rode straight upon the leveled carbines. Payne, at least, understood it, and the absence of flung-up hand or cry. Courthorne's inborn instincts were strong to the end.

There was a hoarse shout from the trooper, and no answer, and a carbine flashed. Then Courthorne loosed the bridle, reeled sideways from the saddle, rolled half round with one foot in the stirrup and his head upon the ground, and was left behind, while riderless horse and pursuer swept past the two men, who, avoiding them by a hairsbreadth, sat motionless a moment in the thin drifting smoke.

Then Corporal Payne swung himself down, and, while the trooper followed, stooped over the man who lay, a limp huddled object, in the trail. He blinked up at them out of eyes that were almost closed.

"I think you have done for me," he said.

Payne glanced at his comrade. "Push on to the settlement," he said. "They've a doctor there. Bring him and Harland the magistrate out."

The trooper seemed glad to mount and ride away, and Payne once more bent over the wounded man.

"Very sorry," he said. "Still, you see, you left me no other means of stopping you. Now, is there anything I can do for you?"

"Don't worry," Courthorne replied. "I had no wish to wait for the jury, and you can't get at an injury that's inside me."

He said nothing more, and it seemed a very long while to Corporal Payne, and Trooper Hilton, who rejoined him, before a wagon with two men in it beside the trooper came jolting up the trail. They got out, and one of them who was busy with Courthorne for some minutes nodded to Payne.

"Any time in the next twelve hours. He may last that long," he said. "Nobody's going to worry him now, but I'll see if I can revive him a little when we get him to Adamson's. It can't be more than a league away."

They lifted Courthorne, who appeared insensible, into the wagon, and Payne signed to Trooper Hilton. "Take my horse, and tell Colonel Barrington. Let him understand there's no time to lose. Then you can bring Stimson."

The tired lad hoisted himself into his saddle, and groaned a little as he rode away, but he did his errand, and late that night Barrington and Dane drove up to a lonely homestead. A man led them into a room where a limp figure was lying on a bed.

"Been kind of sleeping most of the day, but the doctor has given him something that has wakened him," he said.

Barrington returned Payne's greeting, and sat down with Dane close beside him, while, when the wounded man raised his head, the doctor spoke softly to the magistrate from the settlement a league or two away.

"I fancy he can talk to you, but you had better be quick if you wish to ask him anything," he said.

Courthorne seemed to have heard him, for he smiled a little as he glanced at Barrington. "I'm afraid it will hurt you to hear what I have to tell this gentleman," he said. "Now, I want you to listen carefully, and every word put down. Doctor, a little more brandy."

Barrington apparently would have spoken, but, while the doctor held a glass to the bloodless lips, the magistrate, who took up a strip of paper, signed to him.

"We'll have it in due form. Give him that book, doctor," he said. "Now repeat after me, and then we'll take your testimony."

It was done, and a flicker of irony showed in Courthorne's half-closed eyes.

"You feel more sure of me after that?" he said, in a voice that was very faint and strained. "Still, you see, I could gain nothing by deviating from the truth now. Well, I shot Trooper Shannon. You'll have the date in the warrant. Don't know if it will seem strange to you, but I forget it. I borrowed farmer Winston's horse and rifle without his knowledge, though I had paid him a trifle to personate me and draw the troopers off the whisky-runners. That was Winston's only complicity. The troopers, who fancied they were chasing him, followed me until his horse which I was riding went through the ice, but Winston was in Montana at the time, and did not know I was alive until a very little while ago. Now, you can straighten that up and read it out to me."

The magistrate's pen scratched noisily in the stillness of the room, but, before he had finished, Sergeant Stimson, hot and dusty, came in. Then he raised his hand, and for a while his voice rose and fell monotonously, until Courthorne nodded.

"That's all right," he said. "I'll sign."

The doctor raised him a trifle, and moistened his lips with brandy as he gave him the pen. It scratched for a moment or two, and then fell from his relaxing fingers, while the man who took the paper wrote across the foot of it, and then would have handed it to Colonel Barrington, but that Dane quietly laid his hand upon it.

"No," he said. "If you want another witness take me."

Barrington thanked him with a gesture, and Courthorne, looking round, saw Stimson.

"You have been very patient, Sergeant, and it's rough on you that the one man you can lay your hands upon is slipping away from you," he said. "You'll see by my deposition that Winston thought me as dead as the rest of you did."

Stimson nodded to the magistrate. "I heard what was read, and it is confirmed by the facts I have picked up," he said.

Then Courthorne turned to Barrington. "I sympathize with you, sir," he said. This must be horribly mortifying, but, you see, Winston once stopped my horse backing over a bridge into a gully when just to hold his hand would have rid him of me. You will not grudge me the one good turn I have probably done any man, when I shall assuredly not have the chance of doing another."

Barrington winced a little, for he recognized the irony in the failing voice, but he rose and moved towards the bed.

"Lance," he said, a trifle hoarsely, "it is not that which makes what has happened horrible to me, and I am only glad that you have righted this man. Your father had many claims on me, and things might have gone differently if, when you came out to Canada, I had done my duty by his son."

Courthorne smiled a little, but without bitterness. "It would have made no difference, sir, and, after all, I led the life that suited me. By and by you will be grateful to me. I sent you a man who will bring prosperity to Silverdale."

Then he turned to Stimson, and his voice sank almost beyond hearing as he said, "Sergeant, remember, Winston fancied I was dead."

He moved his head a trifle, and the doctor stooping over him signed to the rest, who went out except Barrington.

It was some hours later, and very cold, when Barrington came softly into the room where Dane lay half-asleep in a big chair. The latter glanced at him with a question in his eyes, and the Colonel nodded very gravely.

"Yes," he said. "He has slipped out of the troopers' hands and beyond our reproaches—but I think the last thing he did will count for a little."

AT THE CHURCH

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

Philippi and Beyond*

The arrival of Paul at Philippi, attended by his young friends, Silas, Timothy and Luke, was an event of unusual importance in the spread of the gospel. It was the first work undertaken upon European soil, and while the distinction between Asia and Europe was by no means as formal and significant in that age as now, still it denoted the transfer of activity from a field largely Semitic to one of western and Roman character.

Lydia and the Insane Girl.

The stay in Philippi was marked by three events of moment. The first was the conversion of Lydia, a woman of foreign race residing in Philippi for purposes of trade. She was a Jewess and was discovered by Paul at the little gathering of Jews held by the river side in lieu of a synagogue. The second was the cure of the demented girl who had been used by her owners to practice upon the credulity of the people, who imagined that the insane could reveal hidden secrets and foretell the future. This girl was cured by the apostle and, therefore, ceased to be the means of profit to her masters. These men stirred up the populace to demand the arrest and punishment of the strangers. Paul and Silas were beaten and thrown into prison. Luke and Timothy seem to have escaped.

The Jailer's Faith.

The third episode in connection with Paul's visit was the conversion of the jailer. This was hastened by the earthquake which shattered the walls of the prison in which the apostles were confined and made liable the escape of all the prisoners. The jailer, trembling for his life if his charges should escape, was calmed by the apostles, and later on professed his faith in Jesus and was baptized. On the following morning Paul, offered freedom by the public officials on condition that he should leave the city at once, refused to do so, affirming that they had no right to treat a Roman citizen uncondemned as they had treated him. Anxious lest their conduct should be inquired into, the officials changed their attitude toward the apostle and escorted him from the prison as an honored guest.

Departure from Philippi.

These events were the substance of the last study. Soon after, when they had met the little community of believers, that group of which Paul came to think more than of any other of his spiritual children, the evangelists departed. They took their way through Amphipolis and Apollonia, the former southwest from Philippi on the Strymon river about thirty-three miles and a capital of its district, the latter about half way between Amphipolis and Thessalonica. They did not stop in either of these places, as it appears from the text, but hastened on to Thessalonica, the important city of the district.

This place has become rather famous in connection with recent political events in the Turkish empire. It is the modern Saloniki, lying on the northeast side of the Thermaic Gulf. It has been, in recent years, the scene of a number of disturbances between Macedonians and Turks. It is at the present time the residence of the deposed sultan, who is a political exile. At the time the apostle visited it, it had been the seat of government for the province of Macedonia for several years. In this town there was a synagogue of the Jews. In this regard it differed from Philippi and also probably from Amphipolis and Apollonia. Perhaps this was the reason why Paul had not stopped in the latter places.

Paul in Thessalonica.

Into this synagogue as the natural place of meeting of the Jewish community, Paul went on three successive Sabbaths. He always made it his custom to go to his own people first. Although he was an apostle to the Gentiles and magnified that office, he was anxious everywhere to bring his message "to the Jews first." We do not know how long Paul remained in this city. It is not necessary to suppose that his stay was limited to the three Sabbaths on which he was present in the synagogue. The references to his relations with the Thessalonian disciples in the epistles he wrote to them shortly after show that he must have been there for some time. In these synagogue visits the apostle probably accepted all opportunities for public speaking such as might well be accorded to a Jew who had been in Jerusalem. But his work was not limited to preaching. It probably had also the character of teaching, conversation and argument. Its purpose was to show that however uncongenial to Jewish minds was the thought of a crucified Messiah, this was nevertheless the way in which God had fulfilled his promises made to their fathers. Jesus of Nazareth was the Messiah for whom they were looking.

Violence of the Mob.

The effect of this work in Thessalonica was to gather a company of Christian believers. This company consisted of Jews and proselytes, both men and women. The influence of women in the Greek cities made it worth while to specify that several of the leading women of the place accepted the Christian faith. This probably indicates that the more influential portion of the church in Thessalonica was Gentile rather than Jewish.

As on the first missionary journey, Paul found that any overture to the Gentiles were sure to arouse the Jewish people to hostility and bitterness. Their prejudice was too strong against the non-Jews to permit them to share any of their convictions with men not of their race. Even the Jewish Christians were probably reluctant to unite with the Gentiles in the new faith, while the unconverted Jews were especially angry that one of their own race was active in this process of leveling the distinction between themselves and the world.

Jason's Arrest.

At this time Paul was stopping at the house of a man named Jason. This is the Greek form of the word Joshua or Jesus. In their violent attack upon the place they hoped of course to secure Paul and put him to death. But they were unsuccessful in finding him or his companions, and took Jason before the public authorities and charged him with being a friend and patron of a man who subverted their customs and introduced seditious ideas into the public mind. They would naturally put the most sinister interpretation upon the Christian preaching of Paul, intimating that it was political in character and revolutionary in intent. They were unable, however, to secure action beyond the placing of Jason and his neighbors under bond to keep the peace.

The Gospel in Berea.

But it was unwise for Paul and Silas to remain longer in a city so stirred with suspicion and hostility. They were sent away, therefore, under cover of night to Berea, a Macedonian city about forty-seven miles southeast of Thessalonica, where Paul and Silas repeated their procedure in the former places. But they found some at least who were of nobler nature than the men of Thessalonica, because they would not judge of the words of Paul with prejudice, but eagerly searched the Old Testament scriptures, to which he was constantly appealing, and thus sought to determine for themselves whether his arguments were sound. The result was that many of them, both men and women, Jew and proselyte, were added to the Christian society. From this fact the word "Berean" has come to mean a careful and unprejudiced Bible student.

Paul's Departure for Athens.

But they were not left undisturbed in their peaceful proclamation of the gospel. The Jews of Thessalonica pursued them to their new field and aroused against them mob violence again. It was apparent that no further work could be done in this district. The apostle and his friends must pass beyond the limits of local prejudice and hostility. Paul went first and alone by sea to Athens, leaving Silas and Timothy with the two churches which had been established. Of Luke we are not told further. Perhaps he had remained in or had returned to Philippi. It would not do to jeopardize the new Christian communities by leaving them without guidance. So Paul suffered himself to be sent on alone, probably much against his wish. Was it because his infirmity of the flesh made him dependent upon some kindly help, such as his companions could give him? Was he subject to such periods of illness or depression as made their company particularly necessary to him? At all events he faced the hardships of a solitary journey and entrance into the great capital of Greece, the center of arts, culture and heathenism. But he had left his two companions with the earnest entreaty that they would join him as soon as possible. And in the meantime he would see the kind of place Athens was and decide how to approach the citadel of the Greek faith.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

"THAT THEY ALL MAY BE ONE."

Topic, July 14. John 17.

Of how much value is our talk about the evils of a divided church and the desirability of Christian unity? We may doubt the usefulness and permanence of feelings that are based on elaborate discussions. The doers of work who find obstacles in their way have the right attitude toward those obstacles. The divisions among the followers of Christ seriously interfere with the proper work of the church. The men and the women who are trying to evangelize the world and to teach individual and social morality may consistently pray for the removal of barriers set by sectarianism. They have a right to study the situation and propose solutions of the problem.

Enforced Uniformity.

Many men still doubt the wisdom of seeking to unite Christian people. A reason for this doubt is the feeling that a united church would not give to the individual his rights. The church has demanded that men turn their consciences over to it and quiet any misgivings as to its requirements by the doctrine of infallibility. More and more the individual is asserting his right to understand the will of God for himself. He is becoming less and less disposed to commit his thinking to an authoritative body. Even the most radical of Protestant churches have hardly realized the meaning of this independence. Individualism that is lawless cannot be used in the building of the church of God but what is to be done with genuinely religious people, devout believers in Christ, who cannot conform to some of the requirements of the majority? To ask this question is face the fact that the end of divisions among Christian people is not at hand. We may know just what are the requirements of the Lord, but we cannot have union unless others see the fundamentals of religion as we do. At the present it would be impossible for a majority of Christians to agree as to the essential doctrines and organization of the united church. And until they do come to some sort of agreement in these matters efforts at union will be seen as the attempts of certain men to force their opinions upon others. There must be a preparation for union which cannot be made by direct discussion of the question.

Sanctified by Truth.

The advocate of Christian union must embody in himself the truth of the gospel. To preach union in a contentious spirit is one way not to get it. A little man talking about a great subject creates the impression that the subject is insignificant. A people busy with the small duties of religion and ignorant of the weightier matters of faith and righteousness cannot by preaching destroy the divisions of the church. Their theory may be correct but they have not the motives that will appeal to others. The first duty, therefore, of those who would help to fulfill the prayer of the Lord is to see that they are neglecting no obligation of the gospel. The Lord prayed that his disciples might be sanctified, that is, made fit for service. The man who preaches that all Christians should be one and yet has no interest in missions is ridiculous in the eyes of sane people. He cannot say that he is a specialist on the union question, for a prerequisite to specialization on this question is devotion to every interest of the kingdom. He might as well try to specialize on mathematical astronomy before he has learned the multiplication table. The way to union is being led by men who know what constitutes Christianity and who are profoundly concerned for the salvation of the world. They are at work. They sacrifice. They think. Their prayers relate to the specific things they are attempting to do. Humility is shown by their words and demeanor. They are aware that the church of God is a greater institution than they can conceive. But they are fully assured that lives enriched by faith in Christ are needed by the church as it now is and will be needed in the united church which they believe will appear on earth to accomplish the will of God. Quarrels and distrust, they believe, belong to the valley below. On the heights of faith and love there is co-operation. They give themselves to the task of educating the church to know Christ and of training it in ways of usefulness, leaving the adjustment of differences to a generation that looks to Christ instead of left over theological formulas for guidance in the religious life.

PILGRIM'S PROGRESS SERIES. III. THE PALACE BEAUTIFUL.

Topic July 18. Eph. 4:7-16; 6:10-17.

The Valiant Man.

The story of the Palace beautiful is a simple little story of the "valiant man." Taken literally, it is very materialistic in its character. It exalts the sword which Peter had to sheath. It might be used to glorify the man who wears a chip on his shoulder.

In fact, we think this story of Bunyan's limps without the Bible. The shell is harder to crack. It lags far behind the beautiful and powerful symbolism of St. Paul. Listen: —"withal taking up the shield of faith wherewith ye shall be able to quench all the fiery darts of the evil one. And take the helmet of salvation and the sword of the spirit, which is the word of God."

It is by the power of the spirit then that Christians are to fight. The Anabaptists of Reformation times were nearer to Jesus Christ than any of the sects of their century. It is significant that the truest of them refused to wage material warfare, or to set up kingdoms of this world. Says an authority on history, "It is doubtful if the 16th Century Protestants gained anything by going to arms."

The Strength of God.

Jesus said, "Thinkest thou that I cannot now pray to my Father, and he shall presently give me more than twelve legions of angels?" But he didn't so pray. The strength of God which man receives moves along different lines. Jesus displays it when he conquers in the temptation. Servetus displayed it when, ready to be tied to the stake, he refused to recant. Lincoln displays it in "The Clansman" when he says to the great politician, "I have higher help than man's."

This is the kind of strength that Paul means to portray when he says, "Finally, be strong in the Lord and in the strength of his might." It must be the kind of strength that Bunyan, with his spiritual temperature, meant to imply. The boldness on the face of the "valiant man" is a boldness that comes from great strength of spirit. It was the boldness that David had when he faced the giant. Read again the story of David and Goliath. David felt the power of Jehovah in him. "You come to me with a sword and a spear and a javelin, but I come to you in the name of Jehovah of Hosts. . . . Today Jehovah will deliver you into my hands."

The Enemy to be Fought.

The men who stood at the passage way and fought the valiant one are also, as Paul says, more than "flesh and blood." Paul calls them "the spiritual hosts of wickedness." It is much easier to fight as the knight fought than it is to fight as Luther fought. To fight for righteousness means to fight a double fight, the man without and the man within. Says Paul in his famous seventh chapter of Romans, "But if what I would not, that I do, it is no more I that do it, but sin which dwelleth in me." Luther in his desperate struggle to conquer the worser inner man, tried to externalize him that the struggle might be easier. The later reward of the valiant man implies that Bunyan had in mind this double struggle. The victory requires a strong soul as well as a strong arm. The breast plate of righteousness, the shield of faith, the sword of the spirit, with what power does Paul picture these weapons of the soul!

The Reward.

"I have fought a good fight," says Paul. "I have finished my course, I have kept the faith. Henceforth there is laid up for me a crown of righteousness." The reward Paul was expecting was a quality of life. He was seeking in the realm of personality what is known as "pure gold." Such was the reward the valiant man seemed to receive. It is true that within were "certain persons walking, who were clothed all in gold," and that "—he went in and was clothed with such garments as they." But the closing words imply that these are symbolic of spiritual qualities. "—there was a pleasant voice heard from those that were within . . . saying:

"Come in, come in,
Eternal glory thou shalt win."

Teacher Training Course

By H. D. C. Maclachlan

LESSON XX. THE JUNIOR AGE—9 TO 12.

I. IMPORTANCE. This period is very strategic on account of its opportunities. During these years a taste or distaste for religious instruction and habits, which may last through life, is frequently acquired. The days of childhood are swiftly passing, those of youth with its tremendous possibilities are dawning; and the opportunity is golden for the laying in of such intellectual and spiritual stores as shall be ballast to the ship during the stormy period that is to follow.

II. DEVELOPING INTERESTS AND ACTIVITIES. Certain new interests and activities are characteristic of the Junior period.

(1) MOTOR ACTIVITY. A marked feature is great muscular and nervous activity, which, however, being directed to the specific ends, is to be distinguished from the mere restlessness of the primary period. The normal boy of nine to twelve is never still. If he is already of the "motor type," he becomes a very whirlwind now, and puts the nerves even of the most patient teacher to the test. A whole class of such boys can soon turn the study hour into pandemonium and defeat all efforts at teaching. This excess of activity is, however, perfectly natural. Being nature's way of letting off surplus steam, it is not to be repressed but directed into right channels. Any attempt to make a Junior class sit with folded hands and listen to "primary" stories will defeat the ends both of order and instruction.

(2) HERO WORSHIP. The boy of this age is a hero-worshipper. His ideals are incarnated in some person whom he knows or has read about. They are less concrete than those of the primary period and less abstract than those of later years. Instead of being taken from the family and social circle as hitherto, they are drawn for the most part from fiction and history, and have to be clothed in its flesh and blood through the imagination and dramatic play. Out of 2,500 boys and girls "who were asked to name the person whom they wished to be like . . . at the age of six, 80 per cent selected some character from the circle of the home or intimate friends, and 10 per cent an historical character; at the age of eleven 63 per cent selected an historical character, and only 12 per cent an intimate acquaintance." Physical strength and daring is what appeals most strongly to boys, and this can be made a key to moral distinctions by pointing out how the strong men of the Bible and of history have been good men also.

(3) INTEREST AND ATTENTION. The interests of this period are more acquired than instinctive, and more in persons than in things. Attention becomes more and more voluntary, and the wise teacher will take advantage of this by demanding increasing effort on the part of the scholars in home study and recitation.

(4) MEMORY. The verbal memory is at its height during the latter years of the Junior period. Children of this age have little difficulty in learning long lists of names and dates, even if their meaning be not very clear to them. This is the age, therefore, for fixing in memory as much of the letter of scripture as possible, together with such matters as the books of the Bible, the kings of Israel and Judah, the names of the Twelve Apostles, etc., which can never be learned so thoroughly again.

(5) IMAGINATION. This has now become constructive. The boy delights "to make things" such as bow and arrows, kites, traps, etc. His games begin to be games of skill, speed and rivalry. He learns the use of tools. Thus he masters the new situations of his rapidly broadening environment.

(6) SOCIAL INSTINCTS. This period shows a rapidly expanding social life. Its games are "group" games, though the element of rivalry is strongly marked, giving rise not infrequently to boastfulness. The boy is apt to become a member of a "gang"—later on it will be a "set"—and through this primitive pooling of interests begins to learn the meaning of group-action and loyalty to social ideals. Boon companionships also are frequently formed now which, though lacking in constancy, are prophetic of the more spiritual friendships of later life.

III. THE INTELLECTUAL APPROACH. This has already been indicated. The chief points to remember are the retentiveness and mechanical quality of the memory, the interest in heroic persons and the growing voluntariness of the attention. The first determines the nature and amount of the memory work; the second should regulate the lesson material; the third lays down the method of teaching. If ever a pupil should be made "to learn" it should be in the junior period.

IV. THE MORAL APPROACH. The two great levers here are hero worship and the social instinct. The former can be used to fix the affections of the class on the heroes of the faith, especially on Jesus as the ideal hero of the world. As, however, the imagination of this period is indiscriminate, swallowing the ideal whole, great care must be taken to distinguish the bad from the good in the lives of the characters studied. The social instinct brings two new moral elements into play—altruism or thought for others, and the loyalty to group-ideals which will later on develop into the higher loyalties of country, humanity and God.

V. THE RELIGIOUS APPROACH.

(1) HABIT FROMATION. This is the ideal period for the formation of such habits of religious routine as daily prayer, Bible study, church attendance, liberality, etc., which should receive regular recognition in the class-work.

(2) WORSHIP. Admiration here takes the place of awe. The boy or girl of this period, if less familiar with the wonder-working God, is more familiar with the man Christ Jesus. If he is apt to be less reverent than he was a few years before, that is because the sense of fear is being absorbed into that of friendship. "Jesus Christ the great Comrade" is the motto of religious instruction for the later junior years.

(3) PERSONAL RELIGION. The ideas of sin and forgiveness do not belong properly to this period. Hence conversion in the technical sense should not be looked for and still less "worked-up." At the same time the spirit of hero-worship should be fostered so as to prepare the way for the great act of personal loyalty to Christ which comes normally in the next period.

LITERATURE: Layard's, "Religion in Childhood"; Forbush's, "The Boy Problem."

QUESTIONS: (1) What is the importance of the junior period? (2) Name six characteristic interests or activities of this period. (3) Distinguish between the "motor activity" of this age and the restlessness of the primary period. (4) What is meant by saying the boy of this age is a "hero worshipper"? (5) What are the things in their heroes that appeal chiefly to boys? (6) Discuss the "interest" and "attention" of this period. (7) Characterize its memory and imagination. (8) How are the social instincts of this age manifested? (9) Indicate the "intellectual approach." (10) What are the two great moral levers of these years? Indicate their use in ethical teaching. (11) Discuss "Habit formation" in this period. (12) What is the key-note of its "worship"? (13) How is personal religion manifested by the boy or girl?

Prohibition on a Postal Card

A big argument in a little space is brought to our attention by Mr. A. B. Farwell of the Chicago Law and Order League. A postal card circulated widely among the "personal liberty" people of the Northwest Side bore the following argument, and, falling into the hands of Mr. J. S. Miller, received a pertinent answer:

Demands of Justice.
(A Puzzle.)

Can any legislative body enforce the morality of its people?

Can a legislative body dictate when, where or what to eat or drink?

Would a legislative body close the churches on Sunday?

Why should they close the saloons, which offer an opportunity of recreation for the man of toil?

Published for the benefit of liberty loving people.

Mr. Arthur Burrage Farwell, Dear Sir: The enclosed card was sent to me and inasmuch as the party asks "Is this so-" and signs "A church member," I have written the following reply. You may use it as you like. As you know, I am a working man.

To the first question I answer, Yes, legislatures can and do make laws regulating the morals of their citizens. There are laws against murder, arson, theft and a great many other things that affect our morals.

Second question: They can and do say what their people shall eat and drink. See the pure food laws—they cover part of what shall be sold to be eaten and drank.

Third: Yes, they would close any church if it defied the law and did anything that would be a detriment to the community where the church exists.

Fourth: Because the Sunday saloon is the enemy of the toiler. It creates drunkards, causes murder, suicides and misery to all its patrons. It takes away the toiler's money and gives him nothing but a blue Monday in return. It sends his wife to the washtub and his children to the factory, or compels them to seek other employment. It takes the money the toiler ought to spend for his children's bread, shoes, clothes and education, fills our jails, penitentiaries, work-houses and poor-houses and it robs us of the opportunity to spend our Sunday with our families.

It keeps us from the enjoyment of a home that we have worked for all the week and beyond all this it robs its patrons of all reverence and love to God. If for no other reason than the last one, the Sunday saloon ought to be closed. J. G. Miller.

Well, What If He Didn't?

For many years Dr. Francis L. Patton, ex-president of Princeton University, wore side whiskers. Whenever he suggested shaving them, there was a division of opinion in the family. One morning he came into his wife's dressing room, razor in hand, with his right cheek shaved smooth.

"How do you like it, my dear?" he asked. "If you think it looks well, I will shave the other side, too."—Everybody's Magazine for June.

Chicago

The City's Great Problem of Reconciling Warring Races, Nationalities and Classes

BY O. F. JORDAN.

The great city in America is one of the greatest mixtures of incongruous materials that could possibly be imagined. All the forces that are operating to build up great cities, are operating to bring from the four corners of the earth the different races and types that we have here in Chicago. Immigration brings men from all parts of the civilized world. Men from different sections of the United States settle here, bringing their local dialects and their provincial points of view. It is a great task to create in this conglomerate mass anything of civic pride or of united political action. The interests are so diverse, the walls between different sections of the city are so high that it is hard at times to see how these shall ever be scaled.

Chicago Cosmopolitanism.

As an illustration of the cosmopolitan character of Chicago, we found the other day a little shop on Clark street. The signs in front were in six different languages. We went into the dingy little place and inquired if languages. They replied that they were and that it was necessary if their store was to continue to do business in that particular section of the city. One may go into the Ghetto and find that even the Jews, as unified as they are in race, have the most diverse tongues. Their newspapers are printed in the Yiddish character, but the signs on their stores are in about all of the languages of Europe, the predominant ones being Russian and German. A trip through Europe may be taken on a Halsted street car. One passes through a section where eveything is Polish. In other parts, everything appears to be German. A little farther down one passes through a little Athens where the restaurabbi and is so marked by the great packing to come in and eat. Still farther down the street, the Hebrews hold full sway and the "Kosher" meat shop furnishes meat that has been slaughtered in the pressence of the rabbai and is so marked by the great packing houses. In another section is the Bohemian district with their compact neighborhood life. This does not by any means exhaust the list of what one could find by riding down the longest street in Chicago, which is nearly thirty miles long.

The population of Chicago was reported at the last census as being twenty-five per cent native American. There are those now who do not hesitate to say that there is not in the city today over eight per cent of pure American stock, the remainder being either foreign born or the children of foreign born. We have been having an immigration into this country at the rate of a million a year, and these people have settled for the most part in our large cities.

Foreigners Sympathetic with Our Institutions.

Chicago has the advantage of New York so far in having a type of foreigner who is more sympathetic with our institutions. Our population that is foreign born is still for the most part from northern Europe, in spite of the fact that the immigration at present is predominantly from the Catholic countries of Europe.

In our city are six hundred thousand Germans. This will be better understood when we say that the Germans of Chicago alone would make a city the size of St. Louis, according to the last census. There are more Germans in Chicago than in any of the cities of Germany except Berlin and Hamburg. These Germans have great singing societies and have reproduced most of the institutions of the fatherland. They have the beer-gardens and the drinking customs of the life beyond the sea.

The Scandinavians are in our city in great numbers. Over on the north-west side of town, one might imagine he were transported into Sweden. There are more Swedes in Chicago than in any city of Sweden except Stockholm. They speak their own language and find it possible to live a lifetime in Chicago without needing to learn the English language.

Interesting Characteristics of the Poles.

The Poles are the largest single Roman Catholic element in our city's life. There are a hundred thousand of them. They are now used in the great steel mills and in the rougher construction labor, like digging sewers. They are a virile race, but usually with much laxer standards of life than are held by the people of the Lutheran countries. The police report them a more war-like folk than any in the city. At all great family events like christenings, weddings and funerals, there is apt to be a big drunk and in the end some broken heads. A stockyards policeman tells us that it is not an unknown wives. In one house he pointed out, eighteen men, women and children slept in a single occurrence for some of these citizens to trade room. There was no embarrassment over the morning toilet for they did not disrobe at night. Few of the races in Chicago have made so complete a repudiation of all religious influence as have the Poles.

Smaller Colonies of Immigrants.

There are smaller groups here of less known nationalities. The Persians have a colony of about five hundred people. They are almost altogether men who have come from the native land to investigate. If their report is favorable, we shall doubtless have a much larger colony. There is a colony of four hundred Japanese. These are mostly men. There can be no doubt that as time goes on, the colony will grow much larger. There is a colony of at least two thousand Chinese in the city. Many of these are still in heathenism. Our own Jackson Boulevard Church has a Sunday-school class of these orientals who study English in the Sunday-school, along with a little religious instruction. We have a thousand natives of Finland in the far north and these have just been studied by the Co-operative Council of City Missions and assigned to a certain denomination for religious instruction. We cannot pause for more than a mention of the Egyptians, the Syrians, the Albanians, the Armenians and many others who have groups in our city and reproduce the life of the fatherland.

Can Racial Prejudice Be Overcome?

What of the realization of the sense of Christian brotherhood in such a heterogeneous population? There is no prejudice like that of race and color. Our city is divided into scores of groups that are mutually exclusive on the basis of race and nationality. There are the lines of cleavage in religion, Jew against Catholic and faddists against the orthodox forms of religion. There are the political lines, with the cry of class prejudice, which is raised alike by anarchist and socialist. There is the contest of union labor with the capitalist on one hand, and with the "Scabs" on the other hand.

It need not be a matter of wonder that churches of different denominations in Chicago get into the newspapers as having difficulties in the membership. It is a wonder that they get on as well as they do. The church has undertaken a greater miracle than some of those of the Bible in trying to reconcile these warring races, nationalities and classes. When it is achieved, as it must be achieved with the victorious leadership of our Master, we shall understand what He meant when He said, "Greater things than these shall ye do."

From the pastor at Paxton, Ill., we have the following encouraging report: "First pastoral year closed June 1. Advancement in every line. Bible school almost doubled. Over 100 enrolled in three adult classes. New Vision' Prayer meetings from an average of five to ten to an annual average of nearly forty. $500 spent in general repairs. All missionary offerings taken. Pastoral work as follows: Sermons delivered 115; special addresses four; funerals fourteen; weddings seven; pastoral visits 225; added to the church forty-nine. Unity prevails. Prospects are bright."

With the Workers

A. J. Williams has closed his work with the church at Vinita, Okla.

The Missouri State Convention goes to Jefferson City next year.

T. H. Hansaker is doing excellent work at Davenport, Washington.

"The Disciple," the weekly paper of the Lenox Ave. Church, New York, will not be published during July and August.

Morning service one-half hour shorter is the program for July and August at First Church, Warren, Ohio.

A new $20,000 church was dedicated at Jefferson City, Mo., June 13. Former pastor J. P. Pinkerton, preaching the sermon.

W. P. Shamhart, Fort Wayne, Ind., has accepted a call to the church at Rockford, Tenn.

W. B. Taylor, the veteran preacher and Bible teacher has been holding a meeting at New Port News, Va.

E. E. Smith has closed his work with the church at Vebtura, Cal., and has located at Talmage, Neb.

The church at Huntsville, Mo., has extended a call to J. D. Powell, of Clarkesburg, Mo.

C. C. Morrison, editor of the Christian Century, formerly pastor of the First Church, Springfield, Ill., lectured at the Stuart Street Church, Springfield, last Thursday evening.

Bruce Brown, the energetic pastor at Valparaiso, Ind., began a meeting with W. T. Hilton and the church at Greenville, Texas, June 27.

W. H. Trainum, professor in Christian College, Canton, Mo., has been visiting in Texas, where a few years ago he did excellent work as pastor.

The Wharton Memorial Home, at Hiram, Ohio, will be formally opened about the first of October. A friend in Kansas has recently given $500 to this work.

A. P. Finley, after two years service with the Highland Street Church, Worcester, Mass., has resigned, and will enter the evangelistic field.

On the evening of June 13, A. W. Kokkendoffer, pastor of the church at Sedalia, Mo., preached for the church at Jefferson City, Mo.

L. M. Anderson, after three years of work with the Ross Avenue Church, Dallas, Texas, has resigned and accepted a call to Honey Grove.

The church at Belton, Mo., has asked A. S. Morrison to remain with them another year, though his present year does not close until December.

G. H. Basset, minister of the church at Salisbury, Mo., says that their offering to foreign missions this year was larger than at any time in the history of the church.

Lockhart and Lintt are to assist the church at Canton in a meeting in the autumn. The pastor of the church, J. G. Waggoner, is expecting a great meeting.

J. J. Cramer has resigned at Plano, Texas. The church has a membership of 107, and will hold a meeting during July and August with the assistance of evangelists Haddock and Stanley.

Lawrence Anderson, who was a graduate of Eureka and has preached for a short time in California, died in Colorado Springs, Col., two weeks ago. His body was taken to Colfax, Ills., for burial.

A new church is to be dedicated at Glascow, a suburb of Portland, Oregon, in the near future. This is a new church, which has grown rapidly under the ministry of A. H. Mulkey.

B. B. Tyler, "The Bishop of Denver," is spending the month of July on the Pacific Coast. He will visit the Long Beach convention and be the chief speaker at Santa Cruz, Cal.

Dr. Nathaniel Butler, of the University of Chicago, gave the address at the Anniversary Exercises of the School of Education of Drake University. The commencement address was made by E. L. Powell, Louisville.

Andrew P. Johnson, minister of the church at Fayette, Mo., preached for the First Christian Church, St. Louis, Mo., the Sunday evening during the meeting of the state convention.

J. C. Murdock has just held a meeting at Murdock, Ill., in which there were forty-one accessions to the church and arrangements were made for securing a preacher for the church.

M. M. Davis has been elected dean of the Bible Department of Virginia Christian College, at Lynchburg, Va. He will continue to preach while giving instruction in the college.

The church at Benjamin, Texas, was recently damaged by wind, but only to the extent of $300, instead of $3,000 as a typographical error made the Century say recently.

B. W. Huntsman, pastor of the church at Adrian, Mich., speaks very highly of a sermon recently delivered in the church by Miner Lee Bates, president of Hiram College. Mr. Bates' subject was, "The Courage of Christ."

Second Church, Warren, Ohio, Bible School report for June 20: Officers and teachers, 25; Pupis, 200; Primary, 88; Visitors, 3; total attendance, 316. Total offering, $6.46. Banner classes: Attendance No. 1 and 8, 100 per cent; Offering No. 2, $1.36.

The Men's Club of the First Church, Hutchinson, Kans., held their initial banquet recently with E. W. Allen of the Central Church, Witchita, as the chief speaker. O. L. Cook is doing a successful work at Hutchinson.

Geo. L. Sniveley, who has been in St. Luke's Hospital, St. Louis, for the past two or three weeks, is expecting to be out again soon, and will hold a meeting with the church at Dixon, Ill., where he hopes to make possible the erection of a new house of worship.

J. E. Denton, for two years pastor of the church at Richmond, Cal., and one of the best known men in northern California, has resigned his pastorate and will retire from the ministry, giving his time to the development of a ranch in Washington.

A new church is to be dedicated at Dover, Okla., at an early date. The Disciples are building an unusually large number of churches this year—and some fine ones, too. Many of these are with modern equipment for the work of the Sunday-school.

Monday afternoon of Commencement week at Drake University the oil painting of Dean Howard was unveiled and formally presented to the University. It was hung in the recital hall of Howard Hall. Prof. George Ogden paid a tribute to Dean Howard.

H. E. Stubbs, minister of the church at Erick, Okla., was ordained as a Christian minister, in the church at Erick, May 22. The dedication sermon was by Rev. Weaver of Sayre, Okla. Mr. Stubbs is doing good work.

The East Side Church, Denver, Colo., is moving right ahead. There were twenty-four additions in May and June. There were ten baptisms. Audiences increasing through the summer. All departments growing. Jesse B. Haston is in his fourth year with the church.

Mrs. D. R. Lucas has presented Drake University with a portrait of her husband, D. R. Lucas, who was one of the founders of the University, and one of its most devoted friends. The present came just in time for the commencement.

M. B. Mason, brother of J. C. Mason, state secretary of Texas, died suddenly June 11 while attending the Arkansas state meeting at Hot Springs. Of the three brothers, J. C. alone survives. W. B. Mason was an efficient preacher of the Gospel, and will be remembered as one who contributed largely to the progress of our work in the south.

S. B. Moore, for two years and three months minister of the First Church, Paducah, Ky., has resigned and will spend July and August in Ohio. During Mr. Moore's ministry at Paducah there were 123 additions to the church, fifteen hundred dollars paid on church debt, and five hundred dollars interest, and more than two thousand spent on improvement of the church property.

Dr. J. M. Philputt, the organizer and for many years pastor of the Lenox Ave. Church, New York, now pastor of the Union Ave. Church, St. Louis, preached at the West End Presbyterian Church, New York, July 4. In honor of him the Lenox Ave. Church adjourned its service of the morning, that its members might hear their former pastor and friend.

The death of Mrs. Alexander Proctor was announced last Week. Mr. Proctor is well remembered by the Disciples every where as for nearly forty years he was the faithful and beloved pastor of the church at Independence, Mo., and one of the strong men in developing the work of the state. Mrs. Proctor was greatly beloved by the people of the church and the city.

F. M. Rogers, formerly of Springfield, Ill., who is now doing a successful work at Long Beach, Cal., has introduced the plan of merging the Sunday-school and the morning preaching service, making one continuous service from ten till twelve o'clock. The plan is proving a success. Before it was adopted 36 per cent of the Sunday-school attendance was in the church service, now the per cent is as high as 86.

The First Christian Church of Birmingham, Ala., has granted their pastor, Dr. A. R. Moore a three months' vacation or as much longer as is deemed necessary that he might regain his health. Dr. Moore has been in bad health for some time and it is hoped by his friends that his rest will bring back to him his former strength.

During his absence the pulpit will be supplied by Rev. J. R. Jolly recently of Brooklyn, N. Y., who is spending the summer in Birmingham, with his mother.

It is announced by the Pacific Christian of last week that H. O. Breeden so well known for his work of twenty years at the Central Church, at Des Moines, and for the high grade successful evangelistic work he has done during the last three years, has been secured by Berkeley Seminary for a period of instruction in Evangelism at the seminary, next year. No better man could be had for the work. He has the educational equipment, the experience, the natural ability, and the confidence of the Brotherhood.

"Dr. Earl Wilfley, pastor of the First Christian Church of St. Louis, gave an illustrated lecture at the church Thursday evening of last week on the book of "Ben-Hur." The lecture, given under the auspices of the local Tribe of Ben-Hur, was highly appreciated by all. Dr. Wilfley is a stirring speaker and charmed the audience with his oratorical reading of the book, which was illustrated with the various scenes. The dramatic description of the chariot race was particularly strong.—From Parish Paper of First Christian Church, Lincoln, Neb.

The Daily-Courier-Light, Corsicana, Texas, devotes more than two pages of its issue of June 5 to an account of the meeting of the Texas Christian Missionary Society held there. It presents portraits of J. H. Hughes, pastor at Corsicana; J. T. Ogle, president of the convention; F. M. Rains, T. F. Driskill, who organized the work at the convention city; J. C. Mason, state secretary, P. C. Macfarlane, and a picture of the Corsicana church in which the convention was held. Accompanying these pictures is a full account of the proceedings of the convention.

J. T. Ogle, Paris, Texas, has just celebrated the 21st anniversary of his ministerial activity. His first sermon as settled pastor of a church was at Harristown, Ill., June 20, 1888. He has since served as pastor at Cameron, Mo., Carrolton, Mo., Guthrie, Okla., and Paris, Texas. In all this time he has not had a week's vacation. Under his ministry 2,000 people have come into our churches. These words from him are significant and encouraging, "If I had these 21 years to live over, knowing what I now do, I should go directly into the Christian ministry." It is good to serve in such spirit.

In addition to the report made in a recent number of the Christian Century regarding and concerning Centennial Day services at Ann Arbor, we wish to announce the gift of a $2,500 pipe organ made by a former student of the University and upon the condition that under no circumstances was the name of the donor to be announced, and that the building should be put in condition for its installation at once. This will be done during the summer at a cost of about $1,500 and everything will be in readiness for the coming of the students in the autumn. O. E. Tomes, is doing a great work with this church.

Much interest is shown in the forward move of the church at Terre Haute, Ind., where under the leadership of S. D. Dutcher, the church is entering upon the tithing system for raising funds. Before undertaking this plan the church was confronted by the need of a new building, but because of other indebtedness did not feel equal to the undertaking. Instead of following the beaten path of asking the faithful to pledge largely, and then go and beg others, and then pledge again at the close of the campaign, they decided to ask people to give one-tenth of the income. The plan has worked beautifully. There is a larger income than the church has ever had, and it is done so easily and cheerfully that the church is enthusiastic over results.

An excellent piece of work has been done by the church at Galesburg, Ill., and their pastor, J. A. Barnett in the publication of the Centennial number of "The Galesburg Voice." The paper is in magazine form, 24 pages, with heavy brown paper cover. It contains an article by W. R. Warren, on the centennial, a statement of the teachings of the Disciples, cuts of Eureka College buildings, articles by P. C. Macfarlane and Miss Lura V. Thompson, Description of Our Home and Foreign Missionary Organization, the Centennial Program, History sketch of the First and East Side Churches, Galesburg, and Knoxville, with cuts of C. W. Cummings, pastor at Knoxville, and A. L. Huff, East Galesburg, and J. A. Barnett, First Church. The work is done on good paper and is an attractive piece of advertising, one that must commend itself to the community.

Mr. and Mrs. A. C. Smither, of the First Christian Church, Los Angeles, California, were given a birthday surprise, Thursday evening, June 10. Twenty-two of the members present were members of the church when Mr. Smither was called to its pastorate in 1890. The church was then known as the Temple Street Christian Church. Since then a new and modern building has been erected. At the reception Mr. W. R. Harper spoke on "Our Pastor, Then and Now." Mr. W. R. Harper told of "Our Church Home." Lawyer W. K. Crawford spoke of "Our First Lady," paying high tribute to the work of Mrs. Smither. At the close of the reception the Pastor and his wife were presented with a silver loving cup upon which was engraved a picture of the old church and the new one, with appropriate inscription. This was a delightful expression of the happy relation between this strong church and its efficient pastor and his wife.

The recent convention of the Michigan churches, held at Dowagiac, is said to have been one of the best in the history of the Disciples in the state. There were 149 accredited delegates, with a large local attendance. The convention was greatly helped by the work of the men representing the organized interests of the Brotherhood, among these were W. J. Wright, Stephen J. Corey, W. R. Warren, Marion Stevenson, and representing the C. W. B. M., Mrs. Ida Harrison. The report of State Secretary F. P. Arthur showed the Michigan churches to have given $3,000 to state work and $5,000 to the Centennial Fund The C. W. B. M. has a total membership of 1,169 and gave from all sources $25,180.50. The officers elected for the ensuing year are, President, G. P. Coler; Vice President, C. J. Tanner; Second Vice President, J. T. McGarvey; Recording Secretary, V. H. Miller, and Corresponding Secretary, F. P. Arthur; Treasurer, J. H. Smith.

The Minnesota Christian Missionary Society held its annual convention in the beautiful temple, erected by the heroic labors of Brother Nicholson and his faithful church, in Redwood Falls, Minn., June 21 to 24. The addresses were excellent, presenting subjects of vital interest to the church. The aims for the new year, if carried out, should double the church in Minnesota:

1. Preaching in every church each Lord's day. 2. An evangelistic meeting in each church. 3. All members in the Bible school. Resolutions resolved that the product of the saloon is so clearly the work of his Satanic majesty and opposed to all that Christ and His church stand for, it merits the condemnation of all Christians. 2. All members of Church of Christ who give their support to political organizations that sell the privilege to engage in the alcohol traffic for beverage purposes, are a party to the crimes it commits, and are putting their Lord to open shame, and should be called on to repent for so great a sin against their Lord and society. 4. We commend the American Temperance Board of the Church of Christ, and pledge it our hearty support in its organized effort to educate the people, and place before them the evils that grow out of the traffic in alcohol poison. 3. Resolved that the use of tobacco is so out of harmony with the spirit of Christ, its use should be dropped by those who wear the exalted name Christian. The above resolutions were passed and made a part of the records of the convenion.

Edgar D. Jones has just rounded out the third year of his ministry with the First Christian Church, Bloomington, Ill.

During this period, Mr. Jones has preached 215 sermons in his own pulpit and has delivered 95 special addresses and lectures. He conducted 102 funerals and officiated at 98 weddings and received into the membership of the congregation over 800 persons. Mr. Jones is spending the month of July at Idlewild, the country home of his wife's parents in Boone County, Kentucky, near Cincinnati. John E. Pounds of Cleveland will assist him in special evangelistic services at Bloomington next January.

F. B. Holden, who was baptized at Memorial Church of Christ in this city a few weeks ago, was formerly the pastor of a Methodist church in Canada, but is now preaching for the Christian churches at West Sebewa and Coats Grove, Michigan.

V. W. Blair, who has recently resigned his work at Plainfield, Indiana, has been called to the church at North Tonawanda, New York, of which W. C. Hull has been pastor for a number of years. Mr. Hull has eccepted the pulpit at Pasadena, California, following F. M. Dowling.

Dr. Homer J. Hall of Franklin, Ind., Secretary of the American Board of Temperance of the Disciples of Christ, and James A. Tate of Tennessee, representative of the Board for the state of Tennessee, made a very interesting presentation of that work at Tipton, Ind., on Sunday, June 27.

H. T. Morrison writes from Bothwell, Prince Edward Island, Canada, that he is on his way as a delegate to two religious conventions ,one a Baptist, the other a Disciple gathering. Mr. Morrison is pastor af a congregation of two organizations representing both brotherhoods. It is, he says, a typical case of Federation. Both organizations are weak but, combined, make a worthy congregation. The Baptist meeting house is used for all services except in the morning of each alternate Sunday when all meet in the house of the Disciples. Separate treasuries for local and missionary purposes are maintained. The former pastor of the federated churches was a Baptist. Mr. Morrisen reports large congregations, enthusiasm and a spirit of unity.

The Burial of Mother Willett.

The remains of Mrs. Mary E. Willett, mother of Prof. Herbert L. Willett, were taken to Ionia, Michigan, her home from childhood until her removal to Chicago about fifteen years ago, where a second memorial service was held in the church on Sunday, June 20, at 2:30 p. m. It was here that Isaac Errett both baptized and married her and her husband. Her remains were accompanied to Ionia by her son Herbert, and her three grandsons, Floyd, Robert and Paul, and the writer. The service in the old church, where were gathered some of the old friends of her girlhood with a goodly company of younger relatives and neighbors, was one of great impressiveness and simplicity.

The music, consisting of "I'm a Pilgrim" and "The Crossing of the Bar" was rendered by a quartette of skilled singers, composed of the nieces and nephews of Mother Willett.

Brief addresses were made by Geo. W. Moore, the pastor of the church, and by C. A. Preston, one of the few remaining charter members of the church, and a lifelong friend, who spoke in beautiful appreciation of her life and character, and by the writer, who knew her since his boy-hood days in the Ionia church, twenty-seven years ago.

The remains were taken Monday morning across country to the family burying ground in the cemetery at North Plains, ten miles distant from Ionia, where they were laid beside her husband, Gordon A Willett, who passed away in 1898. The journey was made past the childhood home of Mother Willett, in a country of rare beauty and fruitfulness; and past the house where her eldest child, Herbert L., was born, in the last days of the Civil War. The road led past two little country school houses where her son first learned to teach as a mere youth of sixteen and seventeen.

All this was sacred soil, consecrated by the memories of a noble woman, whose body was being borne over it to its last resting place; and by the early struggles of a talented son, who was trained at her knee in his early days, and was followed in later time with ardent prayer and hope until she saw him win eminent place among his fellows. She found her most cherished womanly ambitions realized in a family of boys, every one of whom dedicated himself to the ministry of the Gospel. Two were caught away at the threshhold of their ministry; her husband soon followed; and her hopes took final refuge in her one remaining son, and in him and his home she found comfort and protection in her last days.

She was borne back home again, away from the noise and stress of the city, to the quietness of fields and woods; and was laid to rest under familiar skies and in a place she loved best. Thus closed most beautifully the life of a noble woman, a mother in Israel, who was loved by all who knew her, and has left an undying name and influence to those who come after her.

A Good Report for June.

The receipts of the Foreign Society for the month of June amounted to $53,590, a gain of $11,554. The churches as churches gained $5,169, the Sunday-schools $606, Endeavor Societies $327, Individual gifts $5,772, and Annuities $800. The total receipts for the first nine months of the current missionary year to July 1 amount to $190,339, a gain of $41,095. The churches as churches show a gain of $14,760, Sunday-schools $704, Individual gifts $14,227, and Anuuities $14,834. There is a loss in bequests of $4,726.

The Sunday-schools did not show as large an increase in their gifts during the month of June as had been hoped. We are trusting that July will show a change for the better.

Dear Bro. Morrison: Your articles on Revivals should be put in pamphlet form. I would like to see them in a shape that they could be distributed where they would do good. It is the sanest and ablest thing on the subject I have ever read. I enjoy the Century. You are making a paper that really helps the preacher.—A. B. Philputt.

Central Church, Indianapolis, Ind.

Dear Brother Morrison: Have just read The Christian Century of this date (June 17). It is great. The Century is a paper that is a paper! I have been greatly dissatisfied with our periodical literature for some time. My courage is coming up. I am beginning to be hopeful and happy again. These remarks have not to do alone with the paper received today. For some weeks I have been inclined to say, in substance, what I am now saying. May I specify some of the specially good things in this number? "The Religious Value of the Old Testament" is fine. I place this article at the head of the list. The study of revivals is getting down to bed rock. Bro. Taylor's setting forth of Dr. Dye's work is one of the best things of the kind that I have read.—B. B. Tyler.

75th Anniversary of Church at Washington, Ill.

The Christian Church in Washington, Ill., celebrated its 75th Anniversary June 27. J. T. Alsup of Metropolis, Ill., delivered the sermon in the forenoon. Mr. Alsup was at one time pastor of the Church for two years. Prof. B. J. Radford of Eureka delivered the Communion address in the afternoon. The roll of the church was called by Linn Hornish, Clerk of the Church. Most of the membership responded to the Roll Call. Letters from several of the former pastors of the church were read, including A. M. Haggard, A. P. Cobb, R. F. Thrapp, W. D. Madden and Harry Streibich. H. H. Peters of Eureka delivered the evening address on "The Church of the Future." Ernest B. Reed has been pastor of the Church for one year and has done splendid work. He is a student in Eureka College and is doing good work in the school also. The Washington Church has been a power in the community for three-quarters of a century. It has sent out hundreds of men and women to take an active part in the work of the church elsewhere and many of its members have become prominent leaders in Christian service. The membership now is about one hundred and thirty-five, and quite active. The future is bright for the church and it is believed that the work of the day of the celebration of the 75th anniversary will result in great good to the cause.

Annuity Funds for American Missions.

During June the American Christian Missionary Society has received $3,150 upon the annuity plan. Inquiries concerning this method of missionary support continue to reach the secretaries, indicating the likelihood of largely increased gifts. The plan is most attractive, guaranteeing to the annuitant five to six per cent payable semi-annually, without the usual worries incident to investment of spare funds, and with none of the costs and expenses which so materially cut down the net income. The society is able to invest this money in first mortgage securities which carry the cost to both society and annuitant. At the death of the annuitant the money becomes an executed gift to the society and without further charge or obligation passes at once into the general fund and goes out to establish churches of the Apostolic faith and practice in America. It is a unique plan by which one whose heart is set upon the extension of the Kingdom in our own land may set his savings to work for the Lord while at the same time he enjoys the benefit of their earning power.

Any one who may be interested in this method may obtain further information from the secretaries of the American Christian Missionary Society in the Y. M. C. A. Bldg., Cincinnati, Ohio.

AN OLD TIMER
Has Had Experience.

A woman who has used Postum since it came upon the market knows from experience the wisdom of using Postum in place of coffee if one values health and a clear brain. She says:

"At the time Postum was first put on the market I was suffering from nervous dyspepsia, and my physician had repeatedly told me not to use tea or coffee. Finally I decided to take his advice and try Postum. I got a package and had it carefully prepared, finding it delicious to the taste. So I continued its use and very soon its beneficial effects convinced me of its value, for I got well of my nervousness and dyspepsia.

"My husband had been drinking coffee all his life until it had affected his nerves terribly, and I persuaded him to shift to Postum. It was easy to get him to make the change for the Postum is so delicious. It certainly worked wonders for him.

"We soon learned that Postum does not exhilarate or depress and does not stimulate, but steadily and honestly strengthens the nerves and the stomach.

"To make a long story short, our entire family continued to use Postum with satisfying results as shown in our fine condition of health and we have noticed a rather unexpected improvement in brain and nerve power."

Increased brain and nerve power always follows the use of Postum in place of coffee, sometimes in a very marked manner. "There's a Reason."

Uhrichsville, Ohio, June 21, 1909.

Marion Stevenson visited our Bible School on May 31 and by his encouragement and advice greatly increased its efficiency. The attendance on that day made a new record for our school, 640.

The new Reading Room, recently opened by the Men's Association of the Uhrichsville church, is proving itself a success. Many are taking advantage of its privileges. The promoters of the enterprise are more than pleased at this result, for we half expected that the room would attract patronage only after cool weather should set in next fall. The room supplies a much needed want since the saloons were voted out.

A Teacher Training Class of over thirty will hold graduating exercises in the near future. Many who started with the class a year ago and who have dropped out will take up the work again and graduate later.

Evangelest Luke D'Amore of Bethany College, has been working among our Italian population for the last ten days. Nineteen responded to the Gospel invitation and have united with the church by baptism. The work among the Italians will be continued. The success achieved by Brother D'Amore should open our eyes to the possibilities in every locality where Italians are located.

As We Go to Press

McLeansboro, Ill., July 4.—After being home sick, thank God, we are able to be in the work again. Started here today. Bro. Coleman has made great preparations. Prospects good. Tent packed. Church needing meetings this winter write me here. Hughes sisters of Monmouth, Ill., are with us. Mrs. Thompson has charge of the personal work.—Thompson the Egyptian.

One of the healthiest indications in our general missionary work is the constantly increasing number of churches contributing to the regular calls. The secretaries of the American Christian Missionary Society tell us that for the month of June alone there were added to the roll of churches supporting Home Missions no fewer than 180 new names. More than 500 churches sent in offerings during the month. There was a net gain in the church receipts of $856.78. The total gain in the receipts for June was $5,562.17.

If the churches that have already taken the offering for this work would send their money to the office promptly there would be even greater gains.

Centennial Bulletin

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

A wise and timely suggestion comes from Miss Mary Graybiel, who gives us a list of half a dozen persons that she believes will be interested in the Declaration and Address, and asks that it be mailed to each of them with the following statement enclosed.

"Kindly read the enclosed message and earnestly consider whether the principles herein set forth a century ago do not furnish an adequate basis for the uniting of the people of God."

The Western Pennsylvania Christian Missionary Society has purchased five hundred copies of Thomas Campbell's immortal document to send to all the ministers of Greater Pittsburgh. Individuals, churches and societies everywhere will do well to follow these examples. The cost of the pamphlet is 10c per copy, $1.00 per dozen, $6.00 per hundred, prepaid. Every copy of either large or small quantity will be mailed to a separate address without extra charge if desired.

Two Carloads of Centennial Literature.

A million Centennial seals, gummed and ready to attach to envelopes, and 100,000 Centennial folders to enclose in letters are at the disposal of the brotherhood free of charge on request. How many can you use to advantage?

One of the largest printing establishments of Pittsburgh has ordered a special carload of enameled paper for the production of the Prospectus, "Pittsburgh and the Centennial," 100,000 copies of which, handsomely illustrated, will be ready for free distribution the latter part of July. These will be mailed individually to every address we now have, or which shall be furnished us before the supply is exhausted.

The contract was signed today which will bring to Pittsburgh from Boston one week before the fifty thousand assemble in October, a carload of handsomely illustrated Memorial Programs of the Centennial Convention. This will be not only a complete hand-book of the Centennial, but a splendid guide to the City of Pittsburgh. Every copy will be bound in full morocco, with round corners and gold edges.

More Veterans.

From Southern California we learn that Brother James F. Stewart, a preacher of fruitful ministry, and a grandson of Andrew Munro, who raised the question of infant baptism in the memorable meeting of the Christian Association when Thomas Campbell promulgated the watchword, "Where the Scriptures speak, we speak, where the Scriptures are silent, we are silent," will be among the veterans at Pittsburgh. From Columbus, Ohio, Bro. James Hanen Garvin, highly honored and loved for his work's sake, sends a photograph of his grandmother, Sarah Hanen, who, with her husband, James Hanen, was baptized at the same time as Thomas Campbell and wife, Alexander Campbell and wife, and Dorothea Campbell, June 12, 1812. Mrs. M. L. Hupp, of West Alexander, Pa., a granddaughter of James and Sarah Hanen, has promised to place among the exhibits at the Centennial an enlarged portrait of her grandmother.

The following editorial appeared in the Gazette Times of June 28.

The Disciples' Centenary.

A great deal of interest is being manifested even outside of the denominational lines, in the impending centenary of the Disciples of Christ, which is really the centenary of Alexander Campbell's coming to the United States and settling in Bethany, Va., as pastor of the Presbyterian church there. The ideas from which this great religious movement sprang were in the air before Campbell landed on American soil; Barton W. Stone preached the same doctrine in Kentucky as early as 1804; but Alexander Campbell and his father by their learning, fiery zeal and organizing ability crystallized the ideas and the movement into the beginning of the great church that we know today, with its 6,673 ministers, 11,307 churches and 1,285,123 communicants.

Roughly speaking, the Disciples of Christ may be called a Baptist church without any creed. Thomas Campbell and his son renounced Presbyterianism and were immersed in 1812, and in 1823 Alexander Campbell published The Christian Baptist to set forth his doctrine. But the Baptists regarded the movement askance, and the converts of the Campbells had to form separate communities. So the church arose, whose cardinal points of belief are that the Bible is the sole and sufficient authority of religious faith, and that the title of Christian is the only one that is properly to be applied to followers of Christ. Consistent with this latter idea, the Disciples vigorously resent the tendency to call them "Campbellites," not that they do not cherish the memory of their great leader, but that they repudiate the imputation of being a man-made sect as they repudiate all man-made creeds. In most things, it should be said, they are thoroughly in accord with evangelical denominations.

Alexander Campbell, fervent preacher and voluminous writer, must be counted among the eminent religious leaders of the new world, and the centenary of his arrival here will find all the church bodies of our land ready to pay tribute to his scholarship, his piety, his holy zeal, his glorious hope, his wondrous achievement. Although he left no written creed, he left a fruitful church. The forthcoming centenary, from all indications promises to be one of the largest religious conventions ever held. It has been announced that 30,000 rooms will be required to house the pilgrims, and the principal exercises will be in the open air because no hall sufficiently large is available. Pittsburgh will welcome with open arms these represenatives of a church organization whose history is linked so closely with the early history of this religion, and which has given so splendid service to the cause of its Master.

Teaching Missions in the Bible School

One of the immediate problems of the Bible school is the provision for the development of the missionary spirit in every pupil. The Bible is nothing if not a missionary book. The teaching of Bible that does not inculcate the missionary spirit and stir missionary activity is a failure, and a fundamental denial of the very spirit of the living word of God.

Two "Missionary Department Leaflets" have just been issued by the Missionary Department of the International Sunday-school Association.

Leaflet No. 1, "How to develop the Missionary spirit and activity in the Sunday-school," is a general leaflet designed for General Secretaries, whether of state, province, county or city, and for Sunday-school workers interested in the subject of missions in the local school, such as Superintendents of the Missionary Department, Chairmen of Missionary Committees, etc., etc.

Leaflet No. 2, "Missionary Books for Sunday Schools," contains a list of missionary books and considerable valuable information in regard to their use. This leaflet is issued jointly by our Association and the Young People's Missionary Movement, the Board of which has formally recommended the list of books mentioned in the leaflet. It is not claimed that this is a complete list of missionary books, but it has been selected with great care by Dr. Delavan L. Pierson, Managing Editor of Missionary Review of the World. The leaflet has been nearly six months in preparation, and much valuable time has been put upon it.

These leaflets may be procured from the International Sunday School Association, with the imprint of the Association or publishing house ordering them printed in the blank space at the bottom of the first page. They are sent prepaid at the following prices:

Missionary Leaflet No. 1, per thousand, prepaid $6.00
Missionary Leaflet No. 2, per thousand, prepaid 8.00

Less than 100 copies of either may be had for 1c each.

Address International Sunday School Association, 805 Hartford Bldg., Chicago, Ill. Marion Lawrence, General Secretary.

It will mean much for our work if all our state Bible school workers will supply themselves with these leaflets for distribution to all our schools. Superintendents and teachers might well get these copies to study. Let us all work together to develop the missionary knowledge and activity of our schools.

BUSY DOCTOR
Sometimes Overlooks a Point.

The physician is such a busy man that he sometimes overlooks a valuable point to which his attention may be called by an intelligent patient who is a thinker.

"About a year ago my attention was called to Grape-Nuts by one of my patients," says a physician of Cincinnati.

"At the time my own health was bad and I was pretty well run down, but I saw at once that the theories behind Grape-Nuts were sound and that if the food was all that was claimed, it was a perfect food.

"So I commenced to use Grape-Nuts with cream twice a day and in a short time I began to improve in every way and I am now much stronger, feel better and weigh more than ever before in my life.

"I know that all of this good is due to Grape-Nuts and I am firmly convinced that the claims made for the food are true.

"I have recommended, and still recommend, Grape-Nuts to a great many of my patients with splendid results, and in some cases the improvement of patients on this fine food has been wonderful.

"As a brain and nerve food, in fact, as a general food, Grape-Nuts stands alone."

Inman at Vincennes

For nearly three years S. G. Inman has been the Living Link Missionary of the C. W. B. M. of the First Christian Church of Vincennes. The society had selected Brother Inman as its representative, though not a single member of the church had ever seen him. But we all felt that we were acquainted with him in the spirit, even if we had never seen him in the flesh. Not only the society that supports him, but the whole church, has been anxiously waiting the time when he, whom we had not seen, and yet loved, might be in our midst. Last week this great pleasure came to us unexpectedly. A message from Brother Inman stated that he was at St. Louis and that he would be with us on the next day. It made us all glad. The first evening that he was with us was the regular prayer-meeting. On the next evening the Young Ladies' Mission Circle had arranged for a program to be given in the church, at which a reception was tendered him. To make a long story short, we just all fell desperately in love with Brother Inman. His coming was one of great blessing to us. We are still rejoicing in the great good that he accomplished while in our midst. He is one who comes in the fullness of spiritual power.

He is to be with us again before he returns to Mexico. He is to be the speaker at the Knox County Annual Meeting. The meeting is to be held in the Fair Grounds. We are looking forward to making it easily the greatest gathering of Disciples of Christ that was ever held in the Cradle of the Old Northwest Territory, Vincennes, the home of Alice. The meeting is to be held on the first Sunday in August. William Oeschger.

The Hypnotic Principle in Revivalism

Revival Music and the Method of Public Commitment—Our Analytic Study Continued

It will be recalled by those who are thoughtfully following with us that our last study was a partial analysis of the method of revivalism. We found the distinctive power of the revivalist to lie in his possession of the art of controlling a congregation as a whole.

We described certain devices of a typical revival in order to ilustrate the essentially hypnotic character of it. The device of voting the people up and down, the device of leading the individual from one slight step to succeeding steps of increasing importance without his intelligent consent, the policy of abuse in preaching, and the activity of the "personal workers" were shown to be methods of breaking down individuality and merging each separate will into the will of the crowd under the control of the evangelist.

Let us continue our analysis of the revival apparatus, considering just now the use made of song in the revival service.

Song is one of the highest expressions of the worshipping impulse. In modern revivalism it has a preëminent place.

But the typical revivalist uses music not as a genuinely spiritual exercise, but as a means of getting the congregation in his control.

As a genuinely spiritual exercise music will concern itself with consciousness; its words and its melody will call for distinct mental effort, and the soul will be rewarded in the degree that it has been quickened into thoughtfulness by this act of worship.

In a word, music to be religious must have meaning.

In the matter of music as in every characteristic item of revivalistic method the object aimed at is not the increase and enlargement of consciousness, but the reduction, the erasure, of it.

The typical evangelist does not use the song service as a means of worship, but as a means of manipulating the audience into a suggestible state of mind for the preacher to move. The music, therefore, is a part of the mechanism of hypnotic control.

The singer claps his hands, jumps, shouts, jokes and cracks puns. Often he capriciously changes the rythm of the song for the sake of producing a certain confusion and stirring up of the feelings. Toward the close of the sermon he sits in a tension waiting for the preacher to pull the trigger when he and his choir let go "Just as I am" as if it were shot out of a gun.

It is an inviolable rule of revivalism that the invitation song must fit on to the last word of the sermon, like the crack fits the snapper of the whip.

The relatively unspiritual character of the revivalistic method is disclosed in the sensitiveness of the revivalist at just this point. What he is trying to do is to get the hearer to fix his mind upon just one thing—he does not want him to think, to see his life broadly. The revivalistic purpose at this point is to narrow consciousness, to confuse it and commit it into the control of the preacher. The hearer must be made to see that altar, or that front seat, and nothing else.

There must, therefore, be no interspaces in the service, no waiting, no break down of the tension. And the singing evangelist with his well-trained choir makes this possible.

The hypnotic principle in typical revivalism is revealed not only by the methods of the singing manipulator, but by the character of the songs themselves.

Revivalism is responsible for the debauching of our church music. It has little use for the great hymns of the church, the hymns that mean something to the soul. These have for the most part been laid aside and in their places many churches are using a trashy, inane, sentimental and sacharine sort of songs which violate not only good taste, but degrade the spiritual life itself.

If the singing evangelist knows the good hymns at all he knows that they are utterly alien to the atmosphere of the typical revival.

Let him announce, "O Love That Will Not Let Me Go," or "Lead Kindly Light," or "O Holy Savior, Friend Unseen," or any other hymn that has structure in its music and rich meaning in its poetry, and it will be disclosed how uninspiring this master-music is to a congregation debauched with revivalistic melodies.

The fact that revivalism depends for its effectiveness upon a type of music lacking both literary and harmonic character strongly suggests the truth of our thesis: that the principle upon which revivalism proceeds is primitive and hypnotic, not spiritual; that instead of establishing a perception of spiritual truth, it succeeds by manipulating feelings and impulses.

Finally, if we are to complete our analysis of revivalistic apparatus we must consider the device for public commitment.

The Disciples of Christ have from the earliest days been most sensitive to the things that happened after the sermon was ended.

Much of the point of our message until very recent times lay in its criticism of the common practices of our neighbor churches in leading their converts to public commitment.

Our opposition to the "mourners' bench" was due to the false theology implied in the scenes that took place there.

Our teaching that the sinner has no need to wait and agonize, that he may claim the promises of forgiveness and the Holy Spirit upon his obedience to Christ's commands, came like a shaft of light to those minds muddled by the mysticism of a half century ago.

Today the older conceptions against which the Disciples protested in their opposition to the "mourners' bench" practices have become obsolete. But the "mourners' bench" principle is just as objectionable as it ever was, though on other grounds.

It is of a piece with the general revivalistic scheme of reaching men by manipulation rather than by teaching them the truth Christ lived by.

As it is operated in highly emotional revivals the "mourners' bench" is an abuse of the inner rights of personality. It stands for confusion of mind, not for clearness of perception.

We have observed it in operation many times. We have seen seekers go to the altar attended by a large number of "workers." A great company packed itself into the little space about the altar. Prayers and conversation and song were carried on simultaneously.

To a man looking on and retaining his cool, out-of-door judgment and feeling, the impression could not be evaded that a stimulus was being brought to bear upon the "seekers" that was essentially hypnotic and forced, and which led often to the avowal of an experience which was nothing more nor less than a physical or emotional excitement due to the artificially arranged propinquity of the closely wedged company.

An "experience" gotten under such abnormal conditions with such undue excitement and confusion is certainly not much like the experience Christ created in the souls of those he sought to save.

Of a piece with the "mourners' bench" device is the method of the "Inquiry room."

In theory the "Inquiry room" is one of the most logical and fitting methods a spiritual evangelism could devise. The sermon being ended and the crowd gone, it is singularly appropriate that those should remain whose souls have been awakened by the message and inquire for further light on their inner personal problems.

But in usual practice the "Inquiry room" only confounds the confusion of the prior service. That problems can be really faced and solved in the overcharged atmosphere of such a service is extremely unlikely. The conditions for consummating the hypnotic control begun in the larger service are ideal.

Against this whole procedure the protest of the Disciples of Christ is even more pertinent today than it was a half century ago. Their plain method of inviting their hearers simply to "come forward" and make the good confession, without any other machinery of control, stamps their past evangelism with a wholesomeness all too uncommon among other Christian bodies.

If the later development of evangelism among us departs from this traditional respect for the personal intelligence of its hearers, one of our most distinctive excellences has been sacrificed.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

FIGHT HERESY—MAKE HERETICS

If heresy, whether religious or economic, were to choose a means of propoganda it could not favor one more powerful than the customary means used to combat it. Heretics are usually impersonal in their methods while he customary heresy hunter is violently personal. A Baptist minister, a sincere opponent of Professor Foster, deplores the whole effort to unseat him because it "has sold more of his books than any means he could ever have used." The teutonic mind loves fair play and is not won to the logic of personalities and epithets. They are the last recourse of small minds and if large minds stoop to use them they are classed as small and held in contempt by a less interested and fair-play loving public. When Debs is found to be a passionate lover of his kind and a self-sacrificing humanitarian, those who have condemned him with uncontrolled temper have made friends for his cause. Humor, good-nature, impersonal logic, and a fraternal spirit are the most effective weapons in controversy.

A MARTYR MIGHTIER THAN AN ARMY

"For ten years," says Tolstoi, "I have been trying to get the Russian government to hang me." "We are not such fools" replies a cabinet minister. The dying old saint is mightier than an army. To lay hand upon him would blow embers into flame in Russia that would be greater manace to the beaurocracy than any uprising they have faced. So too does police interference with free speech most effectively deepen and spread sympathy with anarchists and socialists or any other propaganda. Emma Goldman's best emmisaries are the fool police. No one ever heard Emma Goldman advocate the red hand. Her type of anarchy is quite mild. The police destroy a much more fundamental law when they deny her free speech than she does by any speech she can make. It is bad policy to try to sit on the safety valve of free speech. Repression of socialism in Germany makes tens of thousands of the soldiers themselves socialistic sympathizers, and many of them avowed socialists. Free men do not take kindly to arbitrary "thou shalt nots" unless they see it leveled against crime. The quickest way to enthrone a demagogue is to make him a martyr. What then will martyrdom do for sincere souls, who whether right or wrong in their systems, plead them for humanity's sake?

THE REFORMER'S SHAME HIS REAL GLORY

Tom Johnson once declared he was not a reformer. Many a real reformer has sought to deny his supreme title. He has feared the jibe against his Nazareth. He knows the multitude of hair-brained, the eccentric, the fervently biased, the demagogic, the one-sided and he fears the generic term. Then he must deny himself classification with the opposite kind, for there will be found the avaricious, misanthropic, the maters of their kind, the birds of prey, and the plutocratic horde of "help yourself and let the devil take the hindmost" kind. The jibe of "Nazarene" is glorified in its bearer and many a term of derision has become a diadem of glory. The true reformer is the only man that keeps step with the process of the suns. He alone "thinks God's thoughts after Him." The spirit of things is onward and upward. He who leads in the breaking of those ancient customs that have solidified around and the spirit and imprisoned it re-forms the body to the needs of the enlarging soul. His age may cling to the creed and the custom and defame him as an enemy of his kind, but time sees him emerge from the obscure minority and his host grow as an army out of the night.

THE "COURAGE OF THE COWARD"

Dr. Aked has coined a rare phrase. He talks of the "courage of the coward." It is the courage of those who are formally and harmlessly upright and for the right when the strongest batallions are on that side. They await the call of a great leader before they take up arms. Their courage is a hidden virtue until the cause is on the way to win. They are always personally good, but socially not so good. They think it cannot be done. They accept things as they are until a multitude are ready to act and then they furnish the second and third corps of volunteers. They cling to the old party and support the leader though he be a knave, until a new and virile leader arises to use the party machinery to further the cause of reform. Then they worship before him and follow him to the death. They are hero worshipers. Theirs is the psychology of the crowd even for personal action. Through them Ireland wins land relief at the hands of Toryism because radicalism made them afraid, but brought them to face the question. Through them Roosevelt impales the "rich malefactor" on his "spear" though populism made the phrase and started the revolt. Because of them Luther clung to the Princes and denied the Peasants that he might win the fight for his theology by the powers-that-be. The "courage of the coward" is majority courage. It is the courage of the minority that leads the world and rules finally in the destinies of democracy and indeed of all mankind. But by the courage that awaits for majorities things are made effective in their own time and conserved thus safely for all times.

HUMANITY'S SILENT FOE

In these days of wireless, smokeless, noiseless, etc., there is also the silent foe of humanity, the dreaded germ. And greatest of all his tribe is that of tuberculosis. It has well deserved the title of the Great White Plague. Bubonic takes its multitude in a spectacular way and thus strikes terror. Yellow Fever sends whole populations scurrying from the scenes of infection and the national government makes its prevention a matter of momentous concern, even going to remote harbors to clean out all source of infection and entering into compacts with nations in zones native to it not to allow clearing papers in any time when these is the least suspicion of its existence. Yet in 115 years the Yellow Plague has killed but 115,000, while every year the White Plague kills 200,000 in United States alone, while not less than 1,500,000 are its victims throughout the world. From 1904 to 1908 it killed three times as many in this nation as did the civil war in a like time by wounds in battle.

This Silent Foe is a little germ that gains entrance to the human body through breathing more often than otherwise. He is but one ten thousands by one one hundred thousandth of an inch in size, but he does not live long alone. He may come also through wounds or food and once he is immured he builds about himself a little bulb or tuber (hence his name), and when his house is full bursts its walls and looses the deadly virus that brings death. He swarms to form other tubers or bulbs and send again and again the deadly poison into the system until the poor victim is in the grave. He favors the lungs, but is no respecter of places and will thrive in the bones even and create hip lisease, tubercular joints and deadly tissue diseases. He is not without enemies else we should all soon be in his death grip. The white blood corpuscles do valiant battle with him. They grapple with him and hasten to the fray and the success of their batle depends upon the aid given them. If they are provided with rest for the physic, pure air and that greatest foe of all disease germ life—sunshine—they stand good chances of routing the virulent enemy and saving the life of their poor victim. The best form of battle is that of prevention. Why should not the nation do as much as it has done for the more spectacular plagues and calamities? When Messina crashes its ruins upon 200,000 poor unfortunates we hasten with near a million for her relief. Yet every year this Silent Foe takes 200,000 right from our midst. The specialists tell us that $40,000,000 scattered over a few years time will reduce its danger to a minimum. One out of every ten die through it and in the best years of young maturity, from twenty to forty-five, every third death is by its poison. Prevention is the only royal road to final defeat of it. Do away with the deadly tenement, prevent dust in factories, isolate the infected. The war cry of the hosts that are volunteered against it is "It is communicable, preventable, curable."

Gladstone defined the best work of statesmanship as that of guaranteeing the public health. Greater than building navies or even than endowing universities is the work of saving the tubercular stricken population and preventing its future menace to millions. In the south one-half of all adult negroes die of it and whole Indian tribes have been practically destroyed by it. It is most deadly to the race in its first afflictions with it. The Jews have known it for 3,000 years and have so fortified their physic against it that they resist it most successfully of all our people.

The outlook is most hopeful. We know the lair of the enemy, the manner of his fighting, and understand his strategy. We know also the most effective weapons and are awake to the dangers of the peace of inactivity. We are no longer hopeless as when we considered the disease inheritable and incurable. We now know he is neither. A weak system may be inherited and the child may seem to have inherited what in reality he has received through contact in the home. Modern out-door treatment has cured as high as 85 per cent of all cases treated. Philanthropy is enlisted. Information is becoming wide-spread. The alarm is sounded. Public spirit is awaking to the cause. Ere long it may be considered as important as the tariff schedule on gloves and hosiery, and the mothers of the land will petition congress by the millions for a national grapple with the Humanity's Silent Foe.

THE "GOLDEN RULE" POLICE FORCE

The City of Cleveland has adopted a "Golden Rule Policy" for its police force. Force and the mailed fist is supposed to be a police necessity. In Cleveland they are trying a modified form. They take the juvenile offender home before they take him to the police court or lock-up; they reason with ill-temper and inflamed passion, instead of aggravating it with a "billie"; they hide the title and hard hand of authority when they deal with an offender and make it a case between man and man; they act in the belief that many a first offender is a victim of a distemper and not necessarily a hardened criminal; they are sure of discriminating evidence before they lock up a man and mere suspicion is poor warrant; the man whose character is not known to be bad is given the benefit of the doubt and searching inquiry made before he is accused. The idea is not leniency with crime, but with persons of unfortunate circumstance and to be sure you are right before you go ahead. Arrests amount to but one-third what they did and the Chief says it is good.

Editorial

Most of the members of Professor Price's Palestine Travel Study class have returned to America. Mr. Edward A. Henry reached Chicago last week and reported a most delightful and profitable time. The party was in Constantinople during most of the events which marked the almost bloodless revolution in Turkish politics. Mr. Henry will contribute to the columns of The Christian Century some articles descriptive of the work of the class in Palestine.

The past few days have marked the gathering of the International Christian Endeavor Convention at St. Paul, Minnesota. We shall present reports of the convention later on. It promises to be a very notable gathering. Later in the year the world convention of Christian Endeavor will be held in Agra, India, and many representatives of the movement will make the pilgrimage from America to be present.

Our entertaining contemporary, the Christian Standard, having suffered of late a series of notable failures in its editorial attempts to run the brotherhood, is now engaged in an attempt to reëstablish its prestige by attacking the proposed Brotherhood Publishing House. In a swagger editorial or two it walks up defiantly to said proposed Publishing House and brandishes its sword in the air. Said House does not make any motion either of fear or defense, whereupon the Standard will issue forth with a triumphant flourish and say, "We saved the Brotherhood from being victimized by the stockholders of a certain privately-owned newspaper. We killed the Brotherhool Publishing House." All of which will gain applause for this brave knight from those who do not know that said proposed Brotherhood Publishing House was dead before the Standard made its attack!

The Foreign Society has a way of laying its hand upon the very ablest men of the brotherhood, and impressing them into the service of world-wide missions. Its latest acquisition is that of Rev. E. W. Allen, of Wichita, Kansas. Mr. Allen will be added to the secretarial forces of the society, establishing, as we understand, western headquarters at Kansas City, where he will have charge. This means both extensive and intensive growth. The new secretary has proved himself a missionary leader of the first order. His pastoral ministry has borne rich fruitage both in the development of missionary sentiment and in generous giving to the great cause. The past year his church at Wichita gave $3,000 as its Centennial offering to the treasury of the Foreign Society. The Christian Century congratulates the society and the brotherhood on securing Mr. Allen for this work, and adds its prayers to those of all lovers of the cause for his success.

The foolishness of the "trial sermon" method of securing a pastor for a vacant pulpit was well illustrated in the case of Dr. Marcus Dods, who recently passed away. No less than twenty-three churches refused him as minister. Finally he was called to the Renfield Free Church, in Glasgow, where he remained for twenty-five years. We commend those churches of our brotherhood which, like the Jackson Boulevard Church, Chicago, have moved forward from the cruder method to one more just to the preacher and more satisfactory to the church. In the church just mentioned a minister was called to supply the pulpit immediately after Mr. Stockdale's death. He has been in his place as supply every Sunday since. Meantime the committee has been actively at work, in those ways which a witful committee can devise, getting what they call a "line" on this man and that. There is no method that guarantees a pastoral "fit" but there is no method more prolific of misfits than the sample sermon method.

A number of the Chicago Disciples are leaving for Pentwater, Michigan, where they now have or are soon to build summer homes in Campbell Park. This strip of territory lies north of the channel, along Lake Michigan, and some ten minutes walk from the town of Pentwater. It is a beautiful park with all the natural advantages of that fascinating section of the eastern lake shore. It is a Disciples' rendezvous, named for the great men, Alexander and Thomas Campbell, whose names are inseparably connected with the origins of this movement. The avenues, which follow the natural undulations of the Park, are named after some of the leaders in our history, such as Stone, Scott, Pendleton, Errett, Proctor, Burgess, Garfield, and Garrison. Several cottages have already been built and others are under way or planned. Campbell Park is about a mile and a half north of Dr. Garrison's park on the south Pentwater beach, and the growth of these two communities in this delightful spot on the great lake insures for Pentwater a large summer population of Disciples.

The excitement regarding Professor Foster's views and utterances still continues in certain circles in this city. It has been chiefly promoted by the activities of Rev. Johnston Myers, of the Emmanuel Baptist Church, who has lost no opportunity of denouncing Professor Foster first as an atheist and then with delightful inconsistency, as a Unitarian. Which of these terms Mr. Myers regards as the most condemnatory it will be perhaps difficult to decide. It will be remembered that during the recent Congress of Baptists, Free-Baptists, and Disciples, Professor Foster handled in a free and trenchant manner the subject of religious therapeutics to which Mr. Meyers and his church have devoted considerable energy during the past year. The present controversy gives Mr. Myers a fine chance for a return of courtesies. Professor Foster, meantime, has contributed to The Standard a definite statement of his belief in the divinity of Christ, the efficacy of prayer, and other doctrines with whose denial he was charged by Mr. Myers and other zealous opponents. A number of the leading Baptist churches of the country have signified not so much their approval of Dr. Foster's views as their disapproval of the campaign of denunciation to which he has been subjected, by inviting him to occupy their pulpits. At present he is supplying the pulpit of the leading Baptist church in Grand Rapids, Michigan.

At a recent meeting of the ministers of a leading religious denomination of Chicago, when the latest and much talked of book of Professor Foster was under discussion, a prominent minister from the Baptist Ministers' Association was called upon. In a speech that extended beyond the allotted time, he delivered his tirade against the theological teachings of the ex-member of the Baptist Association, and closed with the statement that it was his opinion that Dr. Foster had "dashed this book off in thirty days" because he saw that it was the "psychological moment" to get it well advertised. The preachers who felt this speech to be a defense of their theological holdings, applauded. Those preachers who opposed the statement of the visiting minister attacked his theological assumptions. But a layman who was present asked the privilege of speaking. He raised his voice not against the theological teachings of Professor Foster, nor against those who opposed the professor's work, but against the unbrotherliness, the injustice, of the speaker in accusing the author of the book under discussion of insincerity, protesting with all the force of his manhood against pronouncing such judgment upon any man's motives. The preachers had an eye for the theological error; the layman saw the moral error. The preachers sought correctness of dogmatic statement; the layman sought fairness and justice. There is danger still that the ecclesiastic shall strain at the gnat and swallow the camel.

The Commercial Association of Chicago has issued its plan for the beautification of the city, on which a special committee has been working for several months past. The chairman of the committee is Architect Burnham, and the result is a fascinating prophecy of what Chicago may become in future years. The plan contemplates the improvement of the lake shore from Winnetka to South Chicago in such a manner as to make it not only more serviceable but artistically satisfying. Michigan Avenue, which is undoubtedly destined to be one of the foremost avenues in the world, likewise received special treatment in this plan upon lines already begun in the creation of Grant Park, of which the new Field Columbian Museum is to be the central feature and the Crerar Library and Art Institute auxiliary items. The central municipal square is to be located on the west side at the intersection of West Congress and Halsted Streets and contemplates a magnificent complex of buildings for official use surrounding the great public squares. The Association of Commerce, which is Chicago's foremost business organization, has just completed plans and raised funds for its palatial home in the business district. The influence of the organization upon the business and civic life of Chicago has already been very valuable and its plan for boulevards, municipal buildings, and the beautification of the city is another of the great enterprises set forward in the course of its history.

In some quarters of the brotherhood the commendation of a Methodist preacher might be regarded as rather dubious praise. But to us the following letter is comforting and stimulating. The writer is pastor of the First M. E. Church in one of the largest cities of Illinois. His judgment on our Revival studies reflects, we believe, an increasing body of sentiment among Methodist ministers to whom the illusion and inadequacy of much of their traditional evangelism is becoming apparent. A portion of his letter follows:

"Editors of The Christian Century:

"Dear Sirs and Brothers—I have been taking your paper in order that I might form an estimate of your policy. My satisfaction with it has been great. I admire your courage, rare indeed anywhere in journalism, which enables you to frankly assume to give unequivocal expression to your convictions. And your convictions seem to me to be based upon calm, scientific judgment. I refer to your recent editorials on revivals as characteristic utterances. My feeling is that we permit a small and vehement minority in our churches to dominate over and in a sense bully the reasonable, open-minded, and no less conscientious majority. That majority for the most part appears willing to remain silent or to suffer accommodation to enter into the expression of its opinions rather than to arouse the hostility of the before-mentioned minority. You for one, however, have resolved to speak. Your speaking will encourage others. Your paper is a sign of a better day for rational and vital religion."

Since the organization of the Northern Baptist Convention, a year ago, great progress has been made in the unifying of the enterprises of that denomination. Like the Disciples of Christ they have long tolerated a loose-jointed scheme of missionary organization. With the formation of their new convention, however, they undertook to bring the missionary societies into closer unity. An estimate of the amounts required for the several societies was agreed upon and the total apportioned among the various states represented in the convention. Each state appointed a committee to apportion its amount among the churches within its borders. Despite the fact that the apportionment was nearly six months late in reaching the churches the collections for all the societies were the largest in their history. The plan leaves each local church free to devise any method it may wish in raising its apportionment, whether by separate collections for each society, or by the so-called "omnibus plan." Baptists at the Portland Convention, held two weeks ago, were enthusiastic for the new order. In line with this movement the recent joint campaign of the Congregational missionary organizations, home and foreign, for the paying of debts amounting to nearly $300,000 is significant. Instead of appealing each on its own merits, a joint appeal was made to the denomination, resulting, up to last week, in a collection of a sum sufficient to pay the debts and make a fair start toward the surplus of $200,000 asked for. Among Presbyterians the question of unifying the various missionary societies will not down, despite the fact that their committee, appointed two years ago, reported to the General Assembly last May that legal obstacles stood in the way of such a step. Manifestly the trend of sentiment is toward the simplification of the mechanism of missions.

At the meeting of the Pan-Presbyterian council held in New York City last month, ancient and modern came together in interesting contrast. The modern was a paper on "The Higher Criticism Since the Last Council," by Professor George L. Robinson. The author assumed that criticism of the scriptures is necessary. "No one," he said, "attempts to defend the old position in every detail. This simply cannot be done; modern criticism has made it impossible." While Professor Robinson's view in respect of particular problems was conservative, it is not a long time since his frank adoption of the critical position as a method would have stirred a great commotion in any Presbyterian gathering. In contrast with this modern spirit stood the council's custom of limiting all its singing to the Psalms. This was meant as a kindly concession to the psalm-singing churches in the Council. The Interior (Chicago), has grown impatient with this kind of toleration and points to it as one cause of the flabbiness and disappointment of the great gathering. "The custom," it says, "of reducing the praise services of the council to the limitations of the scruples of the weakest consciences in the family grows too ridiculous to be called religious toleration when in great Fifth Avenue church, with a silenced organ, a congregation drawls painfully through a dismal tune that nobody knows, singing these impossibly awkward words—in that time and place as meaningless as abracadabra:

"In Ephraim's and Benjamin's
And in Manasseh's sight,
Oh, come for our salvation;
Stir up thy strength and might."

"As one drags through the winding maze of 'sal-va-she-un' the 'im-pres-she-un' grows on one that it must be just as pleasing to the Lord to have people sing sense as to have them pray, preach and talk sense in his house of worship. Certainly the greatness of Presbyterianism has in no case arisen from either preaching, praying or singing words which did not have a meaning for the very hour and occasion where they were used."

This week there is held at Chautauqua, New York, the tenth meeting of the Council of Religious Education. The week is given over to the work of the Religious Education Association with daily addresses and conferences. This is in close connection with the first meeting of the Sunday-school Commission of the Religious Education Association and the meeting of the joint committee of the Federal Council of Churches on week-day religious instruction. The morning conferences are to be held in the Hall of Philosophy and are to consider the following themes: Monday, "The Use of the Bible in the home," by Professor I. F. Wood, of Smith College; Tuesday, "Children's Religious Ideas and Prayers," by Rev. Lester Bradner, of Providence; Wednesday, "Preventative and Corrective Control in the Home," by President Frank K. Sanders; Thursday, "The Cultivation of the Social Spirit in Children," by Ernest Hamlin Abbott of the Outlook; Friday, "Story-telling to the Children," by Dr. R. H. Hodge of Columbia. In the afternoon addresses are to be given in the amphitheatre under the general subject, "The Development of Character Under Present Conditions." On Monday, Professor George A. Coe, of Union Theological Seminary, will speak on "Character Development Through the Colleges and Universities." On Tuesday Professor Clyde W. Votaw, of the University of Chicago, speaks on "Character Development Through the Public Schools." On Wednesday Professor Edwin D. Starbuck, of the University of Iowa, speaks on "Character Development Through the Sunday-school." On Thursday Professor Herbert L. Willett, of the University of Chicago speaks on "Character Development Through the Church." On Friday Dr. George J. Fisher, of New York, will speak on "Character Development Through Social and Political Achievement," and on Saturday Mr. Henry F. Cope of Chicago speaks on "Character Development Through Social Living." The Sunday-school Commission, appointed at the last annual convention of the R. E. A. and consisting of twenty-one members, to report to the next convention at Nashville, will hold its first session on Thursday and Friday. The specific topic of discussion will be "The Aim, Content, and Method of the Sunday-school Curriculum for the Early Adolescent Years." On Tuesday and Wednesday the Council will hold special executive sessions to consider the subject, "What Division of Responsibility is to be Made Between the School and the Church in respect to the Education of the Young?"

Treasured Prayers of the Old Testament

Beyond all other parts of the Old Testament the Book of Psalms is the record of the holy life. It is a rich treasury of the prayers and praises of the great spirits who lived as in the Great Taskmaster's eye, and died in faith. It is a mine of silver and gold, richer than Golconda. It is a flowing fountain of eternal youth, like the gushing springs of Lebanon. It is a firmament where one star indeed differeth from another star in glory, but all shine with undimmed lustre after many centuries. These unknown singers of the early years have made us feel the fervor and the passion that thrilled their souls. The harmonies to which they sung these hymns have perished in all but name. No score records the music of "al tasketh," of "the life of testimony," of "the hind of the morning," or of "the silent door from far away." But the stately, beautiful, searching and inspiring language of the Psalter has woven itself into all the liturgies and made its impress upon all the hearts of Christendom.

If there was a loss of sentimental satisfaction in breaking from the absurd Jewish tradition that "the Psalms were written by David with the help of the ten Patriarchs, Adam, Enoch, Noah, Melchizedek, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, and the three sons of Korah," not less has been the feeling of regret that the relation of David himself to this great Hebrew hymn-book of the later temple service was less dominating than tradition long insisted. But with this discovery has come a corresponding gain. It is now possible to find in the variety and richness of the Psalms, scattered as they are seen to be, over many centuries, and emerging from many different hearts in Israel, the proof that the religious emotions and exalted thoughts which they express were not the dower of any one singer alone, not even of David, "the sweet singer of Israel," nor of any one class, not even the prophets. They sprang like flowers, nameless, from the rich soil of a national experience of God, and they were treasured by all who had attained like precious faith, because they set the music of devotion to the high words of passion and of power.

"Such songs have power to quiet the restless pulse of care;
And come like the benediction that follows after prayer."

Their commanding note is praise to God. In high and outbursting notes they tell of the glory of the Eternal.

"I will give thanks unto the Lord with my whole heart,
I will show forth all thy marvelous works,
I will be glad and exult in thee,
I will sing praise to thy name, O thou Most High." (9:1, 2.)

It is no feeling of duty, but the outfleeing joy of a free spirit which cries,

"I will bless the Lord at all times,
His praise shall continually be in my mouth,
My soul shall make her boast in the Lord,
The humble shall hear thereof and be glad,
O magnify the Lord with me,
And let us exalt his name together." (34:1-3.)

It is no formal utterance of conventional gratitude, but the high and spontaneous outgushing of fervid thankfulness which breathes through the familiar lines,

"Bless the Lord, O my soul
And all that is within me.
Bless his holy name.
Bless the Lord, O my soul
And forget not all his benefits."

"O give thanks unto the Lord, for he is good,
For his mercy endureth forever."

To such lovers of the Highest, all tunes are alike aflame with the divine presence. The long night watches, when sleep vanishes from wakeful eyes, the solemn splendor of the dawn, the blaze of noonday and the calm of twilight, are all fitting hours for speech with him, and meditation on his mercies,

"It is a good thing to give thanks unto the Lord
And to sing praises unto thy name, O Thou Most High,
To show forth thy loving kindness in the morning,
And thy faithfulness every night." (92:1, 2.)

"O Lord, in the morning shalt thou hear my voice,
In the morning will I order my prayer unto thee, and will keep watch." (5:3.)

"In peace will I both lay me down and sleep
For thou Lord, makest me dwell in safety." (4:8.)

"I laid me down and slept,
I awaked, for the Lord sustained me." (3:5.)

And the world on which they wakened was a world of God's making. There were the heights of Hermon and Carmel, the mountains which bowed themselves at his approval; there were the cedars of Lebanon which he had planted, where the birds made their nests; there were the springs far up in the hills, which ran down by the valleys, to give drink to every beast of the field. Yonder was the sea, great and wide, to which men went down to do business in great waters, and far out beyond the deeps of Jordan lay the vast stretches of the desert, where the tents of Kedar awaited the coming caravans. Above stretched the blue dome of the sky, that firmament which showed the handiwork of God, and whose glories of rising sun and setting moon uttered without speech or language the high praises of their kind.

Is it strange that the Psalmist felt the wonder of nature as the canvas on which the Great Artist had set his glory? The light of dawn revealed that splendor of the life of God, and made them lift their hearts in ecstacy at the thought of his presence. Not more majestic are the words of our later poets,

"Still, still with thee, when purple morning breaketh,
When the birds waketh, and the shadows flee,
Fairer than dawning, lovelier than the daylight
Comes the sweet consciousness, I am with Thee.

Alone with Thee, amid the mystic shadows,
The solemn hush of nature newly born,
Alone with Thee, in breathless adoration,
In the calm dew and freshness of the morn."

To the truly religious man in Israel,—such men as breathe their spirit in the Psalms,—God was the center of life. All their springs were in him. They knew no good beside Him. His house was their delight, to which they came remembering the multitude of his loving kindnesses. Of it they could say,

"Lord, I love the habitation of thy house,
And the place where thy glory dwelleth."
"How delightful are thy tabernacles, O Lord of hosts,
My soul longeth, yea even fainteth for the courts of the Lord.
My heart and my flesh cry out unto the living God." (84:1, 2.)

Here in the sanctuary doubt and trouble of soul flee away. The problem of the distracted heart, torn by the riddle of suffering and the triumph of evil, is admirably voiced in Psalm 73, on which Savanarola preached his great series of twenty-five Lenten sermons in 1496. It is the cry of a much tried soul, "My feet were almost gone; my steps had well-nigh slipped. For I was envious at the arrogant, when I saw the prosperity of the wicked. When I thought how I might know this, it was too painful for me, until I went into the sanctuary of God."

There he found peace in the larger vision of life, and cried at last with a restful sigh, "It is good for me to draw near unto God; I have made the Lord my refuge." (73 passim.)

Not less marvelous are the psalms of confession which have become the classics of penitence. The 51st and 32d Psalms are the world's confessional, in which burdened souls, to the end of time, will find set forth the sore and humbling agony of measured sin and the deep and solemn joy of penitence and pardon. Hear that very great and bitter cry, "Cast me not away from thy presence, and take not thy holy spirit from me," and doubt not that there are written, past all misreading, the words of one to whom the favor of God was more than life; to whom the horror of sin in its power to separate from Him was more awful than any punishments that followed after.

But all these sentiments of the Psalmists, the love of God's house, of his word, of his works, the sense of his father-love, inherited from the days gone by, the consciousness that he was the "God of their fathers known of old," and that he was their dwelling place in all generations, find their motive in a deeper passion to which they yield the supreme and central place in the hearts of the saints. That ruling element is the sense of God's reality and personal relation to the worshiper. The quest for God is the search for the highest good, a search that never is in vain,

"As the hart panteth after the water brooks,
So panteth my soul after thee, O God." (42:1.)

"O God, my God, early will I seek thee.
My soul thirsteth for thee, my flesh longeth for thee
In a dry and weary land where no water is,
My soul followeth hard after thee,
For thy loving kindness is better than life." (63.)

There was no doubt in the soul that could say,

"O taste and see that the Lord is good,
Blessed is the man that trusteth in thee." (34:8.)

The preacher of the divine presence has reached an exalted level in the life of the man who uttered those lofty words of the 16th Psalm:

"I have said unto the Lord, Thou art my God,
I have no good beyond thee."
"The Lord is the portion of mine inheritance and my cup.
I have set the Lord always before me,
Because he is at my right hand
I shall not be moved."

But the most exalted embodiment of this sense of the Divine is found in Psalm 139, in some regards the greatest in the Psalter. At first the thought of God's presence shadowed with a sense of alarm. There is no escape from those all-searching eyes. From those insistent and pursuing feet no terror can tend sufficient speed to fly, and no heights or depths afford refuge.

"Whither shall I go from thy spirit,
Or whither shall I flee from thy presence?
If I ascend up into heaven thou art there,
If I make my bed in 'Sheol,' behold thou art there."

But soon the fear of the divine pursuit dies away, absorbed in the trust of the comforted soul. Now there is a dawning joy in the thought of that unescapable power.

"If I take the wings of the morning,
And dwell in the uttermost parts of the sea,
Even there shall thy hand lead me, and thy right hand shall hold me."

At last comes the full joy of complete surrender to the pursuing love of God. The divine presence has become the chief delight of life,

"How precious are thy thoughts unto me, O God,
How great is the sum of them,
If I count them, they are more than the sand,
When I awake I am still with thee."

Here one reaches at last the shining levels of a living experience of God. To such an enriched soul, dowered with the chiefest joy of life, what word can paint the futility and folly of the man who denies God? There is but one sort of being who can say in heart, there is no God.

"Whoso hath felt the spirit of the Highest Cannot confound, nor doubt him nor deny,
Aye, with our voice, O world, though thou deniest,
Stand thou on that side, for on this am I,
Who that one moment has he least described him
Dimly and faintly, hidden and afar
Doth not despise all excellence beside him,
Virtues and powers that are not and that are.
Aye, among all men hold himself thereafter
Smit with a solemn and a sweet surprise,
Dumb to their scorn, and turning on their laughter
Only the dominance of earnest eyes."

And such is this sense of the presence of God that the lofty and serene soul by its passion triumphs over death. The doctrine of the future life is late and indistinct in the Old Testament. But so close is the presence of the Giver of life that death is held at bay, mastered, forgotten,

"Whom have I in heaven but Thee,
And there is none upon earth that I desire beside Thee,
Thou shalt guide me with Thy counsel
And afterward receive me in glory." (73:24.)

"Thou will not leave my soul to Sheol,
Neither will thou suffer thy holy one to see corruption.
Thou will show me the path of life,
In thy presence is fulness of joy,
At thy right hand there are pleasures forever more."

This needs but the quickening touch of Christ to bring life and immortality to light.

"I shall be satisfied when I awake unto thy likeness."

"So shall it be at last in that bright morning
When the soul wakens and earth's shadows flee,
O in that hour, fairer than daylight dawning
Shall rise the glorious thought, I am with Thee!"

An Old World Trip

By Rev. W. G. Ballantine

The mere start abroad is enough to set the blood tingling—the scene at the pier, the mammoth ship, the groups of interesting fellow travelers coming aboard with their luggage, the officers and stewards so smart in gold braid and brass buttons, the waving, weeping crowd on the wharf, the band playing,—and just outside the harbor the mysterious ocean and beyond that a wonder-world into which we are to be transferred. Old things are passing away; all things are becoming new. Kipling expresses the sentiment of starting:

"The Lord knows what we may find, dear lass,
And the deuce knows what we may do—
But we're back once more on the old trail, our own trail, the out trail, We're down, hull-down on the long trail—the trail that is always new!"

Crossing the Sea.

The crossing of the ocean has now been shorn of all its terrors and surrounded with all conceivable pleasures. Thirty-six years ago, when I first sailed from New York to Liverpool in the old Parthia, all ordinary people expected as a matter of course to be sick from one-third to one-half of the time, whatever the weather. The steamers were small and had no bilge keels, and so they rolled and pitched continually. There were hanging racks for all glasses and bottles and always raised edges to keep the dinner plates from sliding into your lap, as they incessantly tried to do. Today ordinary people never think of being sick, except in very rough weather, and things on the table do not in general slide about more than they do in the Cooley house.

I am speaking of the nine- or ten-day boats, broad, steady, quiet, safe. No one who wants to enjoy the ocean should take one of the fastest boats, narrow, unsteady, quivering from stem to stern with their gigantic engines, pounding the water like trip-hammers, roaring through the ocean solitudes and getting across in half the time, maybe, but missing most of what makes a sea voyage better than a railway journey. You must be long enough at sea and quiet enough to come under the spell of its silence and solitude and immensity. Only when alone on deck at night does one feel that:

"Peace beginning to be
Deep as the sleep of the sea
When the stars their faces glass
In its blue tranquility, of which Edwin Arnold sings.

Busy Idleness.

It is busy idleness on shipboard. I never can find time to read much. On this last voyage we had the full moon to make the nights romantic. There were gorgeous sunsets. Twice I rose and got up to the highest deck early enough to see the morning star and the rosy flush of dawn on the light clouds and the sun rise out of the ocean. At least an hour of the forenoon must be spent at the bow watching for flying fish to rise and skid away across the tumbling foam, and at night the phosphorescence must be watched there. Then there are spouting whales and leaping porpoises and occasional sharks and petrels and gulls, and distant liners and warships and fishing craft and sails of all sorts, not to speak of the clouds and the ever-changing colors of the water.

A summer day in midocean under the blue vault of heaven, in the center of the blue circle of the horizon, breathing crystalline air, lying around on deck in the sunshine or playing shuffle-board or ringtoss with charming women,—it is the perfection of vacation. I even played checkers. That eminent sociologist and author, Prof. Rauschenbusch, was on board. He is an enthusiast for the game. With him I played and he taught me this distich:

Count that day lost whose low descending sun
Sees no good deed, no game of checkers won.

Three Great Centers.

My thought in this last visit to Europe was to go and stay in the three chief centers of civilization, Berlin, Paris and London, and to form for myself an impression of what life means to the people of today.

Berlin has now 2,000,000 of inhabitants, and if the city limits were thrown out only a little wider it would be easy to count toward 3,000,000. Paris with its environs has considerably more than 3,000,000. London has 7,000,000. And these cities of what we absurdly style the "effete" old world are growing as fast as any American cities. Not into sky-scrapers, it is true, but in population and in splendid buildings, parks, avenues, subways, elevated roads, etc. Much of the most attractive portion of Berlin is less than fifteen years old.

Thirty-six years ago I made my first visit to the city. The new empire was then but a year and a half old. Germany was intoxicated with triumph and throbbing with the novel consciousness of unity and freedom and power to realize her ideals. Nearly forty years of uninterrupted peace have now passed and many of those wild hopes have materialized. Agricultural Germany has become covered with factory chimneys. Steamship companies, like the North German-Lloyd and the Hamburg-American line, carry the German flag into every sea. Luxury and splendor abound where simplicity and poverty dwelt. Quiet bucolic Berlin has become a cosmopolitan metropolis.

Like Imperial Rome.

One has somewhat the feeling in walking about in Berlin that a visitor must have had in ancient imperial Rome. Back of everything, underlying everything, dominating everything, one feels the invincible strength of the army. A single wave of the imperial hand could launch instantaneously a resistless host, every man of whom would know his exact duty. In England traditional policy keeps the army out of sight. In France one sees enough of slovenly red-trousered privates but rarely an officer, and there is nothing about the French army of today that stirs the imagination. In Berlin stately officers in immaculate uniforms and white gloves throng the streets. The poor sentinels that stand on guard before various public buildings have a nervous time of it and must keep their eyes rolling; for a failure to present arms to any single one of the officers passing in the throng on either sidewalk, or in the crush of autos and carriages going in both directions in the street, means three days in the guardhouse.

Whatever one may say of the folly and wickedness of war, it is undeniable that nothing but the development of the army and the fighting of victorious wars has made possible the progress first of Prussia and then of Germany as a whole. But for the Prussian army, reactionary Austria would still be predominant in a dismembered and impoverished Germany, which imperial France would still be bullying at her pleasure. Still it may be true that the army which was essential to progress so far is the very thing to be got rid of in order to nobler progress.

The Best Despotism on Earth.

Prussia is the most powerful and effective despotism now existing upon earth. It is the most benevolent and benignly paternal despotism that ever has existed. In Turkey and Russia the people have been exploited solely in the interest of the rulers. Not so in Prussia. The dearest object of the government is the welfare of the people down to the smallest child. Sanitation education, public welfare, public pleasure, are scientifically planned and provided and enforced with an intelligence and fidelity astonishing to Americans. Berlin is the cleanest city in the world,—far cleaner than Springfield. It has beautiful avenues, parks, flower gardens, and public buildings. There are public playgrounds for children. Statues abound everywhere. Art galleries and museums are numerous and free to the public. In the royal opera house the best operas are presented every night in the year, except for a short period in the summer. In the royal playhouse classical plays, often Shakespeare's, are put on in the highest perfection known to histrionic art. Shakespeare, by the way, is played more in Berlin than in any other city in the world. Besides the royal ones there are of course many other theaters and concert halls. Choice orchestral music may be heard whenever one wishes, and at ridiculously low prices. The public schools are examples to the world, and the university numbers 12,000 students, many from America. The shops, hotels and cafes of Berlin do not strike the traveler as inferior to those of Paris.

Yards of Red Tape.

All of this manifold life goes on under a police surveillance that is to us inconceivable. My family boarded during the year in three different quarters of the city and every time we moved an immense blank had to be filled out with particulars of our history. I had to write out my name, my mother's maiden name, my father's name and occupation, our ages, the birthplace of each of us, our income, and a number of other absurd trifles. These facts are all on permanent record in big books in three police offices in Berlin. Once I was sent for to come to the police headquarters of the precinct to fill in my wife's maiden name which had been accidentally omitted in one paper. A veritable army of officials in semi-military uniform who work very slowly, methodically and fussily, is employed in the government bureaux in keeping these ponderous sets of books.

Law Reigns.

In Berlin there is not only the sense of military power but also a consciousness that Prussia "expects every man to do his duty." Law reigns. There is officialism, red tape, —yes, but each does his duty. Like the centurion in the Bible, each is a man under authority having others under him and issuing orders that are obeyed. The children in the schools, the conductors and motormen on the trollies, the passengers,—everybody obeys. Things often move slowly, but move they must and move rightly. There is only one absolutely free place in Berlin and that is the university. There students are not required to study unless they wish to take degrees and the professors may believe and teach what they like.

When we went to Paris we found a free country. The police ignore the disorder that goes on. Take the matter of shaking rugs. Coffee and rolls are brought to your room and in the freshness of the summer morning you sit down at the open window to enjoy your breakfast. Suddenly a chambermaid on the floor above begins shaking her rugs out of her window, and before you can pull the sashes together your cream and coffee are spoiled. Why, in Berlin no girl would dare to shake a rug until after eight o'clock in the morning and then only in the courtyard downstairs on a designated day.

Big Hats in Front.

At the opera in Paris, women in big hats may sit in the front row and shut out the view of the stage from all behind. The victims scold and make hateful remarks, but cannot move the selfish and insolent ones in front. In Berlin no woman dares pass from the lobby into the audience room until she has checked her hat and wraps. It's a nice thing to live under a benevolent despotism if you are willing to do right. The Germans act better than Americans on many occasions from simple good sense and without being made to. It comes from their intelligence and refinement. This is strikingly evident at a concert. I compared the perfect silence of a German audience, so prompt, spontaneous and tranquil, with the tardy, fidgety, rebellious, effervescent half-suppression of an American crowd, and hung my head with shame.

Out of Life Get Pleasure.

The Germans in a good many ways get more happiness out of life as they go along than we do. Eating is an innocent pleasure, and they eat oftener and more. No one is required to get up for breakfast. There is never any formal family breakfast. Coffee and rolls are sent to your room or you can go into the dining-room and get them when you choose. Not having had breakfast enough, a German spends all the rest of the day in making up for it. At 10:30 or 11 everybody takes lunch. The laborers along the streets all stop to eat. And in general it may be said that in all places and at all hours it is good form and a matter of course to draw out a substantial sandwich of rye bread and raw ham and go to munching. Women do it at the opera. Students do it at the university between classes. Dinner comes at 2 o'clock. About 5 the maid brings to your room coffee and rolls and perhaps cake. At 8 p. m. is supper. There are innumerable restaurants all about the city and tens of thousands of people eat there sitting at little tables in the open air right by the sidewalk. After the day with all its cares and meals is over, it is a favorite custom to go to a restaurant and sit there for half the night eating and drinking and listening to music. No city in the world hears so much good music so cheaply as Berlin. And everybody who is anybody knows enough about music to talk with some intelligence.

Bad Spots in the Picture.

But, the picture which candor compels us to paint is not all bright. This military glory, this luxurious material civilization, this intoxication of national pride, these sensuous delights of music and art are themselves the causes of some of the plague spots in Germany's social life. Wherever there is an aristocracy of wealth there will be dreadful scandals shocking the moral sense of mankind. We know that in our New York and Pittsburg. All last year the Berlin papers were full of the terrible Harden case. You saw some of it in the American papers, but it concerned a distant country and you could not realize what it was to be where this fog of the inferno settled and stayed all winter, where the papers were reeking with the stench of it every morning and even the comic picture papers on the news-stands, seen by all of the children, found abundant material for wit and caricature in things that American men mention to each other only under their breath. The philosophic observer cannot feel that Germany has reached in any department of life a healthy equilibrium. The immense and costly army, the instrument of Germany's rise, threatens economic and moral ruin. The officers are restless, arrogant, dissolute. The poor working people impatient under intolerable taxation are fast going into socialism.

Germany, the land of song and sentiment, the land of fairy tales and social festivals, the land of mystic piety and encyclopedic learning, the land of patriotic sacrifice, will yet struggle away from sensuality and agnosticism, from militarism and bureaucracy and despotism, into the larger light and truer liberty.

For love and life and health and ease,
For work, success, and hope, for power to please,
For conscience clear, for faith without alloy,
For common share in common human joy,
I thank thee, gracious God!

For loneliness and shadow, sickness, care,
For failure, doubt, remorse, death and despair,
For sleepless nights, for aching heart and brain,
For common share in common human pain,
I thank thee, gracious God!

Progressive Principles of the Disciples

In a previous article the essential element of progress in a religious body was found in the principle of adaptation, the fitness for the time. A religious body, like a human being, that is out of harmony with its time, estranged from its mind and spirit, is a misfit; and a misfit is a failure. The most fatal thing that can be said of a man, a machine or an institution is that it is out of date. It is not criminal to be out of date, but just unfortunate. Nobody wants such a machine; nobody uses it. It does not get into the work of the world.

That is what happens to some religious bodies. Could anything be more fatal? The world can not, and does not use them. They are not adapted to its needs. And it is this that overtakes in their career some successful denominations. They succeed for a time because they meet the needs of the world, but when the needs change, as they always do in every generation, the denomination does not change to meet the new needs. They are not fre and not adaptable.

Are the Disciples Progressive?

The question which concerns us in this study is this: Do the Disciples possess in their spirit or principles the essential elements of future usefulness and progress? The world during the last century has called upon them for ever increasing service; hence their growth and progress. Do they give promise of making themselves useful to the world in the new conditions and needs arising at the opening of the second century of their history?

It seems to me that the Disciples do possess in their historic principles the essential elements of future progress.

Their Principle of Liberty.

First of all their principle of liberty.

There can be no progress without freedom. Every step forward in human progress has been marked by a new access of liberty. Fortunately enough the Disciples came into existence with the principle of liberty as one of their birth-rights. It is in this principle that they have always found unity in times of controversy and threatened dissension. When they have found it impossible to agree as to federation, higher criticism, or the centennial program, they have agreed from missionary secretaries and editors to the last member of the smallest church, that there should be liberty—that the man who objected to federation had the liberty to raise his objection, and the man who believed in it had the liberty to advocate it and work at it, but neither of them to make his opinion a condition of brotherly fellowship. How else could there be progress?

The Case of Federation.

There might be something good in this new thing, federation; or it might be all evil. How could the good be discovered, or the evil proved, if every one were forbidden to touch it, on pain of disfellowship.

Freedom secures that on the one hand no good shall be lost, and on the other hand, no evil left undiscovered. Freedom alone permits the disclosure of all things in their true nature, whether good or bad, true or false. A thing must be investigated and tried before it can be finally accepted as true or false. Many a new hypothesis or discovery has been demonstrated on paper by the religious editors to be false or impossible, and all further inquiry or trial forbidden—such as the rotundity of the earth or the revolution of the planets about the sun. Those hypotheses were false and dangerous when they were first propounded in the sixteenth century. Evolution and the higher criticism have taken their places in the twentieth century as objects of pious editorial horror and anathema. How shall we know whether evolution is true or false, or the higher criticism good or bad, if we are not free to investigate and try them? They may be as harmless and as innocent of infidelity as the Copernican system of astronomy. But we should never know if the papal and editorial prohibitions were obeyed. What a delightful would this would be, lapped in the motherly care of infallible popes and editors.

Had Franklin Prevailed!

If Pope Gregory the Great could have had his way the world would now be where it was in the eleventh century. If Benjamin Franklin could have had his way the Disciples of Christ would have been today where he wanted to strand them fifty years ago—starting their tunes with a tuning-fork and lining their hymns in the backwoods, and submitting these customs as evidences of their apostolicity. It is a good thing the Disciples were a free people. They went on past Franklin to organize missionary societies and now, at the close of a century, they can submit their mission stations and converts as evidences of a truer apostolicity.

Their Principle of Unity.

Their principle of unity is also a principle of progress. It has been the socializing principle of the movement. Without it the Disciples would have been shut up within themselves. But for this feeling of responsibility for the "other sheep" of Christ's fold—this feeling that they were but a few among the many other true followers of Christ—who can tell to what extremes of sectarian bigotry and exclusiveness they might have grown. Under the impulse of a desire for unity the Disciples have been taught not to look upon themselves alone, but upon others as well. It has taken them out of themselves in unselfish consideration of the other children in the family of God.

An Adaptive Principle.

But more especially as bearing upon the problem of progress the desire for unity has operated as an adaptive principle in the movement. In the beginning, under the impulse of this principle, the movement sought as its basis of fellowship, ground that was common to all the churches. It stood upon principles that were felt to be common to all. Its distinction lay, therefore, not in its differences from the other churches, but in its likeness to them in all essential respects. It sought agreement with all, not differences from them.

Not until the movement shifted its emphasis from unity to apostolicity did it find any value or take any pleasure in its "peculiarities" and "differences." The hope for unity was felt to lie in a principle of likeness. Thomas Campbell said in the Declaration and Address: "It is, to us, a pleasing consideration that all the Churches of Christ which mutually acknowledge each other as such, are not only agreed in the great doctrines of faith and holiness, but are also materially agreed as to the positive ordinances of the gospel institution; so that our differences, at most, are about the things in which the kingdom of God does not consist.'

A Departure.

It is to be regretted that the movement throughout its history did not take the same pleasure in its own agreement and likeness to other bodies that Thomas Campbell found in their agreement among themselves. He was not as fearful of concession to others as some of his disciples have been. He said: "We declare ourselves ready to relinquish whatever we have hitherto received as matter of faith or practice, not expressly enjoined in the word of God, so that we and our brethren might, by this mutual concession, return together to the original constitutional unity of the Christian Church, and dwell together in peace and charity." He was willing to give up something for the sake of unity. He was probably willing to please his denominational neighbor for his good unto edification. With him the basis of union was still an open question. He was still able to sit down with his religious neighbor and go over the whole question from the beginning, in the spirit of humility just as if it had not been settled once for all.

No Union Without Concession.

There never has been and there never will be a union among Christians without concessions on both sides. The religious body that is not ready to make concessions is not yet ready to enter into serious negotiations for union. The demands of both parties in a peace conference are always higher than either will consent to. If one is at the mercy of the other, then the concession will all be on one side. But if both really desire peace and unity, both will come in the spirit of compromise. The peace spirit is always the spirit of conciliation and reasonable concession. It is essentially adaptive and readjusting. There is more or less of the Pauline spirit of expediency in it. Paul was willing to become all things to all men, so that he might save some. He magnified the agreements and minimized the differences, as every lover of peace and unity is bound to do.

Loyalty a Conserving Principle.

But the adaptive principle of unity needs a counterbalancing principle to save it from its enemies—a principle of loyalty, which has been present in the movement from the beginning.

Unity calls for both liberty and loyalty, and in the history of the Disciples it has gravitated between them. Loyalty is the spirit of conservatism in the movement which has held it to certain fixed principles and doctrines, and has saved it from dissipation. It has made it the militant force that it has been among the denominations, has drawn the boundaries more sharply around the body and emphasized the differences with others. It has enabled it to hold all the ground it has won, and make sure of losing none of it before moving on.

All these elements are essential to progress—liberty, unity and loyalty—and they have been combined in a rare degree in the spirit and position of the Disciples.

Gipsy Smith's Impression of America

Calls His Campaign the Greatest of His Life—Thinks American Churches Behind England in Down-Town Work.

(From an Interview in the London Sunday-School Chronicle.)

Gipsy Smith had a great welcome home on Monday evening in London, on his return from a most successful ten months' mission in America. A series of receptions, planned by the Free Church Council, took place in Westminster Chapel, and these were very largely attended.

The evangelist was looking remarkably well; indeed, in conversation with our special commissioner he confessed that he had never felt more fit at the close of an extended mission. "My campaign in America," he continued, "has been an exacting one, but it has been the greatest event of my life. In the ten months I travelled between twenty and twenty-five thousand miles, and delivered nearly six hundred addresses. Some of my audiences were composed of 18,000 souls, and in the aggregate I addressed nearly three million persons.

"As to results?" I queried.

"These have been gratifying beyond expression," replied the evangelist. "At one meeting alone no less than 2,000 young people publicly confessed Christ as their Saviour."

America's Problems.

"America's church problems are the same as our own, but I must confess that, in some cases at least, the American churches do not handle them to skilfully as we do in England. There is for instance the problem of the 'down town churches.' Of recent years we have revolutionized these places of worship in our big cities, and by the establishment of institutional churches we have shown what can be done to transform failing causes into centers of life and usefulness which compel the masses to flock to them. In America, however, the down-town churches are left to the humble mission workers. It is true they are churches, supported financially by the wealthy suburban church, but so far as workers are concerned they are entirely neglected by them."

Christianity and the Masses.

"Is the gospel losing its grip on the masses in the States?" I asked.

"Losing its grip!" repeated the gipsy, significantly. "Everywhere I went the people came in thousands to listen to the good news, and they responded to the gospel appeal to an extent that I have never had the privilege of witnessing before. My American tour will always stand out conspicuously in my life memories, and its results have confirmed me in the belief that religion is the only thing that really matters in life. I have seen during the past ten months hundreds of homes uplifted, hundreds of drunkards transformed into respectable citizens, and families united after years of estrangement. Who but Christ could perform such miracles?"

"Did you meet any of the converts of your former mission in America?"

"Hundreds of them," said Mr. Smith; "but what gave me perhaps the greatest joy was the welcome given to me by twenty former converts who are now earnest ministers of the gospel. Was any man ever more richly blessed?"

Few Opportunities for Decision.

"I would like to record in The Sunday-School Chronicle," he continued, "one outstanding impression of my American mission. I was greatly impressed by the fact that many of the young people had seldom, if ever, had the opportunity of making the great decision before my visit. There are hundreds of exceptions, but, taken as a whole, Sunday-school teachers do not give sufficient attention to the questions of decision. We have for some time past been eager to introduce into our schools expert educationalists; why not concentrate for a while on the cultivation of the spiritual life of the teacher? One of the greatest needs of the time is for teachers who are experts in guiding the young feet to the Master. What would be the result for the church and the world if every Sunday-school scholar knew that his classroom or his teacher's home was an 'inquiry room,' where the teacher was waiting for him to enter in order to lead him into the presence of his Lord? Will you pass this on as my message to the teachers?"

People of Importance

—President Taft will leave Beverly, Mass., September 1 for his western trip. He will go to Seattle, filling engagements at Denver, Salt Lake City, and other places en route and will address the advocates of deep water ways at New Orleans in October.

—John D. Rockefeller will spend the summer at his Cleveland home, Forest Hill. He will pass most of his time upon a new golf course.

—A number of Americans recently presented the Pope with an auto. It is reported that this gift was practically forced upon him and that he will never use an auto.

—Emperor William has given up his customary summer yachting trip to the North sea, according to the Tagliche Rundschau. He will remain in Germany until the political crisis is settled.

—Hamilton Holt of New York, editor of the Independent, has been decorated with the Japanese order of the Sacred Treasure for his services in promoting amity between the United States and Japan.

—Sir William Hutt Curzon Wyllie, who was killed by an Indian student in London last week, was born in 1848, being the youngest son of the late Gen. Sir William Wyllie, G. C. B. Col. Wyllie was regarded as one of the most distinguished political agents India ever developed. His long and varied successful career led to his selection as political aid de camp to Viscount Morley for India in 1901. Dr. Calas Lalcaca, who was killed at the same time and by the same man, was a Parsee and was a Shanghai physician.

—Washington B. Thomas, president of the American Sugar and Refining company, who, with four directors of his company, was indicted by the federal grand jury in New York for conspiracy in restraint of trade, has been president of the sugar trust since the death of H. O. Havemeyer two years ago. Previously he was treasurer of the company. He has long been rated as a multimillionaire. His home is in Boston. He is a golf enthusiast and has been president of the United States Golf Association.

A Christian Union Opportunity

Dear Bro. Morrison: I am writing you concerning ———, a new town in our state on the ——— and ——— Railroad. It has two stores, a bank, lumber yard, grain elevator, school house, but no church.

About two miles from town there is a good sized Disciples' Church, built a few years ago, but now closed for lack of support, some members having moved away.

The town will probably never be very much larger than it is now, and ought not to have more than one church. Can you not suggest some young preacher either here or in Chicago who will go there, gather the scattered members of the country church together, teach them the virtue of practicing Christian union, have them move the church over to the town and take in all the Christian people there, giving the cause new life?

Can you not suggest some able young man who will be willing to unite the Christian people in the town on such a basis as will practically make improbable the organization of any other church in the town? This is a good field for the right man.

Very sincerely yours,

———— ————.

[We shall be glad to put the right man into correspondence with this opportunity to do a most significant work.—Editors.]

"You are a pretty sharp boy, Tommy."

Berkeley Bible Seminary

Berkeley Bible Seminary is located in the beautiful city of Berkeley, "The Athens of the Pacific" and the seat of the University of California—one of the greatest educational institutions of the continent.

The Seminary offers only such courses of instruction as are designed to prepare young men and young women for Christian work. All other studies necessary for a general education may be taken, tuition free, in the State University. The Seminary enrollment for the past year was greater than that of the previous year. The school work was very satisfactory. A number of ministerial students self-support.

Centennial Aim.

By far the most important event in the history of the Seminary, since its founding, occurred on February 27, 1909, the date on which the Board of Trustees enthusiastically adopted the elaborate plan which the President of the Institution had submitted for the enlargement of the Seminary and its sphere of usefulness.

This plan provided not only for much more ministerial instruction to be given in the Seminary but also for special courses in Evangelistic, Pastoral, and Sunday-school training. It also provided for the establishment of a fully-equipped Missionary department of instruction which, in addition to the ordinary work of such, should prepare Japanese and Chinese missionaries for Christian work among their own people, both in America and in their native land.

In accordance with the further provisions of the plan, the following men, all especially qualified to fill the requirements of the work projected, were elected members of the Seminary faculty:

Harvey H. Guy, B. D., Ph. D., as Dean of the Seminary and Professor of Biblical Literature; also as Instructor in the Japanese Missionary Department.

William P. Bentley, A. M., as Instructor in the Chinese Missionary Department.

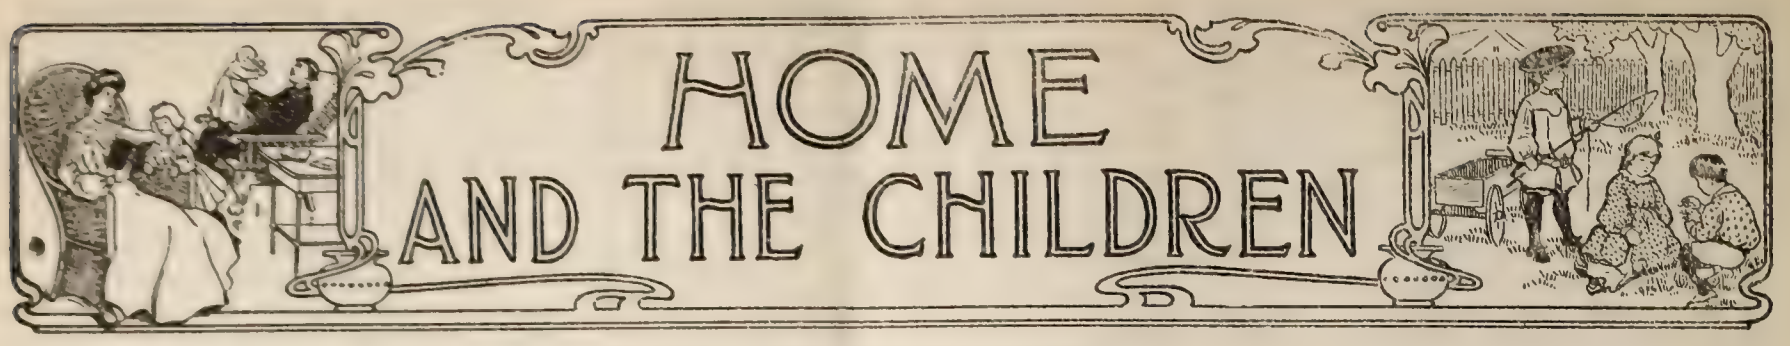
H. J. Loken, A. B., B. D., as Instructor in the New Testament.

Isaac N. McCash, A. M., LL. D., as Instructor in Pastoral Work and Methods.

Harvey O. Breeden, A. M., LL. D., as Instructor in Evangelistic Work and Methods.

Edwin W. Thornton, as Instructor in Sunday-school Work and Methods.

The arrangement for next year contemplates that the last three men named above will teach for four consecutive weeks during the spring term.



These six men, together with Professor Walter Stairs, B. D., A. M., and Professor A. M. Elston, B. D., A. M., who have been teaching in the Seminary, form a corps of eight instructors who, for ability, for proficiency in their special work, and for loyalty to the great plea of the Disciples of Christ, cannot be surpassed by any other like body of men in the Christian Brotherhood.

Berkeley Bible Seminary is now one of the most completely equipped training schools among our people. For the purpose of supporting the enlarged plan and promoting its fuller development, the Trustees have determined to raise another one hundred thousand dollars. A considerable portion of this amount has already been subscribed. A new building for the Seminary will be next undertaken, and plans for this are now in hand. Never were the prospects for the Seminary so bright as at present. Never before has there been such enthusiasm and seriousness of purpose among our brethren in their hopes and ambitions for the Institution.

The fall term will open on August 17. Tuition in the Seminary and in the University is free. A largely increased attendance is expected for the coming year. Catalogues are sent on request.

The environment at Berkeley is ideal. The climate is uniformly mild and pleasant. Rarely is it cold enough in winter for even a light frost; seldom warm enough in summer for physical discomfort. Here the tonic sea atmosphere conduces to highest mental effort the year around.

The Goin'-to-do

BY R. WALTER WRIGHT.

There's a queer little thing that lives among boys,
That hides in their homes, in their books, and their toys;
No one has described it, though some say it's blue:
It has such a strange name, it's called Goin'-to-do.

I think it's a fairy; not content is this elf
To be around with a boy—it gets into his self.
He forgets his own name (George, Willie or who?)
Says he's somebody else, "I'm a Goin'-to-do."

His father says, "Willie, I want you to go
On an errand," or "There's weeds in the garden to hoe,"
But while father is waiting and work is in view
Willie's watching the pranks of this queer Goin'-to-do.

His mother says, "Willie, be a good little man!
I know you can help me if you say that you can."
"Yes, mother," says he. Just then, strange, but it's true,
In flies like a bird that queer Goin'-to-do.

His teacher says, "Willie, give attention to me."
And Willie says, "Yes, a great scholar I'll be."
But the studies are hard, and the questions now few
And he can't see his books for a big Goin'-to-do.

So every day with this elfin he meets,
He loves to play with him though he knows that he cheats;
And night after night he finds something to rue
Because he's been fooled by this queer Goin'-to-do.

What the Daisies Did

BY SUSAN H. MARTIN.

The determination had been growing until now it was larger than herself. She would go away from everything, the years had been too hard, the disappointments too bitter, the disillusionment too complete. After a while Harry would not care, and in new places and among new faces she would begin again.

Up stairs in the little dark store room was a trunk, and she had been gradually filling it, as the resolve grew. The resolve to leave Harry, to cut loose from him forever. They were not fitted for each other, had never been. It had been a huge mistake after all. They had been two children very much in love with each other at first, but with the flight of time it had been borne in upon Margaret that it would be best to part. She had grown to dread the coldness, and the periods of rebellion and depression that seized upon her. She had grown to shrink from Harry's bitter words and sharp words. And yet, through it all, she was conscious that he loved her. Ah, well, she was not a woman to forgive everything, to endure all things. It was simply a sacrifice, she was not prepared to make, and so day by day she made ready for the event of their separation.

And then, one night he came home; she noticed that he looked weary, the eyes were infinitely tired.

"You've been overdoing," she exclaimed involuntarily.

"Not much," he answered. "I had to go to the country today. It was a long, hard trip. Our machine gave out and we literally had to push it back. I—I brought you these."

From his pocket he took a bunch of little white daisies, with a clump of earth still adhering to their roots.

"I thought perhaps you might like them," he said, a little apologetically. "They will grow."

She took them, the cluster of little white daisies and looked at them. They brought back a flood of recollections, days of her young youth in its promise of joy and beauty, when everything was rose colored, when delightful things were going to be hers, when she loved Harry and Harry loved her. And now—? Ah, what a bitter crop of disappointed hopes, life had been and then she looked at the daisies again. Their purity struck her afresh. She bent over them. Their little white faces seem to say: "Look up, look up, do your best. We do, where God places us there we grow, we seek no change."

She looked at her husband. He was looking at her.

"Thank you," she said gently. "I am glad you brought them. I—I am sure they will grow."

He followed her out into the yard. There, under a sunny window she dug up the earth, planting them, deftly, tenderly. She stood up. Her husband came nearer, placing his hand on her shoulder.

"Margaret," he said. "It has come to me of late that we are not happy. It may be my fault, but there has seemed to me aversion in your every movement. Aversion towards me, that makes a man beside himself at times. Can you not overlook my faults? I know they are too many, but—you are my wife, Margaret."

She looked at the daisies. The little upturned faces seemed to speak to her again. "Do your best, do your best. Don't we?"

She turned. "I'll try, Harry," she said humbly. "You are no more to blame than I. I should have loved more, forgiven more, expected less."

And then in the presence of the daisies, she put both arms about his neck and kissed him. That night she took from out the trunk in the little dark store room, her few treasures, the clothes she had packed, the trifles she had laid with them, and put them in their old places. She was Harry's wife and she had forgotten it. Forgotten what she had vowed, but she would not forget again.

That little cluster of white daisies had brought her back, back to her old self, never to stray again. And under the sunny window the daisies grew.

Glen's Lost Book

By Effie Stevens

"Where is my new hair-ribbon?" Glen Willard cried, fretfully. "It's strange I never can find anything when I want it. It's most school time now and I'm not half ready."

Three minutes of frantic searching in her top bureau drawer, where she was supposed to keep such little essentials as collars, gloves, pocket-handkerchiefs, and ribbons, however, brought to light the missing hair-ribbon, amid such a snarl and tangle of small articles, that it was a wonder she found it at all, or that finding it, it should have been in a presentable condition.

With fingers made deft by much practice Glen tied the big bow in place.

"Now, where did I put that book of Miss Alden's," she next asked herself, as she gave a hasty glance in the mirror to assure herself that her toilet was complete.

Indeed, Glen, with her becomingly arranged hair, her emaculate white shirt-waist, and short dark skirt, presented a very neat and attractive appearance. There was nothing about her looks to suggest a careless girl.

She looked about her pretty room helplessly. It was a much more orderly looking room than the condition of her top bureau drawer would have led one to expect.

In fact Glen took considerable pride in keeping her room in almost perfect order, at least so far as the part revealed to a casual observer was concerned. But bureau drawers, wardrobe, writing desk and curtained book-case would have told a very different story had they been examined.

Little things not in present use were thrust away, out of sight, in the most unusual and unexpected places. Glen's mother had expostulated with her for this lack of orderliness in vain.

Glen's invariable rejoinder was, "I'm sure my room looks neater than the rooms of any of the girls I know. I'm always very particular about picking my things up and putting them away."

Her mother might have added that Glen wasted much valuable time in hunting for things which she had put away in such reckless fashion.

"Where could I have put it?" Glen repeated to herself in anxious tones, as she peeped hurriedly and unsuccessfully into bureau drawers and even behind books on her book-shelves.

"Well, I suppose I shall have to go without it," she said with a sigh, "though Miss Alden expects me to return it this morning. I shall have to tell her I have mislaid it, but I just hate to, for she will not feel like trusting me with her books again."

When Glen reached her school, however, she learned to her great relief that Miss Alden was not expected to be there that day, so the unpleasant ordeal of telling her about the book was to be postponed, and perhaps she might find it before the next day, and so make the telling unnecessary.

At noon-time Glen made another hasty but fruitless search in her room.

She decided that she would not trouble her mother about the matter until night, but while on her way to school for the afternoon session it came to her where she last remembered having the book.

There had been no school the previous day, so Glen had gone to spend the day with her grandmother, who lived ten miles out in the country, and she had taken the book with her in order that she might finish reading it and be ready to return it to her teacher the first thing the next morning.

She knew that she had the book when she reached there for she distinctly remembered reading in it while her grandmother was busy over important household matters.

But later than that she could remember nothing concerning the book. Glen wished with all her heart that she had not borrowed the book.

Still Miss Alden had offered it to her, and she had not seen how she could refuse it, as the subject had come up in the class, and Miss Alden knew that she was very much interested in it.

The book was a small one but it was expensively bound and contained a number of fine illustrations. If it was really lost it would cost quite a little, from Glen's point of view, to replace it.

So, on the spur of the moment, Glen decided that she must go to her grandmothers' directly after school, and see if she had left the book there.

But when Glen rushed into the house from school, eager to tell her mother the whole story of the missing book and her intention of going to her grandmother's in search of it, she found to her dismay, that her mother was out calling.

There was no time to wait for her return. If Glen went to her grandmother's she must start at once. After all, when she returned with the book it would be easier to tell her mother all about it, she thought. She only waited long enough to visit the kitchen to tell Nora where she was going and that she might not be home to supper. Glen did not stay to her grandmother's to supper, however. She did not feel that she wanted any supper, for the book was not there.

Grandmother told her at once that she remembered her taking it away with her when she left for home, but Glen was not satisfied until she had looked for herself in every room down stairs. Then, as it was growing late, she took the car for home Supper was well over when she reached there.

"Why, Glen, how came you to go to Grandmother's in this sudden fashion?" her mother asked her. "After being there all day yesterday too. You never did such a thing before. Your father has tickets for the illustrated lecture this evening, and we have been so afraid you would not be home in time to get ready, as it begins at half past seven, and you always need so much time to get dressed."

Thereupon a very miserable Glen poured a disconnected and well nigh unintelligible tale of woe into her mother's sympathetic ears.

Mrs. Willard looked anxious, however, by the time Glen had finished her story. She felt that Glens' carelessness was fast growing into a habit which might in the future bring her into serious trouble, unless it was speedily checked.

"Have you looked everywhere in the house?" she inquired with an air of resolve.

Glen blushed in confusion

"No," she explained haltingly, "only some in my room. I never can seem to find things there though."

"That is because you do not put little things in their proper places," Mrs. Willard said with a kindly smile, intended to rob her words of their severity. "If you would only learn to be orderly in small as well as in larger things you would be able to find your things easily enough.

"Now, I think you had better begin to look for the book in your room, straightening out things as you go along, so as to be sure you have not overlooked it," Glen's mother continued firmly. "If you do not find it there, it will be time enough to look elsewhere."

"But I haven't any time if I go to the lecture," objected Glen. "I must either give Miss Alden the book tomorrow or tell her I have lost it. As I haven't looked at my lessons yet I shall have to study in the morning."

"I took it for granted that you would give up the lecture," Mrs. Willard replied quietly.

Glen's face fell.

"I suppose I'll have to," she said rather ungraciously.

She knew that her mother was right in her decision. Her first thought should be to find the book if possible. At the same time it did seem hard to be obliged to loose the lecture. It did not make it any easier either to remember that if the book was lost she would have to pay for it out of her own slender allowance, for she could never bring herself to ask her father for extra money for such a purpose. She ought to be the one to suffer for her own carelessness.

Glen emptied bureau drawers energetically and replaced their contents in orderly piles. She took the books from her book-case and examined each one carefully as she put it back, to be sure that the missing volume was not among the others. Then she examined the contents of her wardrobe, finding many articles long missed in the disorderly pile upon its floor. But in none of these places did she find Miss Alden's book.

She was on the point of giving up her search, thinking that she had looked in every possible place the room contained, when she happened to sit down for a moment on the edge of the bed, near the foot, She felt something beneath her, and slipping her hand between the mattress and the bed-springs, she drew forth the missing book.

It all came back to her suddenly. When she came in the night before, she had tucked it away, out of sight, in the first available place, according to her usual custom; and then had promptly forgotten all about it. But how absurd of her to put it in such a ridiculous place.

Then a hot flush of shame mounted to her cheeks. Was it any more absurd than putting her handkerchiefs in her writing-desk, or her shears on the floor of her wardrobe? Well, after this experience, she would put things in their proper places, and if she borrowed anything she would be especially careful not to mislay it, she was quite sure of that.

As her parents had not yet returned from the lecture she sat down and studied her neglected lessons with a feeling of relief that her worry was over. Now that the book was found she could put her entire attention upon them.

Problem

'Tis easier to rest serene
Upon some other life than lean
Upon ones self and strive to plan
Ones own salvation as a man.

'Tis easier to trust a Pope,
A book inspired, our father's hope
Than just to live aright and do
Ourselves the honest task and true.

'Tis easier, but are we then
To be accounted holier men?
And should we therefore but despise
A man because he hateth lies?

WINSTON OF THE PRAIRIE

By Harold Bindloss, Author of "The Cattle Baron's Daughter," "Lorimer of the Northwest," etc.

CHAPTER XXIV.
Winston Rides Away.

The first of the snow was driving across the prairie before a bitter wind, when Maud Barrington stood by a window of the Grange looking out into the night. The double casements rattled, the curtains behind her moved with the icy draughts, until, growing weary of watching the white flakes whirl past, she drew them to and walked slowly towards a mirror. Then a faint tinge of pink crept into her cheek, and a softness that became her into her eyes. They, however, grew critical as she smoothed back a tress of lustrous hair a trifle from her forehead straightened the laces at neck and wrist, and shook into more flowing lines the long black dress. Maud Barrington was not unduly vain, but it was some time before she seemed contented, and one would have surmised that she desired to appear her best that night.

Th result was beyond cavil in its artistic simplicity, for the girl, knowing the signnificance that trifles have at times, laid aside every adornment that might hint at wealth, and the somber draperies alone emphasized the polished whiteness of her face and neck. Still, and she did not know whether she was pleased or otherwise at this, the mirror had shown the stamp which revealed itself even in passive pose and poise of head. It was her birthright, and would not be disguised.

Then she drew a low chair towards the stove, and once more the faint color crept into her face as she took up a note. It was laconic, and requested permission to call at the Grange, but Maud Barrington was not deceived, and recognized the consideration each word had cost the man who wrote it. Afterwards she glanced at her watch, raised it with a little gesture of impatience to make sure it had not stopped, and sat still, listening to the moaning of the wind, until the door opened and Miss Barrington came in. She glanced at her niece, who felt that her eyes had noticed each detail of her somewhat unusual dress, but said nothing until the younger woma nturned to her.

"They would scarcely come tonight, aunt," she said.

Miss Barrington, listening a moment, heard the wind that whirled the snow about the lonely building, but smiled incredulously.

"I fancy you are wrong, and I wish my brother were here," she said. "We could not refuse Mr. Winston permission to call, but whatever passes between us will have more than its individual significance. Anything we tacitly promise, the others will agree to, and I feel the responsibility of deciding for Silverdale."

Miss Barrington went out, but her niece, who understood her smile and that she had received a warning, sat still with a strained expression in her eyes. The prosperity of Silverdale had been dear to her, but she knew she must let something that was dearer still slip away from her, or, since they must come from her, trample on her pride as she made the first advances. It seemed a very long while before there was a knocking at the outer door, and she rose with a little quiver when light steps came up the stairway.

In the meanwhile two men stood beside the stove in the hall until an English maid returned to them.

"Colonel Barrington is away, but Miss Barrington and Miss Maud are at home," she said. "Will you go forward into the morning-room when you have taken off your furs?"

"Did you know Barrington was not here?" asked Winston, when the maid mived away.

Dane appeared embarrassed. "The fact is, I did."

"Then," said Winston, "I am a little astonished you did not think fit to tell me."

Dane's face flushed, but he laid his hand on his comrade's arm. "No," he said, "I didn't. Now, listen to me for the last time, Winston. I've not been blind, you see, and, as I told you, your comrades have decided that they wish you to stay. Can't you sink your confounded pride, and take what is offered you?"

Winston shook his grasp off(and there was weariness in his face. "You need not go through it all again. I made my decision a long while ago."

"Well," said Dane, with a gesture of hopelessness, "I've done all I could, and, since you are going on, I'll look at that trace clip while you tell Miss Barrington. I mean the younger one."

"The harness can wait," said Winston. "You are coming with me."

A little grim smile crept into Dane's eyes. "I am not. I wouldn't raise a finger to help you now," he said, and retreated hastily.

It was five minutes later when Winston walked quietly into Maud Barrington's presence, and sat down when the girl signed to him. He wondered if she guessed how his heart was beating.

"It is very good of you to receive me, but I felt I ciuld not slip away without acknowledging the kindness you and Miss Barrington have shown me," he said. "I did not know Colonel Barringtin was away."

The girl smiled a little. "Or you would not have come? Then we should have had no opportunity of congratulating you on your triumphant acquittal. You see, it must be mentioned."

"I'm afraid there was a miscarriage of justice," said Winston quietly. "Still, though it is a difficult subject, the deposition of the man I supplanted went a long way, and the police did not seem desirous of pressing a charge against me. Perhaps I should have insisted on implicating myself, but you would scarcely have looked for that after what you now know of me."

Maud Barrington braced herself for an effort, though she was outwardly very calm. "No," she said, "no one would have looked for it from any man placed as you were, and you are purposing to do more than is required of you. Why will you go away?"

"I am a poor man," said Winston. "One must have means to live at Silverdale!"

"Then," said the girl with a soft laugh which cost her a good deal, "it is because you prefer poverty, and you have at least one opportunity at Silverdale. Courthorne's land was mine to all intents and purposes before it was his, and now it reverts to me. I owe him nothing, and he did not give it me. Will you stay and farm it on whatever arrangement Dane and Macdonald may consider equitable? My uncle's hands are too full for him to attempt it."

"No," said Winston, and his voice trembled a little. "Your friends would resent it."

"Then," said the girl, "why have they urged you to stay?"

"A generous impulse. They would repent of it by and by. I am not one of them, and they know it, now, as I did at the beginning. No doubt they would be courteous, but you see a half-contemptuous toleration would gall me."

There was a little smile on Maud Barrington's lips, but it was not in keeping with the tinge in her cheek and the flash in her eyes.

"I onc told you that you were poor at subterfuge, and you know you are wronging them," she said. "You also know that even if they were hostile to you, you could stay and compel them to acknowledge you. I fancy you once admitted as much to me. What has become of the pride of the democracy you showed me?"

Winston made a deprecatory gestue. "You must have laughed at me. I had not been long at Silverdale then," he said. "I should feel very lonely now. One man against long generations. Wouldn't it be a trifle unequal?"

Maud Barrington smiled again. "I did not laugh, and this is not England, though what you consider prejudices do not count for so much as they used to there, while there is, one is told quite frequently, no limit to what a man may attain to here, if he dares sufficiently."

A little quiver ran through Winston, and he rose and stood looking down on her, with one brown hand clenched on the table and the veins showing on his forehead.

"You would have me stay?" he said.

Maud Barrington met his eyes, for the spirit that was in her was the equal of his. "I would have you be yourself—what you were when you came here in defiance of Colonel Barrington, and again when you sowed the last acre of Courthorne's land, while my friends, who are yours, too, looked on wondering. Then you would stay—if it pleased you. Where has your splendid audacity gone?"

Winston slowly straightened himself, and the girl noticed the damp the struggle had brought there on his forehead, for he understood that if he would stretch out his hand and take it what he longed for might be his.

"I do not know, any more than I know where it came from, for until I met Courthorne I had never made a big venture in my life," he said. "It sems it has served its turn and left me—for now there are things I am afraid to do."

"So you will go away and forget us?"

Winston stood very still a moment, and the girl, who felt her heart beating, noticed that his face was drawn. Still, she could go no further. Then he said very slowly, "I should be under the shadow always if I stay, and my friends would feel it even more deeply than I would do. I may win the right to come back again if I go away."

Maude Barrington made no answer, but both knew no further word could be spoken on that subject until, if fate ever willed it, the man returned again, and it was a relief when Miss Barrington came in with Dane. He glanced at his comrade keenly, and then seeing the grimness in his face, quietly declined the white-haired lady's offer of hospitality. Five minutes later the farewells were said, and Maud Barrington stood with the stinging flakes whirling about her in the doorway, while the sleigh slid out into the filmy whiteness that drove across the prairie. When it vanished, she turned back into the warmth and brightness with a little shiver and one hand tightly closed.

The great room seemed very lonely when, while the wind moaned outside, she and her aunt sat down to dinner. Neither of them appeared communicative, and both felt it a relief when the meal was over. Then Maud Barrington rose and stood with hands stretched out towards the stove.

"Aunt," she said. Twoinette has twice asked me to go back to Montreal, and I think I will. The prairie is very dreary in the winter."

It was about this time when, as the whitened horses floundered through the lee of a bluff where there was shelter from the wind, the men in the sleigh found opportunity for speech.

"Now," said Dane quietly, "I know that we have lost you, for a while at least. Will you ever come back, Winston?"

Winston nodded. "Yes," he said. "When time has done its work and Colonel Barrington asks me, if I can buy land enough to give me a standing at Silverdale."

"That," said Dane, "will need a good many dollars, and you insisted on flinging those you had away. How are you going to make them?"

"I don't know," said Winston simply. "Still, by some means it will be done."

It was next day when he walked into Graham's office at Winnipeg.

"We had better understand each other first," he said. "You have heard what has happened to me and will not find me a profitable customer today."

"You understand me, anyway," said Graham. "Wait until I tell my clerk that if anybody comes round I'm busy."

A bell rang, a little window opened and shut again, and Winston smiled.

"I want to make thirty thousand dollars as soon as I can, and it seems to me there are going to be opportunities in this business. Do you know anybody who would take me as a clerk or salesman?"

Graham did not appear astonished. "You'll scarcely make them that way if I find you a berth at fifty a month," he said.

"No," said Winston. "Still, I wouldn't purpose keeping it for more than six months or so. By that time I should know a little about the business."

"Got any money now?"

"One thousand dollars," said Winston quietly.

Graham nodded. "Don't worry me. I've got some thinking to do."

Winston took up a journal, and laid it down again twenty minutes later. "Well," he said, "you think it's too big a thing?"

"No," said Graham. "It depends upon the man, and it might be done. Knowing the business goes a good way, and so does having dollars in hand, but there's something that's born in one man in a thousand that goes a long way further still. I can't tell you what it is, but I know it when I see it."

"Then," said Winston, "you have seen this thing in me?"

Graham nodded gravely. "Yes, sir, but you don't want to get proud. You had nothing to do with the getting of it. It was given you. Now, we're going to have a year that will not be forgotten by those who handle wheat and flour, and the men with the long heads will roll the money in. Well, I've no use for another clerk, and my salesman's good enough for me, but if we can agree on on the items I'll take you for a partner."

The offer was made and accepted quietly, and when a rought draft of the arrangement had been agreed upon, Graham nodded.

"You may as well take hold at once, and there's work ready now," he said. "You've heard of the old St. Louis mills back on the edge of the bush country. Never did any good. Folks who had them were short of money, and didn't know how they should be run. Well, I and two other men have bought them for a song, and, while the place is tumbling in, the plant seems good. Now, I can get hold of orders for flour when I want them, and everybody with dollars to spare will plank them right into any concern handling food-stuffs this year. You go down tomorrow with an engineer, and, when you've got the mills running and orders coming in we'll sell out to a company, if we don't want them."

Winston sat silent a space turning over a big bundle of plans and estimates. Then he said, "You'll have to lay out a pile of money."

Graham laughed. "That's going to be your affair. When you want them the dollars will be ready, and there's only one condition. Every dollar we put down has got to bring another in."

"But," said Winston, "I don't know anything about milling."

"Then," said Graham dryly, "You have got to learn. A good many men have got quite rich in this country running things they didn't know much about when they took hold of them."

"There's one more point," said Winston. "I must make those thirty thousand dollars soon or they'll be no great use to me, and when I have them I may want to leave you."

"That's all right," said Graham. "By the time you've done it, you'll have made sixty for me. We'll go out and have some lunch to clinch the deal if you're ready."

It might have appeared unusual in England, but it was much less so in a country where the specialization of professions is still almost unknown, and the man who can adapt himself attains ascendency, and on the morrow Winston arrived at a big wooden building beside a pine-shrouded river. It appeared falling to pieces, and the engineer looked disdainfully at some of the machinery, but, somewhat against his wishes, he sat up with his companion most of the night in a little log hotel, and orders that occasioned one of Graham's associates consternation were mailed to the city next morning. Then machines came out by the carload, and men with tools in droves. Some of them murmured mutinously when they found they were expected to do as much as their leader, who was not a tradesman, but these were forthwith sent back again, and the rest were willing to stay and earn the premium he promised them for rapid work.

Before the frost grew arctic, the building stood firm, and the hammers rang inside it night and day until, when the ice had bound the dam and lead, the fires were lighted and the trials under steam began. It cost more than water, but buyers with orders from the East were clamoring for flour just them. For a fortnight Winston snatched his food in mouthfuls, and scarcely closed his eyes, while Graham found him pale and almost haggard when he came down with several men from the cities in response to a telegram. For an hour they moved up and down, watching whirring belt and humming roller, and then, whitened with the dust, stood very intent and quiet while one of them dipped up a little flour from the delivery hopper. His opinions on, and dealings in, that product were famous in the land. He said nothing for several minutes, and then brushing the white dust from his hands turned with a little smile to Graham.

"We'll have some baked, but I don't know that there's much use for it. This will grade a very good first," he said. "You can book me the thousand two eighties for a beginning now."

Winston's fingers trembled, but there was a twinkle in Graham's eyes as he brought his hand down on his shoulder.

"Gentlemen," he said, "I was figuring right on this."

It was a very contented and slightly hilarious party that went back to the city, but Winston sat down before a shaded lamp when they left him, and bent over a sheaf of drawings until his eyes grew dim. Then he once more took up a little strip of paper that Graham had given him, and leaned forward with his arms upon the table. The mill was very silent at last, for of all who had toiled in it that day one weary man alone sat awake, staring, with aching eyes, in front of him. There was, however, a little smile in them, for roseate visions floated before them. If the promise that strip of paper held out was redeemed, they might materialize, for those who had toiled and wasted their substance that the eastern peoples might be fed would that year, at least, not go without their reward. Then he stretched out his arms wearily above his head.

"It almost seems that what I have hoped for may be mine," he said. "Still, there is a good deal to be done first, and not two hours left before I begin it tomorrow."

A Little Nonsense

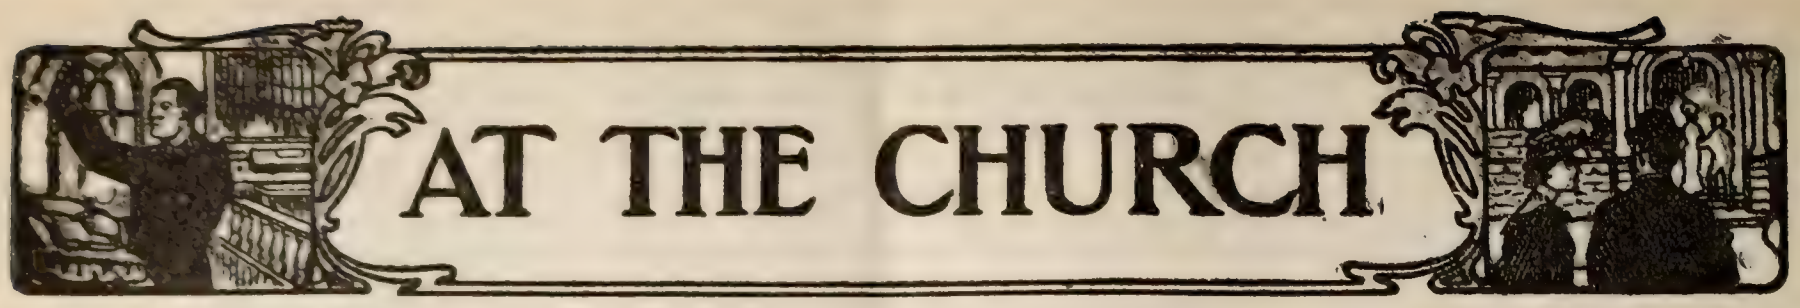
REPARTEE.

This is how a driver of the prison van known as "Black Maria" distinguished himself. A would-be wit on the causeway hailed him:

"Got any room inside, Robert?"



"There's room for one," replied the driver; "we kep' it for you."

Not entirely disconcerted, the wit made another shot:

"What's the fare?" he asked.

The answer entirely extinguished him.

"Bread and water—same as you had before."—Tit-Bits.

Sunday School Lesson

By Herbert L. Willett

Beneath the Acropolis*

Paul had come alone to Athens by sea from Berea. His departure from the north was necessitated by the unfriendly attitude of the people, chiefly the Jews, who had driven him out or at least had rendered his longer stay dangerous both to himself and the newly founded churches. But he had left his companions, Silas and Timothy, to set in order the things that were wanting among the new believers in Thessalonica and Berea. And now he was waiting for them in Athens that he might take up, with their assistance, his active ministry in that city.

Paul in Athens.

It seems probable that Paul intended to conduct a regular campaign in the capital of Greek culture. It was the most ambitious of all his efforts up to this time. He used the days preceding the coming of his friends in gathering such information regarding the character and disposition of the Athenians as might be of value to him in his future work. According to his custom he sought out the synagogue of the Jews where he met the members of his own race and the proselytes who worshipped with them. In addition, he frequented the great forum of the city southwest of the Acropolis. It was an open space surrounded by some of the most famous buildings in Athens, including the Senate House, the royal porch, and the Hall of Zeus.

The Later Athens.

He had been profoundly stirred by what he saw upon the streets of this heathen city. Demosthenes remarked once that it was easier to find a god than a man on the streets of Athens, so numerous were the statues of divinities. Paul had never looked upon anything like this in his life in the East. He was in the midst of a totally different atmosphere. The marvels of those splendid days of Greek art and philosophy were about him, and yet the old, heroic spirit was largely gone. Instead of philosophers there were now only sophists and rhetoricians; instead of the artists who had made Athens famous with its wonderful group of buildings on the Acropolis and its equally magnificent structures in the lower city, there was now a generation of imitators and copyists. The ancient patriotism had disappeared; the older and finer philosophy had ... down. Epicureanism was now the apology for indulgence, and stoicism the defence of ...

"Jesus and Anastosis."

One day Paul fell into conversation with some of the frequenters of the market place. They had heard him talk of Jesus and the resurrection. The latter term they did not understand, but probably thought that "anastosis" was some divinity whom Paul was preaching along with Jesus. It was these two, Jesus and the resurrection, that they thought he was setting forth. As they had somewhat of the spirit of collectors of foreign religions, they were anxious to know what this stranger could contribute to their miscellaneous assortment of divinities and faiths. So they brought him to a suitable place near the Hill of Mars. It hardly seems probable that the rock above the city was selected for this meeting, but rather that one of the porches close by, and apparently called by the same name, was chosen. There is perhaps a sentimental satisfaction in imagining Paul standing on the bold and rugged top of the Hill of Mars to speak to an assembly of Athenian philosophers seated on the hard and sloping rock at his feet. But such a scene is highly unlikely when one remembers the manners of ancient Athens. It is far more likely that a little knot of people gathered about him in one of the porches beneath the Acropolis. It was less an address to an audience than an effort to answer questions propounded by the gathered knot of listeners, most of them in a skeptical and cynical mood.

"An Unknown God."

Yet Paul faced the opportunity, thankful that he had any hearing however unfriendly. All his natural diplomacy asserted itself in the effort to secure the interest and regard of his listeners. Our translation of his words is singularly unhappy in several regards. We can never imagine Paul so discourteous as to say to the Athenians, who believed themselves the wisest of men, that he perceived that they were rather "superstitious." On the contrary he complimented them by referring to their "unusually religious" character. The numbers of statutes and shrines he had seen in their city showed this to be the case. Not content with erecting altars to all the gods they know, somebody had actually put up an altar "to an unknown god." We know that this was not an unusual custom. When misfortune befell an individual and he was unable to trace the cause to any familiar deity, it was not unlikely that he would erect an altar to the unknown god who had afflicted him. Similarly, the offering might be in recognition of an unexpected blessing from some mysterious source.

The Imageless God.

Paul said to them, "The One whom you unconsciously" (not ignorantly, that would have been almost an insult) "worship, I am declaring to you." Then he went on to speak of the One God which their best philosophy had recognized as behind all these images and deities of the common faith. How little it was worth while to attempt to carve the figure of this Our Father. He could not dwell in man-made temples nor could he be represented by any art of man's device.

The Unity of Mankind.

Equally impossible was it to suppose that he had selected one race of men like the Greeks, and cared for none others, for of one blood he had made all. Paul knew perfectly well that if there was one thing sacred to the Greek it was the sense of his own superiority to all barbarians. And perhaps the apostle never so fully realized the equal arrogance of the Jewish claim to exclusive regard on the part of God. In this statement Paul appealed to a popular saying of one of their own poets, Aratus, a native of Cilicia like Paul himself, and to another of Cleanthes, a pupil of Zeno. These quotations do not indicate Paul's profound knowledge of Greek literature. They were probably common sentiments of the time, but hitherto used in the exclusive sense of Greek nationality. It was possible for the people to cultivate sentiments of universal regard as a theory, and yet to exhibit the utmost intolerence and arrogance toward all others. This was particularly true of Greeks, Romans and Jews in the days of Paul. The apostle's countrymen were accustomed to quote the world-wide sentiments of the Old Testament, and yet limit them relentlessly to their own people. It seems very strange to read Joel's statement that in the latter days God shall "pour out his spirit upon all flesh," and yet to remember that both the prophet and the people to whom he spoke meant my this "all flesh" the Jewish people alone. Paul at Athens caught the new wisdom of the actually world-wide ministry of Jesus and the futility of all insular and exclusive ideas.

The Risen Jesus.

The third point in Paul's discourse, after emphasizing the invisible and universal character of God, was the necessity of repentance in view of the coming judgment which should be administered by the Righteous Man whom God had ordained and vindicated by the resurrection from the dead. At this point Paul was approaching his great theme. But the instant his audience heard his reference to the resurrection they turned away with laughter and disdain. They had no objection to the doctrine of immortality; in fact more than one of their own teachers, like Plato, had set this forth. But the resurrection of the body was to them an unthinkable absurdity. It was distinctly a Jewish doctrine for which they had supreme contempt. When Paul mentioned it, therefore, they listened no further. They felt that they knew now all that this "babbler" had to say. They were able now to classify him with those preachers of absurd doctrines which no sane man held.

The Dispersing Audience.

As they dispersed, leaving Paul practically alone, he must have felt all the chagrin of a despised and baffled advocate. At that moment Paul would have welcomed actual hostility. If they had taken up stones to hurl at him he would have rejoiced, for that would have indicated at least some interest, even if an angry one, on their part. But to have them leave him with mocking words and contemptuous intimations that when they wished to learn further of these interesting doctrines they would call for him, was a heartbreaking disappointment.

A Few Converts.

There were only a few who yielded to the great truth Paul had brought to Athens. Two are mentioned, Dionysius, who was later adopted as the patron saint of France (St. Denis), and an otherwise unknown woman named Damaris, whose very name is suggestive of heathen art, luxury, skepticism and despair, yielding to the transfiguring power of a pure and ennobling faith.

Disappointment and Departure.

Paul did not even wait for his friends to arrive in Athens. Disheartened and deeply troubled in mind, he left the city and went to Corinth. The scene of his address to the Athenians has been a famous one in Christian history. Luke's admiring description has furnished the details of many paintings since the days of Raphael's great cartoon. But Paul evidently thought of the episode with regret and chagrin. Only once in all his writings does he allude to Athens. And the impression made upon one who reads the New Testament narrative is that he had always the haunting and humbling sense of the failure of his Athenian mission. Yet it did not fail, for if only the few disciples referred to were born into the kingdom of God through his ministry there, it was an event well worth the pain and humiliation. And we know that in later days there grew up in Athens a church which, if not so well known as those at Corinth and Ephesus, was at least a powerful force in the Christianizing of the entire Attic land.

Prayer Meeting

By Silas Jones

JESUS THE SON OF GOD.

Topic, July 21. Jno. 3:16-18; 8:36; I Jno. 4:15.

What has God spoken to men in Christ? What is God's attitude toward men and what does he ask of them? The answers of the New Testament to these questions are definite and positive. If we believe what it teaches, we may know what sort of conduct God approves and what are the blessings we may expect from him. But we cannot hope to reach in a moment an understanding of God in Christ that will be in every way perfectly satisfactory, ror we know Christ only as we become like him and time is required for the transformation which the presence of Christ produces in the life of the believer.

The Purpose of Love.

The severity of nature and the cruelty of man to man have given rise in the minds of many to beliefs in Gods delighting in slaughter and torture. Men have rought to the altars of their gods presents and bribes that they might have relief from the malignant hatred of the owers above them. Their fear of the gods was not awe in the presence of supreme goodness, but the terrors inspired by caprice and heartlessness. Into the church some of this heathenism has come. It has been hard for the world to forget its false religions and worship the God of grace. So much of our training even in Christian lands feeds our suspicion and unfits us for whole hearted co-operation with others and for sweet fellowship with God. We do not question in the Sunday-school and church the truth of the statement that God loved the world and sent his Son to save it, but in feeling we deny it again and again. Some of the devices employed by the church to attract men to its services mean, if we study them carefully, that the passion of the church is dead, that it no longer has the power to awaken in the hearts of the sinful the sense of God's love. Men are lost because they doubt the love of God. God sent his Son that they might know his love and have a way of escape from sin. The church must make this truth living and active in the heart if it would be true to the gospel of the Son of God.

"Free Indeed."

Man desires to be free because he is man. He would be less than man if he were content with slavery. But he does not always know what freedom is and it is not uncommon for him to choose a degrading slavery under the impression that he is fleeing from bondage. Whenever he runs away from duty, however hard it is, he puts himself under a yoke. Whenever he gives the reins to unsocial feelings, he is selling his freedom. But many do not see this. It is their thought that freedom means the giving of expression to their basest passions and their most bitter hatreds. The freedom of Jesus is of another sort. He leberates the finer, nobler feelings. He removes the barrier of prejudice and hatred which we have set up in our hearts against the entrance of generous concern for the welfare of all men. Our talents are by him turned to the service of man, not to the acquiring of mere personal advantage. It is our privilege as Christians to do good even to them that hate us. The Son of God brings to us the divine compassion ror all the world. He bestows upon us the freedom of those who labor for human redemption. He thus saves us from despair, for despair is usually the product of selfishness. The pessimist, despite his profession of disinterestedness which he sometimes makes, is generally the best example of unalloyed selfishness to be found.

God in Us and We in God.

"Whosoever shall confess that Jesus is the Son of God, God abideth in him, and he in God." In ways that we do not understand God works in us for our salvation. In the day of darkness and death, when he seems far from us, he is very near to lead us to the light of life everlasting. We may therefore rest in God. This is his world. Doubtless we are often ready to suggest improvements in it. It is never just as we would have it. I do not believe that God would be pleased with us if we were satisfied with everything that is going on in the world about us. Many things can be changed for the better and we ought to change them. But we can assume too much responsibility. God has reserved for himself responsibility and authority. We endure needless anxiety because we try to stand in the place of God. Certainly our fretfulness must come from the distance we have put between us and God. We do not know him, we do not rely upon him. The Son of God brings us to the Father that we may put aside our foolish anxieties and be content with what we can do and be.

Christian Endeavor Lesson

TOPIC FOR JULY 25.

Heroes of Missions in China.

Matt. 5:13-16.

I can remember the time in boyhood when I thought all heroes were dead; that in some way being dead was a part of being heroic! It did not seem, just then, that it was such a glorious thing to be a hero! But I have no doubt now that many heroes are living, that one of the most heroic things some people can do is to live for God in hard places. So I propose that we devote our meeting to some living heroes in China, instead of spending all the time on Olopun, who went to China in 635 A. D.; the work of Xavier and the Jesuits in the sixteenth century; or Morrison, who said, "I conceive it my duty to stand candidate for a station where laborers are most wanted"; or Dr. Parker who tried "opening China at the point of the lancet"; or Ingle, Bridgeman, Taylor, or even our brave Dr. Ament, whose coronation came last year.

Nor can we mention all the living heroes, like Dr. Arthur Smith, Dr. Griffith John, and Dr. Ashmore. Our young people ought to know the young men and women who have recently gone to China, even in the face of one of the most bloody massacres of recent years—the Boxer outbreak. So I suggest that in our meeting we talk about Corbin, Kung, Fei and Staub, of Taikusien; of Watts Pye of Feuchoufu; of DeHaan, who sails this fall. They are all Oberlin men, Corbin graduating from the Seminary in 1903 and the rest later. They represent the choicest culture of our country, its finest manhood, highest ideals and capacities. They are "men o' pairts," and they have great homes there in China!

I have just been reading a letter from Mr. Corbin in which he says that Mr. Pye's report for the year at Fenchoufu was the best he has heard in China. It will be printed soon in the Missionary Herald and we must read it. At Taikusien, twenty-four members have been received. Five places of refuge are maintained for men and women who seek to break the chains of the opium habit. During the winter, 196 have been helped and eighty-two have given up opium smoking, other patients have been cured in the hospitals. The cultivation of the poppy, whence opium is derived, has been forbidden by the Chinese government and the law is widely enforced.

The Oberlin men and women are planning great things for Shansi. Nearly all those slain by the Boxers in 1900 were from their college. There is a beautiful memorial arch on the campus but they project a new Oberlin in China! Already the Academy is started. Forty acres of land have been secured and buildings are being provided. I think you might secure a pamphlet telling more about this great endeavor by writing Prof. G. Walter Fiske, of Oberlin. While I have mentioned some of those engaged in this work, I must not forget Dr. and Mrs. W. A. Heminway, Mrs. Corbin, Miss Flora Heebner, Miss Daisie Gehman.

Mr. Corbin has written a noble appeal for Christian education in China. When one thinks what Oberlin has achieved for the homes and hearts here, we are thrilled by the possibilities of a Christian school in the great Mongolian empire:

"We call you to reproduce yourself,
Mother of colleges, in this ancient land.
Build here another Oberlin, to give
Your great ideals to those who sorely need."

Perhaps some of the Christian Endeavorers may be among those who will go to teach in that new college in the far East.

Words on Machinery

Chicago

Chicago's Secretary Visits Centennial City

The Centennial spirit which is everywhere abroad reached Chicago as early as anywhere. For a considerable time we have been planning how we might fittingly cooperate with our brethren in making this year one long to be remembered in the annals of the church. After making a centennial offering of $1,000 to Dr. Dye's work in Africa, we have made arrangements for a special train to Pittsburg next fall. In the carrying out of this plan the writer was made Transportation Manager and instructed to go to Pittsburg and complete all necessary arrangements for the comfort of the Chicago party. This we did and in addition have traveled over the historic spots of the work of the Campbells with camera and notebook. We would be recreant in duty if we did not pease for awhile in our discussions of conditions in Chicago and present some of the impressions which made the trip an epoch-making one for one person at least.

We left Chicago one evening and when we woke up the next morning the splendid train over the Pennsylvania line had almost reached Pittsburg. As we ate our breakfast, the train was speeding down the valley of the Alleghany river and the most charming panorama of river scenery was presented through the car window. The dweller of the plains gets an impression from the hills that can not come to the man who has no memory of anything else than hilly country. As we looked at the splendid hills of the western Pennsylvania country, we did not wonder that the hills of Palestine were a continual invitation to the establishment of religious cult outside the orthodox faith. Native religion untaught and unguided fills a man's soul in the midst of this wonderful handiwork of the great Creator.

Clouds of Smoke.

We soon left this scenery, however, to view the depredations which man had mdae in these wonderful valleys. The clouds of smoke announce our near approach to the city of Pittsburg. As we came nearer we saw the countless chimneys that belched forth smoke and spoke of the commercial activity of this great manufacturing center. As we stepped from the train out upon the street, a cosmopolitan city with great skyscrapers and with busy traffic was before us.

We set ourselves the task of seeing the city, that we might guage its spirit and might know its problems.

Pittsburg has much of idealism on one hand and much of vulgar commercialism on the other. We found a jeweler's window where diamond necklaces and pearl ornaments were advertised for $50,000 and where the invitation read "Come in and see something expensive." We saw the residence of a man who had fourteen automobiles for his own use. We say many evidences of the vulgar display of wealth and the reckless expenditure of money that might have been used for the blessing of many a poor life.

Not only did we find the unblushing ostentation of wealth, and the waste of money among the upper classes, but we found deep degradation among the poor. An indication of the state of the temperance reform of Pittsburg is found in the picture we took of the advertisement of a church picnic in a saloon window. We have never found this unblushing partnership in beer-soaked Chicago. The underworld used the best streets of the city in the evening for various forms of traffic that have long since been banished from State street in Chicago.

In the midst of the misery of the poor, we found that a great part of the foreign population which carries on the industrial operations in the factories was alienated from the church. Some were Socialists and believed that Socialism was incompatible with church membership. Some were anarchists. Almost all had a deep sense of the social injustice that was manifested on every hand in the city's life.

Splendid Institutions of Pittsburg.

Yet against the memory of Homestead and its riots, we must place the story of some of the splendid institutions of Pittsburg. If the city has no parks worthy of so great a city, it does have some most splendid public institutions. Hospitals are abundant. The Carnegie Music Hall rivals any public institution in all of Chicago. It encourages living artists and has a most splendid exhibition of their work. It has a museum with collections of the greatest scientific interest. It has a splendid public library in the building run on the most modern kind of basis. The building is a perfect wonderland where one would love to spend days and even weeks. There is the great Carnegie Technical school and the Pittsburg University. All of these educational opportunities make it possible for the working man to rise above his condition and to give his children a different sore of place in the social scale.

A Strange Partnership. .(Note Church Announcement.)

The sight-seer wants to see the great industrial operations of the city. At the home of the "57 varieties," he is given a lunch. This fact should be put down in our Chicago note-books to be recalled when funds get low next fall. This factory invites the visitor. At the great steel mills, however, the visitor is rigorously excluded. There is some danger from the unitiated to stand around the pouring of molten metal. As the rollers mash the red hot steel into form, the hissing rods would leave marks upon the careless sight-seer. Then it is said that in these great plants there are secret processes that might be stolen by spies so the camera man is rigorously excluded. We were fortunate, however, to find a source of influence that secured a promise that fifty of our party might go through the famous Homestead mills.

Chicago Headquarters at Centennial

There is only one hotel in Pittsburg in the convention district, for the convention district is four miles from the business district in the Schenley Park district, or the East End as it is also called. The Schenley Hotel has all of its rooms engaged for the convention period now. R. A. Long will entertain all of the pensioners of the Ministerial Relief at his own expense as well as many members of his own congregation in Kansas City. The officials of the societies have engaged their places and thus months before-hand this splendid hotel is all engaged.

The Christian Century party from Chicago will have headquarters at the Hotel Henry in the business district. This house is one of the very best of the business district. It will take care of 200 of our party. The rates are as reasonable as at any reputable hotel in the city, being $1.50 per day, European plan, and $2.50 with two in a room, the prices ranging higher for rooms with bath. The hotel has a beautiful lobby where the convention fellowship will be in full sway. It is new and modern and the manager is determined that nothing shall be left undone to make us quite at home during our stay in Pittsburg. Pittsburg is adequately supplied with good hotels and the normal business in the fall time fills all of the good places. It is therefore of the highest importance that those who wish to stop at a hotel in Pittsburg instead of at a dwelling house should engage rooms at once. Those stopping at the Hotel Henry should write direct to the Christian Century office.

Pittsburg is western rather than eastern in spirit. Its citizens go at a Chicago rate, and its streets often present the busy spectacle of State street. While older in years, its recent development makes it even less conventional than more western cities. It is full of the most interesting things and we will count ourselves fortunate that our convention falls in a city where there is so much to learn in addition to convention business.

Chicago Church Notes.

W. L. Carr, of Indianapolis, is in the University of Chicago again this summer.

C. G. Kindred remains at the bedside of his sister, Miss Susan Kindred, of Pittsfield, Ill. Her condition is critical.

We have an unusual number of Disciples at the University of Chicago this summer. The courses offered are of unusual merit.

J. L. McBean is supplying the pulpit at Oak Park while they determine on the program for the future.

The church at Irving Park is trying to solve the Sunday evening problem by having out-of-door services on Sunday evenings.

Rev. Mr. Maurer, of Nebraska, who is studying at the University of Chicago this summer will preach at Douglas Park next Sunday morning.

There have been additions at the Sheffield Avenue Church for several Sundays recently. There are many items of encouragement in the work of the church.

The pastor of the Evanston church presented stereopticon pictures of his trip to Pittsburg, Brush Run and Bethany on a recent Sunday evening to a large and appreciative audience.

Dr. Ames, pastor Hyde Park, will be absent from his pulpit for six weeks following the last Sunday in July. During the vacation all services of the church will be conducted by the assistant pastor. R. W. Gentry.

At Falls City, Nebraska

F. Ellsworth Day moved to Falls City six months ago at the earnest request of the State Board and arranged with Lintt and Lockhart to assist him in an evangelistic campaign. Mr. Day spent these six months in getting acquainted with conditions and had made splendid preparation so that there were converts from the start of the meeting.

The meetings were held in the city auditorium, which is a large tabernacle used for Chautauqua purposes, seating some 1,500 people, and was frequently crowded. In writing of the meeting W. J. Lockhart says: "W. F. Lintt had a chorus of one hundred voices assisted by two pianos and a splendid orchestra. I cannot speak too highly of Brother Lintt. He has been with me since last November, and will continue during the coming year. He wins everywhere because of his Christian bearing, his intense earnestness, his genuine worth and ability. Briefly summarized, I note the following results of the meeting: 1. One hundred and forty-nine people responded to the invitation; not a single evening of the meeting passed without additions. Eighteen of these united with the Baptist church, which church led by their pastor entered heartily into the meeting, and at the close contributed as a church and individually to the expense of the meeting.

2. We secured the largest hearing the Christian church ever had in Falls City. The saloon element and the Catholic crowd worked hard against us, but the church people gave us their sympathy and presence and by the close of the meeting dismissed all their evening services to be with us. The pastors of the other churches were unusually courteous.

3. Evangelism as many expressed it, 'was redeemed in Falls City.' Certain evangelists in former years had prejudiced the entire town against evangelists in general. It took us two weeks to overcome this, but I never saw such a complete change of sentiment ome over a town as took place in Falls City the last weeks of our meetings.

4. The heavy expenses of the meeting was more than provided for and a neat sum left in the treasury.

5. Brother Day's salary was increased $200 with the generous support of every member of the board and church. Brother Day is completely entrenched in the hearts of the people. They believe in him and are following him as he leads on in a new church building enterprise. The new building is demanded and will be secured."

Bible College of Christian University

Since the recent generous endowment gift of $50,000 by R. H. Stockton, it seems proper that a statement should be made concerning the work and prospects of that department of Christian university in which our brotherhood is as a whole most interested. My connection of two years with the Bible College has afforded an ample opportunity to study its purpose, spirit and opportunities for the education of ministerial students.

Situated, as it is, in the extreme northeast corner of the state of Missouri, with other schools of the brotherhood in a more central position in many states, it would seem to possess few points in its favor, and be seriously handicapped by reason of location. This, however, when other observations are made, may not appeal to its disadvantage. Usually the young man who enters the ministry is beset with difficulties growing out of either his finances or his inexperience. In either case, he is more interested in the school which can assist him just at this point than in the mere matter of geographical location.

It is in these two respects that this school has been of the greatest benefit to the ministerial student. The field for service and employment among the churches in this region is immense. We have not been able to supply the churches with preachers within the territory of Missouri, Illinois and Iowa accessible to students from Canton. A large number of the students are now supporting themselves easily, and at least twenty-five of these are married. Owing to cheap rentals and provisions the cost of living is much less than in many larger cities.

As for students without experience in preaching, opportunities for public speaking are amply provided for in literary societies and in the department of elocution in the college. Some loan funds are avaliable for a limited number of ministerial students to assist them financially. Other means of financial support are often found by the ambitious student. An industrial farm from which students might receive remuneration till able to preach acceptably would be an excellent feature in connection with school. A tract of land in the rich Mississippi Valley near the university grounds could no doubt be easily secured for this worthy purpose, if some friend of the school would supply the needed funds. Many students have written us requesting such opportunities to make their way through school, and these are usually afterward the strongest graduates in our schools. Many would thus be saved to the service of the church. A more deserving and effective missionary offering could hardly be made.

The past year has been one of great prosperity to the College of the Bible. Its increase has been eighty-five per cent over the attendance of the previous year. Its evangelistic spirit is shown in the number of additions to the churches, over 1,260 being reported by the students alone, last year. With a worthy increase in the endowment and hopeful prospects of further liberality on the part of its friends, the future of the school seems bright indeed. Students who are interested and desire further information regarding courses of study may address Pres. Carl Johann, or the writer, Chas. A. Lockhart, Dean, College of the Bible.

Mary's Wedding

A Maryland man recently married off his fourth daughter, the ceremonies touching whose wedding were given much attention by the "society editors" of the country papers in that region.

A week or two after the wedding a friend who had been north for some time met the father, to whom he made some jocular references in regard to the recent "event." "I see by one paper," said he, "that Mary's wedding 'well nigh beggared description.'"

"Well," said the old man, "I don't know about that, but I do know it well nigh beggared me."—January Lippincott's.

John R. Golden was the principal speaker at a union meeting of the churches of Virden, Ill., held Sunday afternoon, July 4.

Annual convention of the churches of Pike County, Ill., will be held at Independence, July 24 and 255.

The First Church, Bloomington, Ill., Edgar Jones, Pastor, has invited the members of the First Baptist Church, which is temporarily without a pastor, to meet with them.

J. E. Teaney and B. H. Cleaver, of Canton, Mo., directed the dedication of Mt. Hope Church, near Perry, Ralls County, Mo., on June 27. Cost of building, $1,200.00, which was fully met on dedication day. Brother Teaney, the pastor, begins a meeting August 25. This makes seventeen churches in Ralls County, most of which are rural, but are alive and growing.

J. H. Gilliland has resigned the pastorate of the Second Church, Bloomington, Ill., to take charge of the new East Side Centennial Church. Mr. Gilliland has been a pastor in Bloomington for twenty-five years. He began at the First Church, then left it to build the Second. Now it is the Second's time to give him up for his third church building enterprise.

T. F. Van Voorhis, father of W. D. Van Voorhis, pastor of the church at Bellaire, Ohio, fell asleep in Jesus, May 31. He was 74 years old. He had been a Christian since his early childhood, and an elder in the church at Bladersburg, Knox Co., for over 50 years. He was a soldier in the war 45 years ago. He was a man of wide influence for every good work, and was loved and honored by all who knew him. While he never assumed the title of "preacher," yet performed all its duties as pastor, conducted funerals, solemnized marriages. He was secretary of his missionary district for twenty years, and was one of the best and truest friends I ever knew. His house had the Prophet's chamber. He was the warm friend and support of the preachers of Christ. He leaves a wife, two sons and two daughters, grandchildren and a host of friends.

ORIGIN
Of a Famous Human Food.

The story of great discoveries or inventions is always of interest.

An active brain worker who found himself hampered by lack of bodily strength and vigor and could not carry out the plans and enterprises he knew how to conduct, was led to study various foods and their effects upon the human system. In other words before he could carry out his plans he had to find a food that would carry him along and renew his physical and mental strength.

He knew that a food which was a brain and nerve builder, (rather than a mere fat maker), was universally needed. He knew that meat with the average man does not accomplish the desired results. He knew that the soft gray substance in brain and nerve centers is made from Albumen and Phosphate of Potash obtained from food. Then he started to solve the problem.

Careful and extensive experiments evolved Grape-Nuts, the now famous food. It contains the brain and nerve building food elements in condition for easy digestion.

The result of eating Grape-Nuts daily is seen in a marked sturdiness and activity of the brain and nervous system, making it a pleasure for one to carry on the daily duties without fatigue or exhaustion.

Grape-Nuts food is in no sense a stimulant but is simply food which renews and replaces the daily waste of brain and nerves.

Its flavor is charming and being fully and thoroughly cooked at the factor it is served instantly with cream.

The signature of the brain worker spoken of, C. W. Post, is to be seen on each genuine package of Grape-Nuts.

With the Workers

Alvin Hottell becomes pastor of the church at Frederick, Kans.

A. A. Beery closes his work with the church at Hillsboro, Ore., Sept. 1.

J. R. Perkins, pastor of the church at Fresno, California, preached at the West Side Church, San Francisco, June 27.

O. P. Spiegel is in a meeting at Nashville, Ga., where the church has been organized but a little more than a year.

Andrew P. Johnson, pastor of the church at Fayette, Mo., is available for a meeting during July or August.

J. R. Blunt has entered upon his work with the church in South of his ministry with the church.

After two years of successful work, B. W. Bass leaves the church at Roseburg, Ore., and will be succeeded by J. N. McConnell.

Here are some churches in Michigan that are changing pastors: Muir, Kalkaska, Muskegon, Battle Creek and Paw Paw.

Claud Trampton of Elkhart, Ind., has been called to the pastorate of the church at Rowbridge, Michigan.

W. B. Harter, after a three months' supply with the church at Sterling, Colo., has become permanent pastor of the congregation.

Homer Sala closes two years' successful work with the church at Wellsville, Ohio, July 20.

Austin Hunter, Indianapolis, Ind., general evangelist, is spending his vacation at Boise, Idaho, where he preached for the First Church, June 20.

J. E. Lynn, pastor of the First Church, Warren, was the preacher at the union service of the churches of the city held in the Presbyterian church July 11.

The Endeavor Society of the church at Lincoln, Neb., elected Mr. George Cooper as their delegate to the International Christian Endeavor meeting in Minneapolis.

There are frequent additions and all departments of the work of the church at Milan, Mo., are prospering under the leadership of N. S. Robertson.

G. A. Ragan, formerly pastor at Winters, Cal., now principal of the high school at Santa Cruz, supplied the pulpit at San Jose, June 27.

The Highland Park Church, Los Angeles, observed Children's Day June 27. There were five confessions. The offering to missions was $45. Carl L. Green is the pastor.

W. E. Bobbitt, Woodland, California, preached the baccalaureate sermon for the high school there. His subject was "Building a Palace for a Man's Soul."

The First Church, Louisville, Ky., has purchased a beautiful lot in one of the best parts of the city, and will begin at once the erection of a new house of worship.

A new $15,000 church building was dedicated at Monessen, Pa., Sunday, June 11, with President Cramblett of Bethany College in charge of the service.

The Calhoun Street Church, Baltimore, gave a very hearty reception to their new pastor, F. H. Scott, the first of this month. Addresses were delivered by Peter Ainslie and Mr. Clemens.

The announcement of the death of Mrs. George A. Bellamy of Hiram House, Cleveland, has just appeared. The editors of THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY extend their sympathy to Mr. Bellamy and his family.

Chas. J. Burton lays down the reins as president of Oskaloosa College, Oskaloosa, Ia., and has been succeeded by Edwin D. Kiser. Mr. Burton will reside temporarily at Eureka Springs, Ark.

R. Linn Cave was the preacher at the West End Church, Atlanta, Ga., June 27. The building here has just been redecorated and furnished at an expense of several hundred dollars.

Miss Bertha Clawson, missionary under the F. C. M. S. to Japan, is returning to America for a brief rest. She has rendered valuable service in the girls' school in Tokyio.

B. S. Denny has again been asked by the churches of Iowa to serve them another year as corresponding secretary. He is one of our most efficient men.

N. A. Davis, who recently came to this country from New Zealand, and from the Baptist church took membership with the First Church, Berkeley, supplied at the West End Church, San Francisco, Sunday, July 4.

Without having to call upon others to help, the church at Okmulgee, Okla., reports ninety-four additions to their membership during the past year. B. F. Hill is the enterprising pastor.

"If you don't go to Pittsburg in October, you will be explaining to two generations why you did not go," says W. R. Warren. If you do not go on the Chicago special you will ever after wonder why you did not.

The church at Deer Creek, Ill., just closed a meeting with forty additions, nearly all grown people, F. A. Sword, the evangelist, and Charles E. McVey of Hardy, Neb., the singer.

The First Church, Birmingham, Ala., has granted its pastor, Dr. A. R. Moore, a vacation that he may regain his health. He is at present taking treatment in a sanitarium in Atlanta.

Prof. James Bever, for five years principal of the high school at North Yakima, Wash., and superintendent of the Christian Sunday-school has been elected to a professorship in the state normal at Bellingham.

Miss Esther Thulin, a member of the church at Davenport, Ia., has fully committed herself to service as a foreign missionary and will enter Drake University in the autumn to prepare for her future work.

E. W. Thornton, formerly pastor of the church at Long Beach, Calif., and more recently giving his time to Sunday-school work in the state, has accepted a call to the Naomi Avenue Church, Los Angeles.

After three years of successful work as pastor of the Memorial Church, Rock Island, W. B. Clemmer has resigned and will enter the general evangelistic field. He may also give some time to Sunday-school work.

W. J. Lhamon, Columbia, Mo., is holding a meeting with the church at Appleton City, Mo. Mr. Lhamon is just entering upon this work, in which we predict for him a high degree of success.

W. M. Taylor closes his work with the church at New Orleans, La., the first of October. Mr. Taylor has been with this church three years, during which time the strength of the church has been doubled.

Good reports come to us from every hand of the addresses made by President Bates, Hiram College, during his recent visit to Michigan, where he attended the state convention. Michigan seems glad to claim him as her son.

E. E. Violett and F. M. Charlton began a meeting at Macon, Ga., May 18, closing June 8. There were fifty-four accessions to the church. Excellent preparation had been made by the church and they are happy over the results.

J. B. Holmes, pastor of the church at Beaumont, Texas, is to close his work there Sept. 1 and return to the Pacific coast where he formerly did a great work as pastor at Albany, Oregon. He will engage in evangelistic work.

The average attendance upon Sunday-school at Tipton, Ind., for the month of June was 480; the average collection $15.24. There were eight additions to the church by baptism at regular services during the month. G. I. Hoover is the minister.

A. W. Taylor, pastor of the Irving Park Church, Chicago, has been in Eureka, managing the Eureka Chautauqua. He remains president of the association, at the earnest solicitation of the members of the Board of Trustees.

A Centennial Club is being organized among the members of the Jefferson Street Church, New York. This seems an excellent way to arouse interest in the convention, and to prepare those who will go by personal acquaintance and conversation to get the most from the trip.

At the inauguration of a night school for adults, undertaken by the teachers of Monterey, with the co-operation of the leading government officials, S. G. Inman was chief speaker. Mr. Inman is a university graduate and is making his influence felt in Mexico.

A church of fifty-one members was organized at Columbus, Ga., June 27, by E. R. Clarkson and Homer Williams. The organization came at the close of a four weeks meeting. G. H. Hinnant, who has just graduated from the Bible College, Lexington, Ky., is the pastor of the new church.

E. W. Allen, one of the most efficient men in Kansas, has resigned as pastor of the church at Wichita, where he has served for three years, during which time the church has grown rapidly in numerical strength, and has erected a beautiful and modern house of worship. Mr. Allen's work has been remarkable. His resignation will take effect Sept. 1.

W. H. Hanna, returned missionary from the Philippines, is now at 5441 Madison Ave., Chicago, and will be glad to visit churches easily accessible, and tell them of the progress of the work in these islands. He is one of the best missionaries, and the churches near Chicago have a rare opportunity this summer to have this interesting work presented to them in a masterly way.

Stanley Grubb, who has been pastor of the church at Columbia, S. C., for near five years and has done a most commendable work there, has accepted a call to the church at Athens, Ga. Mr. Grubb is a graduate of Kentucky University and Butler College. Mrs. Grubb is a graduate of Hiram College and New York State Normal, and in every way well equipped for the position of pastor's wife.

The Second Church, Milwaukee, Wisconsin, has purchased a fine lot at the corner of Park place and Prospect avenue. A tabernacle has been erected and the first service

COULDN'T FOOL HIM

Doctor was firm and Was Right.

Many doctors forbid their patients to drink coffee, but the patients still drink it on the sly and thus spoil all the doctor's efforts, and keep themselves sick.

Sometimes the doctor makes sure that the patient is not drinking coffee, and there was a case of that kind in St. Paul, where a business man said:

"After a very severe illness last winter which almost caused my death, the doctor said Postum was the only thing that I could drink and he just made me quit coffee and drink Postum. My illness was caused by indigestion from the use of tea and coffee.

"The state of my stomach was so bad that it became terribly inflamed and finally resulted in a rupture. I had not drunk Postum very long before my lost blood was restored and I have now been using Postum for almost a year. When I got up from bed after my illness I weighed 98 pounds and now my weight is 120.

"There is no doubt that Postum was the cause of this wonderful improvement. I shall never go back to tea or coffee but shall always stick to the food drink that brought me back to health and strength."

Look for the little book, "The Road to Wellville," in pkgs. "There's a Reason."

held in it Sunday, July 11. Sherman Kirk, the preacher, has just come from Des Moines to take charge of this work and will reside during the summer at 542 Frederick avenue. In this effort the Second Church has had the friendly assistance of the First Church of which C. L. Waite is the pastor.

V. W. Blair has accepted a call to the Payne Avenue Church, North Tonawanda, N. Y. This decision was not reached until after Mr. Blair had spent two weeks with the church, studying its needs and the condition of the field. This indicates a tendency toward greater care on the part of both preacher and church about entering the pastoral relationship. Mr. Blair did a good work at Greenfield, Ind., and we predict for him an effective ministry in the Empire State.

"The Wharton Memorial Home" for the children of missionaries will be opened at Hiram, Ohio, October 1. This provides a needed equipment of our missionary society, and will bring great relief to the missionaries. The children will have free tuition at Hiram College, whose trustees have been generous in their provision for the home. F. W. Norton has rendered valuable service in making possible the gathering together of the funds for this home without expense to the Foreign Society.

A. Lyle DeJarnette, pastor of the First Church, Santa Cruz, is conducting a series of fellowship services. On June 4 the Methodist minister spoke on "Religious Doubt." On the 11th the Congregational minister made an address on "The Holy Spirit." This was followed on June 18 by an address from the Episcopal minister on "Christian Unity." June 24 the Presbyterian pastor spoke on "The Lordship of Jesus." Others will follow. There are additions almost every week to the church.

W. H. Bagby, pastor at Missoula, Montana, writes as follows: 'On account of the lateness of the spring, commencement, bridges out of commission, etc., etc., Childrens Day was not observed by our Sunday-school till yesterdan; but it was a large success in every way when it did come. In addition to the splendid program rendered by the children, Harvard Saxton, who is resting for a while with his wife in this delightful mountain retreat, sang one of his magnificent solos. The audience packed the house and the offering amounted to $35.00."

The CHRISTIAN CENTURY has already announced the generous offer of R. A. Long of the Independence Ave. Church, Kansas City, to give the lot and erect a $50,000 building to be used for Sunday-school purposes. We are glad to call attention to this again, as an indication of a tendency to make more adequate provision for the teaching ministry of the church. This must receive increasing attention. A Baptist church of St. Louis has a $150,000 building devoted entirely to this purpose, and has engaged as "Educational Director" a man with the best university training.

The Foreign Society has announced that E. W. Allen, whose resignation as pastor of the church at Wichita, Kans., is announced in these notes, has been chosen as one of the secretaries of the Foreign Society, and will begin his new duties Sept. 1. He will be located in Kansas City and will have charge of a Western District. Mr. Allen has a fine record as pastor, and leaves that work for the missionary secretaryship only because he believes absolutely in the importance of the foreign work, and is glad to commit his life to it. We congratulate the Foreign Society and extend our best wishes for the success of the new office.

F. F. Grim, corresponding secretary of West Texas and New Mexico, has had to undergo an operation for appendicitis. But he is now out of the hospital and resting in a secluded spot in the mountains. He is doing a valuable work in Mexico, and THE CHRISTIAN CENTURY hopes that he may soon be in his usual health again. Mr. Grim was for a time office editor of The Century and has never lost interest in its work.

A. C. Smither, pastor of the First Church, Los Angeles, Calif., has merged the Sunday-school service and the morning service into one, following the plan of the Long Beach Church.

The Bible school of North Tonawanda, where V. W. Blair has just became pastor, will begin a campaign in September under the leadership of Miss Eva Lemerts.

A. J. Bradshaw, Shroud, Okla., reports thirty-two additions at regular services, July 4, eighteen by confession, fourteen by statement.

The Children's Day exercises at Cameron, Mo, July 4, were enjoyed by a large audience, which made an offering of $48.00.

Frank Thompson, evangelist, has just closed a meeting with the church at Marietta, Okla., in which there were fifty-three additions to the church. D. L. Bond, the pastor, is now leading the church in a building project.

A. T. Gordon, pastor at Niles, Ohio, announces the following sermons for Sunday evenings, during July— "A Man of Patriotism," "A Man of Daring Power," "A Man of Decision," "A Man of the Present." The Children's Day offering of this church was $40. The average attendance of the school for June was 263.

The Rural Schools of DeWitt County held their graduating exercises at Weldon Springs, near Clinton, Illinois, June 26. One hundred and fifty received certificates of promotion from the seventh grade into the eighth, and eighty were promoted into the High School course. H. H. Peters of Eureka delivered the patrons' address in the forenoon and Prof. W. J. Sutherland of St. Paul, Minn., spoke in the afternoon. Rev. Albert Schwartz, pastor of the Christian Church in Clinton, was on the program. T. C. Wampler of Clinton is the County Superintendent of Schools and is doing extraordinary service. He is a member of the Christian Church and takes an active part in the affairs of the church. Mr. Peters was introduced as the Field Secretary for Eureka College and was thus given an opportunity indirectly to get the cause of Eureka before the young people and patrons of DeWitt County. He spoke on "Educational Ideals."

Inland Empire Day was very generally observed by our Endeavor Societies. No more attractive or inspiring study could have engaged the young folks upon the nation's birthday. The offerings are already coming in. Secretary Denton made full preparation for the day, and pushed his plans right up to July 1 when he left the Home Office for his new charge. His heart is in the work still and he is very enxious that the Endeavorers should stamp the impress of their glowing influence upon that great and growing portion of our country designated as the Inland Empire. Every Endeavorer ought to feel a laudable pride in the rapid and permanent establishment of the Apostolic Church in this portion of America.

Lafayette,Ind., June 23: It was my pleasure to dedicate a union church building at West Point, White county, Ind. So hearty and loyal had been the fellowship in this enterprise that the work was completed "without the sound of a hammer." There was no raising of money, not even a collection taken. There is something both comforting and inspiring about such a dedication. It was a "quiet success" and I have no hesitancy in proclaiming myself "quite a success" in dedicating churches where there is nothing to do. If such was to be my life-work, however, I fear I should never have such a list of "church dedications" as Brother Carpenter though I lived to see the Second Centennial. Why not make Non-money-raising-church-dedications another Centennial aim? I am willing.—A. W. Conner.

—Andrew Carnegie has arranged to give $1,000,000 for the establishment of a "hero fund" in France, under practically the same conditions as govern similar funds in the United States, England and Scotland. Mr. Carnegie has been showered with attentions while in France.

Centennial Bulletin

W. R. Warren, Centennial Secretary

Pittsburg's Four Stupendous Tasks.

From the beginning of the Centennial Campaign every one who has given the matter a moment's thought has realized that the city which has undertaken to entertain the Centennial Convention has on its hands four stupendous tasks. The first was to secure halls sufficient for the sessions of the convention. Second, to find comfortable rooms at reasonable rates to house the multitude of delegates. Third, to arrange for adequate transportation between the halls and the homes. Fourth, to provide ample restaurants near the places of meeting. The Pittsburg Convention Committee has addressed itself to the solution of these four problems with the understanding that it will probably have on its hands as may as 30,000 people at one time to make up the aggregate attendance of 50,000 which veerybody predicts.

The Centennial Auditoriums.

All these are grouped about the entrance to Schenley Park, just at the edge of Pittsburg's best residence district, and fifteen minutes by street car from any depot. One is the Carnegie Music Hall, which represents a part of Mr. Andrew Carnegie's gift of twenty million dollars toward the development of the higher life of this community. It will seat 2,500. Another is the new Soldiers' and Sailors' Memorial Hall of Allegheny County, which is just being finished at a cost of a million and a quarter dollars, and will seat 3,500. Third is Duquesne Garden, which is to Pittsburg what Madison Square is to New York City. It has been the scene of grand operas, church conventions, bowling congresses, automobile shows and every other variety of popular gathering. Its capacity is 8,000. Fourth is Forbes Field, with its steel and concrete amphitheater in the open. The first story alone of this has 12,000 seats, and can be arranged with sound proof partitions into three magnificent auditoriums of 3,000, 4,000 and 5,000 respectively. This entire structure will be used as a unit for the communion service. It accommodated 30,338 people by actual count on June 30.

In reserve we are holding Luna Park, the high class recreation ground that is never opened on Sunday, with a number of large and well appointed pavilions and halls. It is only four or five blocks from the Centennial Quadrangle. The four chief buildings mentioned above form the corners of this Quadrangle, and are from two to four squares apart, with the Schenley Hotel, the general headquarters, midway between the two nearest.

Hotels for the Centennial.

Every first class hotel in the city is under pledge to our entertainment committee to furnish accommodations to its utmost capacity without advance in price in any case, but on the contrary with substantial reductions where two or more go together in one room. These rates range from $1.00 up, on the European plan, and from $2.00 up, on the American plan. Reservations to the number of nearly 400 have already been made at the Schenley at the definite rates mentioned. Hundreds of reservations have also been made at other hotels.

Since many of our people will go two or more in a room, it is to the interest of these hotels to turn aside all but the most particular of their regular guests. Furthermore, both public spirit and self-interest prompt them to join in the general endeavor of the city to maintain and even improve its good name, with the tens of thousands of representative people that will take part in the centennial celebration.

Committees made up of the best people in our twenty-seven Greater Pittsburg churches are canvassing all the residence districts and making up a list of 30,000 desirable rooms which our people may have at prices ranging from 50 cents per day to $1.00 according to the location and other advantages.

Feeding the Centennial Multitudes.

All the regular restaurants of the city, and they are many and good, and reasonable in their charges, are preparing to put on extra service for the Centennial Week. They can thus accommodate the entire host. But knowing that most of our people will want to have their meals in the vicinity of the Centennial halls, we are arranging for special service at popular prices in the well-appointed dining rooms of the Carnegie Institute, and the five Protestant churches of the neighborhood. The dining room of the Schenley Hotel will serve meals to a thousand extra guests at reduced prices. In addition to all of these, an immense temporary restaurant will be fitted up either at Luna Park or right within the Centennial Quadrangle. All of these places will be under contract with the committee, and our guests will be absolutely safeguarded against exhorbitant rates, and at the same time guaranteed first class service.

Centennial Street Car Service.

Sixteen lines of street cars pass right through the Centennial Quadrangle. Fortunately we do not have to depend upon estimates as to what these can do in addition to their regular traffic. Wednesday, June 30, Forbes Field was opened for the first time. The cars were run in trains and on extra schedule, and though the attendance reached 30,338, all were carried promptly and without mishap. Both the B. & O. and the Pennsylvania R. R. had arranged to run shuttle trains, but when the time arrived these were found unnecessary and entirely abandoned. Pittsburg's transportation lines can deliver to the Centennial Quadrangle for any given service not only 30,000, which we expect to take part in the Lord's Supper, Sunday, October 17, but three times that number. Over 40,000 attended the baseball games in Forbes Field July 5, while other tens of thousands were using the same cars to reach the parks and other places of interest. Even then the railroads were not brought into requisition at all.

The Centennial Guarantee.

Any one who has any misgivings at any point may be reassured by considering that the 20,000 Disciples of Western Pennsylvania are expectig the Centennial to advance the cause in this region more than ten years of ordinary activity. The contrary would be true if we failed to properly handle this great convention. Those who live here have more at stake than those who come to tarry for a week. Even if we were not Christians and your brethren, we could not afford to see you neglected.

The better people of the city of Pittsburg are keenly alive to the fact that two or three profligate millionaries, and possibly one per cent more smoke than the ordinary city raises, have been used by the newspapers of the country to create altogether a wrong impression of both the moral and material atmosphere of this splendid metropolis. They are anxious to have the largest possible number of representative people visit the city, and they are even more deeply concerned to have them so entertained while here that they will be glad to come again.

That these are not just empty words is attested by the $8,000 subscribed by our churches, and $12,000 by our business interests toward the expense fund of the Centennial Convention.

Brethren, this is to be the greatest convention of all history, not only in the number and character of the delegates that attend, and in the magnitude of the achievements which they report, but in the local arrangements for the comfort and enjoyment of all who come, both in the meetings and between the sessions.

As We Go to Press

Angola, Ind., July 6.—Yesterday greatest day in the history of Angola Church, thirty-eight added at last invitation, four hundred in twenty days. New church enterprise launched at morning service with $15,300. New edifice will be erected immediately. Tremendous rejoicing. County campaign splendid success. Brother Scoville, where he attended college, united with the Christian church and preached his first sermon, has wrought a really marvelous work. All his helpers are deserving of unstinted praise.—Vernon Stauffer, minister.

Wheeling, W. Va., July 11.—Home for three weeks after country meeting at old Austin town, Ohio, Church. Fifty-two added and nearly all by confession, forty-eight over twelve years of age; many men; several fine new families and heads of families won. Fellowship and rejoicing supreme. Pastor Thompson and wife much beloved. Some open dates for hard field. Permanent address, Wheeling, W. Va.—Rufus A. Finnell, Evangelist.

McLeansboro, Ill., July 12, 1909.—Brethren, all that has been said about this wonderful man is true, it would be a great thing if every one of our churches could hear his sermon on "Is not this the Christ?" they make you feel; "Woe is me if I preach not the Gospel." You must work for Jesus. Our tent is too small for the crowds. He certainly draws and holds men. Additions? yes, right along.—Chas. Coleman, Minister.

Prof. Sherman Kirk, of Drake University, preached in his former church at Fairbury, Neb., July 4, to the great delight of the church. Thos. A. Maxwell is pastor at Fairbury.

J. M. Lowe, of Kansas, is arranging to move to Des Moines, Iowa, where he will reside and give himself to evangelistic work.

A Match

By Algernon Charles Swinburne.

"If love were what the rose is,
And I were like the leaf,
Our lives would grow together
In sad or singing weather,
Blown fields or flowerful closes,
Green pleasure or gray grief;
If love were what the rose is,
And I were like the leaf.

"If I were what the words are,
And love were like the tune,
With double sound and single
Delight our lips would mingle,
With kisses glad as birds are
That get sweet rain at noon;
If I were what the words are,
And love were like the tune.

"If you were life, my darling,
And I your love were death,
We'd shine and snow together
Ere March made sweet the weather
With daffodil and starling
And hours of fruitful breath;
If you were life, my darling,
And I your love were death.

"If you were thrall to sorrow,
And I were page to joy,
We'd play for lives and seasons
With loving looks and treasons
And tears of might and morrow
And laughs of maid and boy;
If you were thrall to sorrow,
And I were page to joy.

Vol. XXVI. CHICAGO, ILL., JULY 22, 1909. No. 30.

God's Reputation

Mr. J. Brierly in one of his essays treats of "the eternal commerce," applying suggestively the terms of trade to the relations of soul with soul, and of spiritual humanity with God. That there is a commerce between man and God is, of course, the primary thesis of our religion. And our faith asserts that this commerce is not carried on by barter or by contract, in which one party strives to get the most possible from the other, but by love in which each strives to give as much of himself to the other as he can.

In times of commercial agitation when the foundations of trade are being examined with particular care it is repeated to us again and again that the bottom stone in the foundation of business is credit. That structure called Commerce rests, like a gigantic house boat, upon the sea, whose fluid and capricious waves, once disturbed, cause consternation and panic.

Confidence, reputation, credit, faith—these are terms the use of which in business sug gests how even in Cæsar's kingdom the mind holds primacy over matter and the basic categories are not material, but spiritual.

It is easy to rise from this conception to a view of the world as a whole, in its commerce with men. In the commerce between ourselves and the universe, the important thing is confidence. And this confidence is important on both sides.

In his appeal to us God does not strive to bind us with a contract as Judaism teaches. He trusts us. He has faith in us. He reckons not with our baser possibilities, but with our honor. Likewise the maintenance of this cosmic commerce and the assurance of its enlargement depends upon God's reputation in our souls.

The primary problem of morals and religion is whether and how far God may be trusted.

The pivotal thing in redemption is for God to gain for himself a reputation among men.

Man wants the goods God offers; they are really the only goods he does want; but can God deliver them on the terms he proposes?

To our crude intelligence, used to the deceptions of sense, it seems impossible that abundant happiness, abiding peace, quickened energies and a zest to li ve can be gained for the simple fee named in God's proposal. The price is so contemptible as to awaken suspicion. Like Naaman, if the middleman had asked us to pay a great price we would have accepted the offer. But now for mere faith he promises so much! It cannot be true!

But as we turn away ten thousand voices shout at us. Voices of long ago, of yesterday, of today. They say that they have proved God. They testify that he keeps his promises. They assure us that this preposterous offer we have just rejected has a reason in it that can only be discerned after it has been accepted. And with one voice they beg us not to turn away.

And thus perhaps more than by any logic or insight of our own, we are led to faith through other people's faith. The growth of faith among men is synonymus with the growing reputation of God.

Every faithful man enhances God's reputation.

Contrariwise, every one of us is sensible of a distinct depreciation of faith when a man of moral light and leading goes wrong. We have the sense that God has failed to make good in him, and God's reputation suffers.

Does not this thought light up the program of the church and of all Christians and clarify our responsibility?

Our business is to develop for God such a reputation among men as that he can trade with them without their suspicion and hesitation.

God's business dealings with men rest absolutely upon his reputation. He fails or succeeds as his reputation falls or rises.

What church is adding most to God's reputation? That church is most divine. Its divinity is not found in its traditions, its creeds, or in any ordinances whatsoever.

Its divinity is proved in the faces and hands of its members—their radiant spirits and their helpful services.

This is how God succeeded in the beginning of his business. Those early Christians gave God a good reputation. Men despised their teaching and listened contemptuously to God's proposition as it was repeated to them, but they observed meaningfully, "How those Christians love one another."

Christian Science is giving God a reputation today for healing men's diseases. This reputation rests not on the impossible philosophy of its outlandish text book, but on the sheer fact that men and women are actually healed and walk forth with whole bodies and cheerful and peaceful hearts.

What gives Jesus his uniqueness but just this, that he added so much to the reputation of God?

How far may we trust God?—that is the heart's great question.

And Christ answered it by trusting God at every point and all the length of his experience.

The story of that experiment has gone forth to the ends of the earth. In circumstances most untoward, in poverty and sorrow and the contempt of men, and at last in tragic death, Jesus trusted God and did His will.

And because God did not fail him, but gave him triumphant peace and a sure sense of the imperishable riches of His presence and grace, God's reputation his been wondrously magnified wherever the Story has been told.

My Life

By Charles R. Wakeley.

My life is rich, abounding, for the sources whence it fills
Are exhaustless and more ancient than the everlasting hills.
It feeds in pastures ever green, where living waters flow;
It shelters 'neath the Mighty Rock which nought can overthrow.

It knows no limitations—human weakness nor disease,
'Tis flooded by the waters of immeasurable seas.
It is the life unfolding in the growing plant and vine,
As perfect and as beautiful and even more divine.

It cannot be inhibited by circumstance of earth,
Its wealth cannot be measured in the scales of human worth,
Its rise is in the ages of the generations past,
Its issue in far future generations great and vast.

Its purposes are mightier than thought hath yet conceived,
Its promises more wonderful than any plan achieved.
It finds its own fulfillment in the structure that it rears,
Ill fashioned oft by human hands and moistened much by tears.

It cannot lose itself in death, nor waste itself in pain,
But, issuing in fuller life, eternal, shall remain.

A Prayer for Souls in Pain

Help us, God of our life, to bear our pain as Thy Beloved Son bore His trials and passion, so that we may gather strength out of weakness and suffering, and consecrate our sorrows even as He did. Enable us to bear quietly whatever hardness there may be in our lot, neither exulting in our pride, nor yielding to despondency, but always relying upon Thee. And be pleased, O Thou Great Deliverer, to put an end at last to our suffering, whether in tranquil life, or at the coming of the final peace; and when Thou callest us to give an account of our stewardship of pain may we be found worthy of the recompense of those whose suffering was instead of work for Thee.—Amen.—From Dr. John Hunter's Church Almanac.

The Trend of Events

By Alva W. Taylor

LAWYERS DEFEATING LAW

It is a part of the ethics of lawyers that every man is entitled to a defence. In so far as this operates to simply procure justice it is wholesome doctrine. Of course there is no way to prevent lawyers overstepping the bounds of this ethical demand and using it as an excuse for defeating justice. Lincoln once went out and washed his hands when he found his client was guilty after he had been defending him as innocent. Great criminal lawyers are prone to boast of the number of their victories in saving clients regardless of the merits of the case. Justice thus becomes no longer justice, but a contest of wits between attorneys. Primitive peoples resort to more superstitious methods, but not less adequate in determining justice. They submit to the poison test or some form of contest that has no relation to the crime. We submit to the wit and persuasiveness of brilliant minded attorneys oftentimes and when juries escape the power of their arts and devices or their eloquence they further use their wits to invoke the technicalities of legal proceedure to defeat the justice that has won in spite of their efforts to defeat it.

THE PROCESS OF LAW DEFEATING LAW

So far as the arts of the lawyer are concerned there is no means known by which they can be confined to the actual cause of justice except by the honesty of the individual lawyer. But there will always be a dishonest lawyer for every case refused by an honest one. The second resort of those who defeat justice for a fee could be rendered more difficult at least.

A certain senator from Nebraska was found guilty some years ago of using his office as a means of profit in the renting of a building for postoffice purposes. He was clearly proven guilty and invoked technicality in procedure to clear himself. The band of nightriders in Tennessee who were recently sentenced for brutal murder have been given the relief of technical appeal and remanded to new trial. The question of guilt is not involved. If money enough is possessed to hire the right legal talent new trials can generally be gained until a dismissal of the case is granted regardless of the guilt of the defendant.

The remedy is plain, just, reasonable and would both greatly expedite justice and save millions in useless retrials. Now our courts will remand a case upon a technical error in the manner of conducting the trial or even of drawing up the indictment, regardless of the bearing the technical mistake had upon the facts involved and thus often an error by the judge or the state's attorney defeats plain justice. Let the Court of Appeals inquire into the bearing of the technical error on the facts involved and upon the cause of justice and grant an appeal only when the error affects the same. In other words, make the appeal a question of justice, not merely of technicality.

JUSTICE AT THE MERCY OF THE PROSECUTOR

The Daily Socialist of Chicago recently accused the city administration and police of being in alliance with gambling and the liquor business and more debased forms of evil for the customary wage of graft. They challenged trial for libel and claimed they had the facts. They asked the state's attorney to grant their reporters and witnesses secrecy, claiming they could not jeapordize the lives of their informants by allowing their names to become known—the saloon slugger would get them. Their theory was that the prosecutor should investigate and if charges were true, present the matter to the grand jury. The prosecutor refused to accept their agents or to investigate by their help. Instead he called them before the grand jury and they went with the threat of libel hanging over their heads if they did not make good their charges. They were promised the secrecy of the grand jury room. This they refused to trust and so would not reveal their informants. They gave a single name and found it revealed outside the jury room inside a few hours. Thus they claim they could not get indictments because of inability to reveal names of informants, but that the state's attorney can have the information and that with it he can indict the city administration. If their claim is true it is but one of many illustrations furnished in the history of the saloon and political dependencies. The prosecutor may restrain justice by refusing to use the processes of law put at his discretion.

FEDERAL INTERFERENCE WITH THE STATES WILL

If we are to be a union of states, "one and inseparable," there must be possible a federal interference with the will of any state that attempts to annul or weaken that union or in any way create disharmony among the states. The real problem arises when federal courts interfere with the will of states in things that do not trespass above named limitations or act in things where such trespass is denied. This has often been illustrated of late in the attempts of the states to legislate against corporations. Another sort of case arises in Nebraska. The federal court has issued an injunction restraining the state from putting the law into effect. Here is a case of a state legislature passing a bill with overwhelming majority and making of it a law that applies to banks chartered under state law, located in the state wholly, doing business for citizens of the state and amenable in all things to the courts of the state and yet finding their work hung up by the interference of a federal court without reasons being given. Doubtless the reasons will be given and the case will get an extended hearing, but it illustrates the danger of trespass upon states rights by federal interference.

IS THE LAW A PROFESSION OR A TRADE?

Mr. A. P. Williams, retiring president of the Illinois Bar Association, in his farewell address charged that we are in danger through the "unprecedented accumulation of wealth in the hands of the few" and that the modern system of creating corporations creates many "designing combinations and conspiracies to the detriment of the general public." They are made possible he says, by "eminent council—readily procurable for a money compensation—ready and willing, by means of every possible legal artifice, to bar legitimate inquiry into the merits of the matter, with a view to defeating the ends of justice." He further charges that lawyers can always be found who "are ever ready to prostitute their powers to the support of any cause, no matter how unworthy, at the behest of wealthy corporations or combinations." Will the law become a trade, and lawyers a mere hired class of experts to procure the satisfaction of corporation designs?

MAYOR ROSE QUALIFIES FOR ANNANIAS CLUB

Mayor Rose of Milwaukee is the valiant and earnest defender of the saloon. He meets all comers in public debate and makes out the best possible case for his clients. He uses, with pathetic earnestness, the customary evidence of the saloon advocate. In Seattle he pictured the pitiful condition of erstwhile prosperous Rockford under prohibition. Before taking it was one of the most prosperous cities of 35,000 to be found. Since taking its "pavements are dilapidated, it is overwhelmed with debt, its tax rate has increased, more liquor is sold than ever, and the city is doing business on script." All this is news to Rockford. They are doing much paving, taxes are the lowest in years and fewer time orders are being issued than under saloon license times. Besides this practically every saloon room is occupied by a legitimate business, there is little drunkenness, and the merchants say trade is better than ever.

Again Mayor Rose triumphantly showed Abraham Lincoln to be a saloon advocate by showing that he voted against a prohibition bill in the Illinois legislature back in 1839. The facts are that a county option bill was up and a Chicago saloon keeper tried to substitute a state prohibition bill for it, and Lincoln and all the temperance element voted against it and in turn enacted the county option bill. Mr. Lincoln not only voted for that local option bill, but in 1855 spoke for and supported the "Maine law" when it was up at a special election. This is on par with most saloon campaign material. Recently a public statement was made by "the trade" that liquor sales are greatly increased in Missouri since she has become so largely "dry." At the same time, in meetings of their associations, they grow frantic over the inroads made by local option.

CATHOLICS JOIN ANTI-SALOON FORCES

A great Catholic Anti-Saloon Convention will be held in Chicago from August 4 to 6. The Total Abstinence Union of Illinois met recently to arrange for it. They declared that "as the saloon has no moral right to exist, we call upon all good Catholics to work and vote for its extinction." They condemned "the saloon trade for its open and shameless violation of Sunday laws prohibiting the sale of liquors." They denounced Catholic societies that allow liquor sold at parties and picnics. A great parade will be held preceeding the convention and they expect to see 10,000 in line. Delegates to the Anti-Saloon League were appointed. When Catholicism lines up forcefully against the saloon, its last claim to a vestige of respectable support is gone. The priests could do more today to wield the balance of power against the traffic than any other agency.

A CITY BEAUTIFUL

After three years' work, the commission on plans for making Chicago beautiful has reported. They would create a city center on the west side with radiating boulevards to the city limits. At this center all civic buildings would be clustered. On the lake shore they would group all art and educational buildings, such as museums and libraries. They would have a great lake shore drive and checker the city with boulevards on every mile line. The lake would be utilized for a great harbor and for recreation piers and beaches. Halsted street would be widened into a great traffic thoroughfare and other streets made to administer to the needs of commercial and industrial Chicago. It is an admirable piece of city planning, but expensiveness would delay it long even if political Chicago should turn from saloon politics to civic welfare.

The debt-raising campaign among the Congregationalists on behalf of their missionary societies was consummated with a collection of $320,000, July 1. While this great fund was being gathered the regular inflow of gifts into the seven societies, instead of being decreased, was larger than ever before. The joint organization of the societies will push the campaign further until the fund shall have reached a half million dollars, giving them over $200,000 to distribute among the several societies for advance work. The rejoicing of our Congregational brethren is shared by all Christians.

The Northern Baptist Association has just finished its sessions at Portland, Oregon. A very large attendance was registered and a high degree of enthusiasm manifested at all of the sessions. President Harry Pratt Judson, of the University of Chicago, was reëlected President of the Convention. One of the most important reports presented and adopted was that favoring the consolidation of the leading Baptist papers into four, representing respectively New England, the Central States, the Rocky Mountain region, and the Pacific slope. Such a combination of journalistic forces would be an advantage in most of the denominations.

Little question of the feasibility of union between Baptists and Disciples can remain in any one's mind who reads the following sentiment from the Baptist Watchman: "A good Baptist brother objects to our approval of a 'creedless church.' He does not seem to be aware that the Baptist church is a creedless church. It has always been the pride of the Baptists that they have no creed. No baptist can be held to belief in anything except the New Testament, which is our sole guide in faith and practice. In being free from definitions expressed in human terms and in employing the language of the divine Word, Baptists are remarkably one in their faith and practice throughout the land. If all Christians were similarly 'creedless,' would they not find themselves unified in faith?" There are three possible explanations of the striking similarity of this form of statement to that in common currency among the Disciples: The Baptists may have learned from the Disciples to speak that way, or the Disciples may have inherited it from the Baptists, or, which is more likely the good Spirit of God may have given it directly to both Baptists and Disciples. In any case, in the light of such a statement of Baptist position, what hinders union of the most intimate organic kind between these two bodies?

Our pen refuses to wait till after the Centennial is over to speak our praises of the leader of the convention hosts, Mr. W. R. Warren, the Centennial Secretary. We have felicitated our heart, time and again, during these three years past upon the fact that the preparations for the convention were in such good hands. And we believe thousands of his brethren, solicitous for the celebration's highest success, are reassured in the thought that Mr. Warren is at the helm. A young man, elected to an office which had just been created, with no tradition or precedents to go by, he grasped the opportunity from the first and with cumulative resourcefulness has met every new stage of the approach to the great work. Constantly before the people in speech and writing, he has kept his personal self quite out of sight. He has made people think of the Centennial and the great cause and not of himself. For over three years, in pamphlets and newspaper articles, he has written enough to edit a weekly paper. Each week his Centennial Bulletin comes fresh and electric with news and inspiration. Inventive, sagacious, statesmanlike, practical, he caught the vision of the Centennial opportunity and with admirable versatility has communicated it to his brethren. When the hosts gather to celebrate the Fathers, there will be, we predict, a due and appreciative testimonial given to this splendid son who possesses their spirit and his brethren's confidence.

In his address before the graduating class of Ohio Wesleyan University, Professor E. A. Ross, of the University of Wisconsin, author of "Sin and Society," rendered a modern paraphrase of Christ's picture of the Last Judgment. He said: "On that great day, when the sheep are parted from the goats, there will be those who will say: 'Lord, I did not feed the hungry or cover the naked or visit those sick or in prison, because I could not. Because as prosecuting attorney I convicted the men "higher up." I had all I could do to feed my own family, because as building commissioner I would not job the contracts, the banks shortened my credits and ruined my business, so that I had no home in which to receive the stranger; because as watcher of the polls I sought to prevent a good citizen from being beaten up by the ring sluggers, a ring policeman cast me into prison and I could not visit the sick.'

"And voices will be heard saying, 'Lord, I found the press gagged, but I released her and she blew a bugle note that summoned men to establish righteousness. I found the equality of all men before the law a mockery. I arraigned the rich and powerful as well as the petty offender, and justice resumed her sway. I found equality of contract an empty form; by safeguarding the labor contracts of the weak I made it a reality. I found parties spending money like water for improper purposes. I helped to establish the principle of publicity. I found candidates nominated by packed and gaveled conventions; I gave the people the direct primary.'

"Will not these, too, receive the invitation, 'Come, ye blessed, inherit the kingdom prepared for you'?"

One of the most able and illuminating statements of the race problem with which our southern states, and indeed our nation, are face to face, is that written by Mr. William Archer, in McClure's Magazine, for July. He discusses various conceivable ways in which the negro question may be settled and concludes that some plan of geographical segregation must be adopted, either to deport the negro to another land, or to provide him a place for himself within the limits of the United States. The latter would seem the more practicable, and he adopts the suggestion of Mr. John Temple Graves, that the government set aside Lower California for the negro's use and offer incentives for his migration there. Without reflecting upon the merit and importance of the enterprise for educating the negro—such work as is being done at Tuskegee and Hampton Institutes—Mr. Archer conceives that the greatest possible success of this education policy would still leave on our hands the vital problem involved in two races inhabiting the same territory, but prohibited from coming together in marriage. "If the two races," he says, "are to live together without open and lawful intermingling, it must be at the cost of incessant demoralization to both. Permanent concubinage, and the rearing of hybrid families, may be held in check by the strong social sentiment against it; but nothing can hold in check the still more degrading casual commerce between the white man (and youth) and the colored woman. It is probably this fact, quite as much as the hideous proclivities of the criminal negro male, that hardens the heart of the white woman against the black race." We would recommend Mr. Archer's article as not only being a contribution to the problem with which experts must reckon, but also a foundation statement for those to whom the negro question his hitherto been too fromidable a problem for the amateur to attack.

The recent celebration of the four hundredth anniversary of John Calvin's birth has revealed again our modern habit for discovering the "real" man behind the heroic tradition. The Calvin reputation is forbidding to most moderns. His "Institutes" forbid the average reader by their very depth of learning. His doctrine of election is forbidding to the soul's sense of justice. His bloodless face in the pictures we have of him seems never to invite to friendship or sympathy. But our recent writers have been telling us of "the human side of Calvin." His life has been ransacked for whatever data might be used in showing him to have been a man of like passions with ourselves. He has been shown as one of the truest of friends, unsparing of his little strength and time in kindly service and counsel. He chose a wife with the same coolness that he would make a logical deduction, but proved a faithful and devoted, almost a sentimental, lover. In physical frailty and pain he kept a serene spirit through his unfailing trust in God. But the world cannot quite forgive Calvin's part in putting Servetus to death. One writer says that "Servetus hangs about the neck of Calvin's fame as the albatross hung about the neck of the ancient mariner." Yet no doubt his fault was the fault of his age. The light of freedom had not yet fully dawned in Calvin's own soul even though his teaching had so much to do in ushering in the new day in the world. As for the controversy which Calvin left to succeeding centuries—the doctrine of election—it is reassuring to see his followers ignoring it or evading it by slippery tricks of words. For us the problem of determinism does not exist. As a problem it is rooted in a false view of God and man and the scriptures. But to those who still must think in terms of the traditional theology we offer the colored preacher's solution as one of the most convenient and plausible ways out of the difficulty. A certain parishioner was much troubled about the doctrine of election; he went to his colored pastor, asking him about it. "I will tell you," said the pastor, "de Lawd's all de time a votin' for you, and de Debbil he all de time a votin' agin you; and now whichever way you vote de election goes."

About all the anti-saloon movement needs to make its victory complete is the support of the Roman Catholic Church. All Protestant bodies are against the saloon. The total abstinence principle has met with little favor among Catholics in the past. There was especial significance attaching to the convention of the Catholic Total Abstinence Union of Illinois which was held in Chicago two weeks ago. Manifestly the saloon is growing into disfavor among clergy and laity alike. Citing the action of the last plenary council at Baltimore to the effect that the liquor traffic is "a dangerous and unbecoming business," and that those in it should get out of it and "seek a more honorable means of livehood," and that the Supreme Court of the United States has declared that the saloon has no legal standing, the convention passed the following resolutions:

"That we condemn the saloon trade for its open and shameless violation of Sunday laws prohibiting the sale of liquor on the Lord's day. We regard the open Sunday, as now observed, as seriously menacing the continuance of our free institutions. We further hold the open saloon on Sunday to be responsible for the weakening of the religious spirit among our citizens, which fact alone, if none other can be advanced against it, should be sufficient to condemn it.

"That in order to early instill into the minds of our children the benefits that accrue to those who voluntarily assume the pledge of total abstinence, we recommend to those in charge of our parochial schools that instruction of a practical character on the evils attendant upon the use of strong drink form part of their school curriculum.

"We again, as last year, recommend the formation of Catholic total abstinence cadets in every parish."

The convention, in harmony with the foregoing, took occasion to denounce "the shameful and degrading practice of those Catholic societies which permit, under their auspices, Saturday night dances and Sunday picnics at which intoxicating liquors are sold."

George Adam Smith

It is one of the interesting features of modern university life that frequent exchanges of instructors are arranged between institutions on different sides of the Atlantic. We have had, during the past year, a number of distinguished visitors from abroad. But none has come who has received a more eager welcome than Professor George Adam Smith of the United Free Church College, Glasgow, who is now giving a course of lectures at the University of Chicago.

Professor Smith is one of that distinguished body of Scotch biblical scholars who trace their intellectual and religious lineage back to William Robertson Smith, the first interpreter on British soil of modern methods of Bible study. His children in the faith have been a growing company, including such men as Marcus Dods, A. B. Bruce, A. B. Davidson, James Stalker, James Orr, John Watson and Henry Drummond. Probably no school of thought in Great Britain has so profoundly influenced the moral and religious life of the country as has this group of Scotch scholars and preachers.

Professor George Adam Smith is a man of exceedingly varied accomplishments. A life-long friend of Henry Drummond, he is also his most satisfactory biographer, and the volume in which he has enshrined his friendship for that vital and genial personality is one of the most inspiring of his long list of writings. Many years ago he began putting out those commentaries on Holy Scripture which have been among the most satisfactory of all modern works of interpretation. The first of these was the two volume Commentary on Isaiah in the Expositor's Bible. This was followed, some years later, by his two volume Commentary on the Twelve Minor Prophets. These works have been supplemented by a voluminous series of contributions to Hastings' Bible Dictionary, the still later Encyclopedia Biblica, and the single volume Hastings' Dictionary of the Bible.

But Professor Smith is a student of the East as well as of the Bible. His "Historical Geography of the Holy Land" is the most monumental and fascinating work that has ever been produced on the topography, character, manners and customs, and historical significance of Palestine. This has more recently been supplemented by his magnificent two volume work on Jerusalem, which has but recently issued from the press. He is now engaged upon a series of studies of Palestine east of the Jordan, a region hitherto but little studied.

Dr. Smith is not less interesting as a speaker than as a writer. He has long been in great demand on public occasions throughout Great Britain, and has twice before been in this country for considerable periods. The last time, however, he was stricken with typhoid fever and lingered between life and death for many weeks in a Cleveland hospital. This misfortune cut short his stay in America and disappointed a host of admirers and friends, who were waiting eagerly for his messages.

He preaches with conviction and deep earnestness. It is a spiritual tonic to listen to a man of such robust faith and profoundly consecrated life. No man has done more to reveal the invaluable character of modern biblical study as an aid to the understanding of the Bible and to the personal life of the Christian. His sermons, chapel addresses and miscellaneous talks at the University have been listened to with absorbing interest by audiences that completely filled the rooms in which he spoke; while his class rooms, in which the more technical studies of the Old Testament are carried on, have drawn the largest numbers in the history of classroom work at the university.

In personal relations Professor Smith is as delightful and stimulating as in his public work. There is no experience which he seems to enjoy more than to chat over the luncheon table or in a little company of his teaching colleagues regarding the incidents and experiences of his life and his relation with the men who have done so much to make recent religious history. His fund of wit is inexhaustible; in this he reminds one of his lamented friend, Henry Drummond.

Nor must it be forgotten that in his own city Professor Smith is probably more familiarly known as the President of the Social Service League than as a professor of biblical literature. His deep interest in the housing of the poor, in the improvement of sanitation, and in other activities which have for their end the uplifting of the slum sections of Glasgow, has made him a marked figure among social reformers in Britain. In his case, at least, there is no divorce between the interpretation of the Word of God and its application to daily living.

Three years ago, shortly after his physical breakdown in this country, Professor Smith took a long journey to the East, tarrying for considerable periods in India and other Asiatic lands. He has reason to be interested in the Orient. He was born in Calcutta, and was brought by his mother the long way to England in a voyage of five months, when he was but two years old. He has a brother in the Indian service. On his recent trip he was deeply impressed with the problems presented by that part of the world and especially with the magnificent opportunity which Christianity now has in lands dominated by Buddhism and Mohammedanism.

His Convocation address at the University was upon the theme, "Christianity in its Relation to Mohammedan Lands and Peoples," and it was a convincing vindication of the world-wide and supreme character of our faith as contrasted with the limitations of the religion of Islam. Many remarked on that day that it was an unusual thing to have a glowing and enthusiastic missionary sermon at a university convocation. And yet the discourse was statesmanlike in its presentation of political and social facts.

Professor Smith goes from Chicago to Chautauqua and then to the Pacific Coast for a series of lectures, later on returning to his own land. He has already visited some educational centers in the South and has been greatly interested in the racial problem which is now being so carefully studied by leaders both of the white and black races, north and south. The visit of such a man is a benediction to any community to which he comes. While his interpretation of the Scriptures is absolutely modern in every feature, accepting all the established results of criticism and scientific study, yet his attitude is not in the least that of polemic, but rather of a constant searcher after truth, a humble-minded disciple of our Lord.

He believes that the modern methods of study are the most valuable aids both to the creation and fostering of religious faith and to the cultivation of personal Christian character. He has done much to broaden and strengthen the religious convictions of his audiences and students. Men of most conservative types have warmly assured him that they have been enriched and given a new vision of truth by his ministeries. From the days of his association with Moody to the present time his influence has been constructive, wholesome and inspiring. We may well hope that he may be spared many years to give out further fruits of his scholarship and genius to the Christian world, and that in the progress of the years he may come to us many times more.

Here are some new answers of British school children, which do much to roll away the old reproach that a sense of humor is lacking on that side of the Atlantic: "A vacuum is a nothing shut up in a box." "An optimist is a man who attends to your head; a pessimist attends to your feet." "A fort is a place for soldiers to live; a fortress is where they put their wives." The great fire of London "did a great deal of good. It purified the city from the dregs of the plague, and burnt down eighty-nine churches." "The marriage custom of the ancient Greeks was, that a man married only one wife. This is called monotony."—The Living Church.
